Of course we accepted and followed the Governor into the ball-room, an immense and handsome room with a wonderful floor of red findalo and white calamansary woods. The planks are of tremendous length and have never been planed, but are smooth and highly polished. General Smith turned on the electric lights and the floor fairly gleamed beneath their rays. In dining-room, study and reception hall were exquisite tables of native woods: narra, rosewood, red, and black ebony. One of these tables was twelve feet across, and all of them had a beauty of grain and a polish like satin. From the reception-room we stepped to the balcony for a view of river and distant mountain range upon which the glow of late afternoon was resting. This reminded us that we must terminate our visit and leave our kind host. But the Governor said we must first see the grounds, and we strolled out on the green lawns which, with their venerable trees, were seen at their best at this hour. In the flower garden, which is Mrs. Smith's special pride, we found a wealth of old-fashioned flowers.

Residence of General Weston, U. S. A., Commander in Philippines

We now signaled for our calesa, and while it was approaching Governor Smith gathered some papaia, and handing them to our cochero, said to me, "You must taste our tropical fruits."

Our visit had been a delightful one, and so I told the Governor as he shook my hand at parting.

While much, everything one might say, is being done for the Filipino youth, a great thing was done for our own boys as well, when Bishop Brent of the Episcopal Church turned over to the young men of Manila, for club purposes, the Cathedral House of St. Mary and St. John. It is one of the finest buildings in Manila. The funds for its construction came from an American friend of Bishop Brent, and its furnishings from several American universities. At the Columbia Club young men away from home can enjoy athletic games and club life without temptations.

Apropos of exercise, a few evenings ago I met General Weston, the new Commander-in-Chief of the United States troops in the Philippines. He was walking briskly along the Luneta, taking his usual evening exercise. In a few moments' chat with him, I asked whether it were true of the Philippines as of India that one needs a great deal of exercise.

"Yes," he replied, "exercise in the tropics is essential; but we should know how to take it. It should be always in the shade, never in the sun. We have a lesson to learn from the Filipinos in this respect. They cover their heads, and if by chance the sun should peep out and catch them without an umbrella, they would find shelter if they had to creep under a bench. But," said the Commander-in-Chief with a twinkle in his eye, and an accent that marked him Hibernian, "this is not a land for women, though it is good enough for men and dogs," and with "good-by" he left the side of our carriage to enter his own, which was approaching.

The good work being done by the missionaries is almost beyond estimate. To cite one case: Pastor Nicolas Zamora is well known to the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, who have given him generous support in his work in the Philippines. He was the first ordained native pastor of the Methodist Church. He is a very eloquent man of marked power and is doing a truly great work among his people. Eight years ago he was the only Protestant Filipino preacher in the islands. To-day there are 800. The mission with which Mr. Zamora is connected last year received 7,000 members on probation and profession. They have erected a hospital near the First Methodist Church in Tondo, of which Mr. Zamora is pastor, and to quote him: "We are going to build a Bible seminary at Caloocan. May God bless you, is the message I send to my friend, Mr. Klopsch, and the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, who so generously helped me in my work."

you. If you are innocent of anything wrong what has been said cannot hurt you. If there has been reason for the rebuke, if something has been said sharply which has been caused by your own lack of Christian life, the rebuke ought to do you good; but we all of us know people, and we are all of us included at times, who are always ready to lose their tempers or fly into a passion if anything occurs which disturbs their equanimity. We have not learned, some of us, how to love our friends, to say nothing of our enemies. Good Christian men and women who have beautiful qualities in other directions, mar their whole lives and never seem to get any nearer the standard of Christ on account of this one fault of quickness of temper in the face of wrong. I think myself the temperament which is so exceedingly sensitive that it cannot stand rebuke is to be pitied exceedingly. But a Christian, of all persons, should learn to overcome. Jesus anticipated this when he said, "In the world ye shall have tribulation; but be of good cheer, I have overcome the world." He also anticipated this habit in men's lives when he said that we should forgive seventy times seven. How many of us, members of churches, have found it hard at times to forgive even once? This is one of the little foxes that spoil the vineyard.

Another little fox is making things necessities which are not necessities in life. That is, magnifying the unimportant things. It is indeed one of the great problems of our existence to find out what the most important things of life are and do them to the exclusion of the others; but our minds and hearts are often set upon what we call "things," and it is exceedingly difficult for us to set them aside and put in the place of mere "things," ideas or ideals and live around them. We have not reached the plane of the philosopher Ralph Waldo Emerson, who was once sitting in his study when a crank rushed in and said, "Mr. Emerson, do you know the world is speedily going to ruin?" And the philosopher looked up from his work and said, "Well, I can get along without it." I do not know why the Christian disciple cannot find out with the aid of his Master what the great things of the kingdom are and do them. When he does he has discovered the secret of life and his soul is not possessed with anxiety for things which do not themselves represent realities. A man's life does not consist in the superfluity of the things which he possesses, said Jesus. The same is always true in any age with any life.

Then there is the little fox of joylessness. It would be difficult to say how many so-called Christian people lack the joyous spirit. They are good people; they perform their church duties with loyalty; they are faithful; they undoubtedly love their Lord and Master; they have great qualities of endurance; but when it comes to sheer happiness they are almost strangers to it. When trouble comes they bear it, but with stoicism, not with joy. When grief comes they endure it, but with the endurance of the Indian rather than the Christian. They do their work faithfully but sing very little over it. What is known as the joy of the Lord is an unknown quantity to them. They do not realize, these good people, how much they miss as they go through the world. They have learned duty but they have not learned the joy of duty. They have learned to do things, but they have not learned how to do them. The gladness of life seldom visits them in the daily routine. Now a Christian of all persons in the world is entitled to this happiness, not only when things go smoothly and when everything is prosperous, but in times of trouble and defeat and oppression and loss; then of all times we are not only entitled to the joy of the Lord, but we need it and we ought to claim it. The little fox which is represented not by discontent or any of the positively disagreeable qualities, but by the absence of a positive joy, is a little fox that spoils the vineyard.

It is in the aggregation of these little faults in our Christian lives that we make the sum total of the destruction of the vineyards. One little fox in the vineyard might not matter; large numbers of them, as they increase, finally spoil the vineyard. It is significant that in the American version there is a marked change in the interpretation. In the old version it says, "Take us the little foxes that spoil the vines." In the new version it says, "Take us the little foxes that spoil the vineyards." Vines here and there might be spoiled but the vineyard as a whole remain intact; but the thought is that the little foxes as they multiply spoil the whole vineyard. These little faults of which we have made mention to-day break down the whole character. Instead of becoming filled with Christian sweetness and helpfulness to the world the life is spoiled throughout. It behooves us, therefore, to guard our vineyards from these faults. Let us not forget Hawthorne's story of Rappicini's daughter. Rappicini was a naturalist who had made a special study of poisonous plants and flowers, and he experimented on his beautiful daughter by having her inhale the odors of these poisonous blossoms until she possessed the terrible faculty of poisoning whatsoever she breathed upon. It was by the gradual inhalation of these odors that her whole body was finally possessed by the poison. Year by year as she grew in the midst of these horrible plants in Rappicini's garden her body was becoming saturated with death. Outwardly beautiful, she was really a source of death to those who drew near her.

The lesson is not far to seek. The deadly, insidious poisons of the little wrongs and vices and sins of life permeate character, destroy its usefulness and make it unworthy of the divine purpose. God has given us a beautiful place for the planting of the vineyard of life and has enriched the soil with the streams from his own never-failing springs, and has built about us safeguards of a civilization which contains all possibilities for protection, and has committed this vineyard of character, of richness, of sweetness, to our keeping. If then, we carelessly or selfishly open places around this safeguarded vineyard for these enemies of the vine, what can we expect but the final spoiling of the vineyard? May it be our prayer to-day and every day to shut out these little enemies of our souls, to exclude them for the good of the wide world as well as for ourselves, and to grow daily in the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ. Why should we have the same faults to-morrow that we have to-day?

Why should we persist in allowing the same weakness of temperament to persist year after year and see no betterment when we have, as the source of our strength in overcoming, the Master of the universe himself to help us? I wish that we might all of us learn from this day what a wonderful thing it is to overcome. "In the world ye shall have tribulation. Be of good cheer, I have overcome the world." Let us not forget he was tempted at all points like as we are. For there hath no temptation overtaken us except such as is common to man. He will not suffer us to be tempted above that we are able, but will with the temptation provide a way of escape. Let us then grow in the grace and knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ, going on from perfection to perfection until at last we "attain unto the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God, unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ."

FIGHTING SIN AT PANAMA

A Mission Worker's Impressions During a Recent Gospel Tour Up and Down the Isthmus

FOR months letters had been coming to headquarters at Barbados, urging the Macedonian cry, "Come over and help us!" Thousands and thousands of men, so they told us, were in Panama, and almost nothing was being done for their spiritual welfare. Sunday was not the Sabbath, but simply a big holiday, filled with cock-fights, bull-fights, drinking, carousing, dancing, licentiousness, etc.

Many men from the Christian mission stations in the West Indies had gone there to work on the Canal. They were doing what they could to stem the tide of sin by open-air meetings, and distributing tracts and religious literature. But there was a crying need of some one to marshal the forces and set them in battle array.

In answer to this urgent call, Brothers S. S. Nelson and Charles Slater and I left Barbados in February for a five weeks' missionary trip. We held services every evening, both in the open air and indoors. God wonderfully blessed us, and the hearts of thousands of men were touched.

On Saturday evening we went into the slum district of the city of Colon. We attracted a large crowd by singing, then jumped into a mule-cart and preached from the text, "Prepare to meet thy God." Hundreds listened attentively. When the invitation was given, a dozen men immediately pushed their way toward that old tip-cart. There they knelt on the bare ground, crying out to God for mercy. Before the service closed, over twenty-five men asked for prayer.

Our first week on the Isthmus convinced us of the need of conserving the work, and of a missionary to devote all his time to it. It was decided that Brother Nelson should stay and take charge. We want the readers of this paper to pray especially for him and the work in Panama.

We next crossed the Isthmus to the city of Panama, on the Pacific side. Here, too, crowds listened at the open-air services and followed us as we went singing through the streets to the mission. We noticed that on the ruins of the walls of some of the old Catholic churches, sometimes twenty feet from the ground, were growing trees fifteen and twenty feet high.

At La Boca, the Pacific entrance to the canal, we held services in the men's camp, and quite a few sought the Lord. At Culebra, where the great cut of the canal is being made, several young men from the Barbados Mission have denied themselves, saved their money, and purchased a small mission building. This is the only life-saving station in that neighborhood, where hundreds of houses abound in sin and vice. For a week we held meetings here; the people thronged the place, hundreds stood outside, and the altar services were encouraging.

It was pay-day when we reached Gorgona. The streets, vile resorts and rum-shops were filled with men, wasting their substance in riotous living. In the centre of town was a large open square, filled with drinking places. In the midst of that, at half-past six that evening, a dozen or twenty of us began to sing. Soon a large crowd, ninety-five per cent. of them men, was surging about us. We mounted a large dry-goods box and for thirty-five minutes poured in the red-hot Gospel truth. Twenty-four men and one woman responded to the Gospel invitation. Kneeling on the ground beside us, with faces upturned, they pleaded for pardon and salvation. Never in all our ministry had we seen such a sight; we felt it was our pay-day, also.

The moral conditions of Colon and Panama are appalling. We know of no place where there is as much sin and licentiousness. Girls are being shipped from the United States and elsewhere for immoral purposes; finished that we expect to move into it this month. soon as the finances warrant it, we shall begin the erection of the new tabernacle. We are sure that if the who are praying and giving for the Christian Mission the West Indies and South America could see the work they would feel that their investments are yielding large returns. C. O. MOULTON.

The New Panama Commissioner

William Nelson Cromwell, the new Panama Canal Commissioner, who preceded Secretary Taft to Panama to arrange for the important conferences to be held concerning the boundary disputes between Panama and Colombia, was appointed to this high post under the government because he was the man most conversant with the entire situation in regard to this stupendous national work.

Mr. Cromwell, while following his profession of lawyer, became acquainted with Panama Canal matters some years before the United States assumed charge of the work. He was long engaged in looking after the legal interests of the French Panama Canal Company.

Learning at that time the true importance of the canal to the United States, Mr. Cromwell made himself actively instrumental in securing the Panama Canal Bill in Congress. After that he engaged in perfecting the details of the transfer of the vast properties on the Isthmus to our government.

It may be said, indeed, that Mr. Cromwell has "grown up" with the Panama Canal; and so, when Mr. Roosevelt wanted for a commissioner one who knew the situation well enough to act as adviser, he chose this distinguished member of the American bar.

Among the Workers

—MR. AND MRS. REGINALD T. BROWN, missionaries at Porto, Portugal, write reporting encouraging progress in their Gospel work. During March they report fifty-four conversions at their meetings, the total attendance being nearly 6,500.

—ONE OF THE CONVERTS of the old McAuley Mission, New York, Singing Evangelist Frank Fitzgerald, has recently returned from an extended evangelistic tour through New York State and the West, where his message of song was greatly blessed to many.

—THE UNION MEETINGS conducted by Evangelist H. W. Bromley at Mason City, Neb., were a season of visitations of grace. At Bertrand, Neb., the evangelist and his assistants had a notable victory. Besides the large number blessed, about eighty-five were added to the Methodist Episcopal Church.

—EVANGELIST MILTON S. REES, of Rochester, N. Y., has just closed a most unusual evangelistic work in North Tonawanda, N. Y. Five churches were represented—the Presbyterian, Baptist, Methodist and two congregations of Disciples of Christ. The utmost spirit of unity and co-operation prevailed throughout the meetings. A large number made definite decisions for Christ, and practically all took membership with the churches. An entire week was given to services for men and some great victories were won.

ITALIANS UNITE WITH GRACE CHURCH

A NOTABLE religious service was held on the East Side, New York City, on April 6, when Bishop David H. Greer, of the Protestant Episcopal Church, confirmed a class of seventy-four Italians at Grace Chapel. People look at beautiful Grace Church, Broadway and Tenth Street, as they enter the shopping district, and think of it as a fashionable and wealthy congregation, little knowing the large work that is being carried on by this church over on the East Side. The Grace Chapel Settlement is a little east of First Avenue, reaching from Fourteenth to Thirteenth Street. There is a hospital, a church, a parish house and a clergy residence. A very large work is being done from this centre, under the direction of the vicar, the Rev. George H. Bottome.

When the chapel work was first started the neighborhood was mostly German, and the chapel flourished. In recent years, the neighborhood has been changing, the Germans have been moving away and Italians have been taking their places. The chapel people, realizing this, began to plan Italian work. Two of the clergy learned to speak the Italian language. These services are usually conducted by the Rev. Melville K. Bailey, who advises the Italians, plans work among them, teaches their Bible Class, and preaches to them in their own language. He is assisted by Francesco Urbano.

There is a choir of Italian girls to lead in the service of praise. During the week there are many classes in English, that they may become worthy Americans, in trades, that they may become more proficient, and in music, which they love so much.

When it was announced that the Bishop would hold a confirmation, many of them asked for the privilege of being in the class. No one was urged so to do. In fact, some were put off till another year. These people are above the average. The old church that they had attended in the home land had lost its hold upon them, and they were without a church until they received the invitation to learn American Protestant ways.

The confirmation service was conducted in Italian, and was remarkable for its heartiness. Among those taking part beside the Bishop and Mr. Bailey, were the vicar, Dr. W. R. Huntington, rector of Grace Church, and Dr. George F. Nelson, Archdeacon of New York.

In the instruction of the class, Mr. Bailey had charge of the men, and Deaconess Gardner, of the Grace Church Day Nursery, taught the women. The class was made up chiefly of adults, the larger portion being men of mature years.

Bishop Greer spoke of the importance of the occasion, referring to it as one of the most impressive and significant during his term of service.

HOW A LITTLE GIRL CAME TO CHRIST

Mrs. Alexander's Touching Story of Her Own Conversion in Childhood in England

Mr. Alexander Addressing U.S. Seamen at the St. Helena Naval Training Station at Norfolk, Va.

NORFOLK, VA., is deeply stirred with religious fervor through the Chapman-Alexander meetings. Each night the big Armory holding 3,000 persons is filled, while three simultaneous meetings are held in other sections of the city. Six or seven thousand people are in daily attendance at the revival meetings, and scores are daily confessing Christ as Saviour. One of the most faithful attendants at the meetings is a woman, who is said to be a very prominent social leader in the South.

Soldiers come in from Fort Monroe to attend the meetings. On a recent Sunday night, 130 apprenticed seamen from the St. Helena Naval Training Station came to the Armory Hall in a body. When Dr. Chapman gave the invitation a long line of them came forward to confess Christ.

One afternoon recently, Mr. Alexander, his wife and Mr. Harkness and others went over to the Naval Training Station and held an open-air Gospel service for the sailors. Mrs. Alexander told how she had accepted Christ when she was a young girl in Birmingham, England. She said in substance:

"My father, who was a business man, did a great deal of Christian work, both in his business and out of it. In one part of Birmingham, where he built a Mission Hall, he used to arrange for a series of special mission meetings once a year. Sometimes, in our school days, we were allowed to go with our father to the evening meetings, and one night I went down with him to the mission. It was in rather a poor part of the town, and the hall was filled chiefly with poor people. Those who were Christians had been working to bring in people who did not know Christ, and among others were a good many men and women who had been drinking. I do not remember what the sermon was about, but I distinctly remember one of the hymns:

"Free from the law, oh happy condition!
Jesus hath died, and there is remission;
Cursed by the law and bruised by the fall,
Grace hath redeemed us once for all.

"For some time I had been weighed down with the burden of sin. I knew I was a sinner and I longed to be free and to know that I was forgiven. That night, as they were singing the hymn 'Free from the Law,' I could not help noticing the glad light on the faces of some of the people as they sang. You could see that they were really free and that they knew it, and I longed to be free and sing it as they did.

Mrs. Charles M. Alexander

"At the end of the meeting, when the invitation was given for those who would come to Christ to show their willingness by standing where they were, it just seemed to me as if everything in the room was blotted out except the Lord and myself, with all my heart's need. It seemed as if the Lord Jesus Christ was saying to me 'Give me thy heart,' and I arose to my feet. Several drunken people also came to Christ that night, and a little later on those who stood up were asked to come into another room to have some conversation and prayer with Christian people. I half started to get up, and I remember that one of my cousins, who was sitting by me, took hold of my arm to pull me down and said: 'There is no need of your going into the inquiry room; I shouldn't go if I were you. You can have a little talk with your father and mother when you get home.' I know it was really meant in the kindest way, but it seemed right for me to do just as the others were doing. If it was good for them to show their willingness to accept Christ by walking through the hall to the inquiry room, then it was good for me, for I needed Christ just as much as they. So I did go into the little room and found my father there. He was kneeling down praying with a poor drunken fellow, and I sat still until he had finished. Then he came over and knelt down by me, and I shall never forget the tender sound in his voice and the look of rejoicing in his eyes over the fact that his own little girl had come to Christ."

When the appeal was made by Mr. Alexander at the close of his wife's testimony for those who would then and there accept Christ, a number of young men had the courage to make an open confession of faith. At the conclusion of the meeting over one hundred signed the membership card of the Pocket Testament League, and each signer will be presented with a Testament by the Gospel singer. As the sailors go throughout the world in the various ships of the United States Navy, no one can estimate the good accomplished by their having with them and reading daily the Word of God.

PURSUED BY AFFLICTION

A MEMBER of a prominent Methodist church in New York City has been the subject of almost unparalleled affliction. It is first necessary, in order to appreciate the sorrows that have befallen this Christian gentleman, that the reader be informed of his most exemplary character. He has, through a long and very busy life, always found time to be faithful to many official relations to the church. On the Sabbath he has been found in his pew, during the week generally at various religious and social gatherings. Of his very large wealth he has always given generously. To his pastors (of whom I was one) he has been a true friend. This busy man has, all the while, been the chief financial officer of perhaps the greatest railroad system in America.

His bereavements began some few years ago with the death of a most promising son, in the fulness of his youthful manhood and usefulness. Next, another son was taken, a young man of equal promise and worth. Next, a beautiful daughter, just after her graduation from college, sickened with consumption unaccountably and died. The noble wife and mother of these children, a woman of great social charm and usefulness in the church, apparently as strong as she was attractive, fell under a most wasting malady and died.

Within the last few days the only remaining child, a married daughter, with every grace a young matron could possess, went on a visit to Chelsea, Mass., at the home of her aunt, the sister of the man whose sad chronicle I write. During the conflagration which on April 12 destroyed so many Chelsea homes, these two ladies fled through the streets, unguided and terror-stricken. The flaming steeple of a church toppled over on them. After days their remains were recovered and only identified by some articles of jewelry.

Thus in less than fifteen years, if I mistake not, all the immediate kin, except grandchildren, are taken by premature death from this solitary man. He bears his sorrows by the faith of the Christian religion. His character is shown in that, while daily we read of men who take their own lives for mere trifling disappointments, this heroic soul pursues his duties, greets his friends through tears, yet not with bitterness, and abides God's time of explanations. Such a life is a marvelous lesson for all those poor mortals who play the coward or turn infidel in sorrow for less than this. It shows what Christ can do for a manly soul.

One hopes that the closing passages of Job may be realized in this man's life. Read the last chapter of the Book of Job.

A Pastor's Appreciation

Dear Dr. Klopsch: I have received in good order, both the Calendars and the two premium books as per order, i. e., "500 Animal Stories" and "Twice Round the World with Alexander," with both of which I am delighted; they are certainly very charming books. The Calendar is beautiful in design. With much respect and good wishes for the season,

The Senate and the Motto

FOR many weeks past the country has awaited with eager expectation the intelligence of some action by the Finance Committee of the United States Senate in regard to the bill for restoring the motto "In God We Trust" to the nation's coinage. That bill, which passed the House by an overwhelming majority, has remained in the hands of the Committee of the Senate for so long a time that people began to be apprehensive that it had been forgotten. They could not understand the apathy of the Senate concerning a measure which had aroused the loftiest patriotic and religious sentiment of the whole country, and which caused the Lower House to be flooded with protestations from many States, urging the passage of the bill. Moreover, the bill is one which is understood to have the informal approval of the President himself, who has intimated that, should it pass both Houses, it will certainly receive the executive approval.

Now, we have the cheering though somewhat tardy announcement that the Finance Committee of the Senate will take up the bill for the restoration of the motto at its next meeting. A letter giving this assurance has been written by Senator Daniel of that Committee. We hope, therefore, soon to hear that the bill has been reported favorably to the Senate. The members of that august body owe it to the whole nation that this measure, concerning which there has been so much feeling among our people, should have a fair opportunity for discussion in open session. Any failure to report it during the present session would be misinterpreted and attributed to indifference on the part of the Senate to the earnest desire of the American people.

The Treaty With Japan

THE closing year of the nineteenth century witnessed the embodiment of the world-wide aspiration for peace in the establishment of the International Court of Arbitration at The Hague. The fifteen nations uniting in establishing this highest tribunal in the world embraced all the Great Powers and all maritime nations, thus affording a basis for friendly arbitrament among practically all the nations most likely to disturb the peace of the world. That tribunal, after sinking into a state of desuetude, was revived by President Roosevelt's action in having submitted to it the dispute between this country and Mexico, and may now be said to be a permanent agency for world peace.

Happily, also, another achievement looking to international peace and good will is also to be credited largely to the President, who received the Nobel prize for bringing about peace between Japan and Russia. The announcement that Secretary Root and Baron Kagoro Takahira, the Japanese Ambassador to the United States, have signed a general arbitration treaty between the United States and Japan is one of specially pleasing significance and interest, in view of recent bellicose talk and diplomatic difficulties growing out of the assaults on Japanese subjects in San Francisco. The treaty is practically similar in all respects to those recently negotiated between the United States and several other Powers, and provides for the settlement by arbitration of all disputes of a legal nature or growing out of the construction of existing treaties between the two nations, questions of vital interest affecting the honor or independence of the two contracting States, or their treaty obligations to other powers, excepted.

The signing of this treaty, which is the first of the kind ever negotiated between Japan and the United States, comes opportunely as a quietus upon war-talk, in Congress and out of it, that at times since the assaults upon the Japanese in 1906 on our Pacific Coast threatened the hitherto unbroken friendly relations between Japan and ourselves. The treaty is to remain in force for five years from the date of its ratification. As no opposition to the treaty is expected, the prospect for better relations between the United States and the leading Power of the Orient is now bright.

Dr. Parkhurst on Vivisection

ONE by one the leaders in press and pulpit are coming out squarely against vivisection. Like most reforms, it makes progress slowly at the outset, but soon the influence of the recent important accessions to the Anti-Vivisection ranks will become cumulative.

Then we may expect to see the movement take on real life and go forward with energy. The most recent notable accession is the Rev. Dr. Parkhurst, who, in a letter published in a contemporary, expresses his views in these characteristic sentences:

So long as it is a question whether vivisection really renders any service to humanity, and so long as it is an undoubted fact that vivisection is of use to man only in exceptional instances, I want to be distinctly understood as belonging to the ranks of the Anti-Vivisectionists. I would not knowingly be attended by any physician who has caused acute pain by the tortures inflicted upon any dumb beast. I should expect the sensibilities of such a one to be so benumbed that he would not be averse to playing any little experiment upon my body he thought would escape detection. I do not want to be cared for by any one that is without a heart, and I will not give any one credit for heart who can without quailing witness the prolonged agony of any little piece of animal innocence. It is no less fiendish for a physician to stick needles into a rabbit's eye or lacerate the spinal cord, than for a boy to set fire to a kerosene lamp.

Dr. Parkhurst's point that a physician who is fond of carving dumb creatures might have no scruples at doing a little experimental work among his patients is one that will probably stir up the medical faculty. In justice to the doctors, however, let us admit that the general experience is against such a conclusion. They are humane and considerate to their patients. If the truth were known, probably the most of them—certainly the best of them—would be found as firmly opposed to vivisection and its attendant barbarities as the most sensitive non-professional.

Retiring Presidents

WHEN a President retires from office, the same public interest which has attended his executive career follows him, to a very considerable extent, into private life. An ex-President never ceases to be a public character. Like General Grant, he may make a spectacular tour of the world; like Rutherford B. Hayes, he may prefer the quieter pleasures of farming and poultry-raising, or like Grover Cleveland, he may devote his abilities to the practice of law, with shooting and fishing as side diversions; but whatever he may do, he is still more or less in the public eye.

It is not surprising, therefore, that we should find, even at this early date, a good deal of speculation concerning the probable manner in which President Roosevelt will dispose of his time after March 4 next, when he retires from office. He will still be a comparatively young man, just a year over the half-century mark. According to some of the published reports—all of which are of course purely speculative—he will go abroad for a year or two, and his travels will include a hunting tour in Africa among much bigger game than mountain lions. One can already see in imagination the ancestral hall at Oyster Bay studded with elephants' tusks and wilderbeeste heads, and hung with tawny lion skins, after the wanderer has returned to settle down.

Some of these speculations, however, go deeper into Mr. Roosevelt's future and cast a horoscope which reveals him as a man with a great career still to be carved out either in the United States Senate or as the distinguished president of some well-endowed and prosperous university. It is safe to venture the prediction that in whatever direction his choice may lie, it will be one that will afford employment for his incessant energy and strenuousness. He is not a man to subside calmly into the quieter grooves of conservative citizenship. Whether as Senator, college president, or Ambassador to London or Paris, he will continue to be heard from. However people may differ regarding the wisdom of his policies and the soundness of his statesmanship in some of the intricate questions that affect our national affairs, all will accord him credit for strong, virile, intensely patriotic Americanism. A man of such tremendous vigor is not disposed of by retirement. The country will hear of Mr. Roosevelt in the years to come.

A New Danger in Speech

UNEXPECTED reinforcement has been given to the old proverb that "silence is golden" by the latest dictum of medical science. Several of the leading physicians in London, and certain eminent lay observers, have given to the scientific world a new theory, which declares substantially that an enormous amount of vital energy is wasted in talking; that an excessive talker is a human vampire who saps the vitality of those around him, and that a large percentage of the victims nervous and mental diseases are inordinate talkers.

Of course, this novel theory can hardly be made general application. We might readily understand it if only intended to be applied to the garrulous, to the incessant chatterer, to the inveterate talker who stream of speech irritates and fatigues those around him. It certainly cannot apply to the men and women of ready speech whose utterance flows in smooth and well-rounded sentences, and whose ideas are logical and convincing. In Congress, in our various Legislature and on our public platforms, one occasionally encounters a speaker whom he would gladly miss; yet the average deliverance is agreeable and entertaining. It is undeniable, however, that there is a class of talkers who tire out the hearer with their small-fry gossip, their egotistical boasting, or their tidbits of scandal and personal detraction, which they skilfully but maliciously inject in an ordinary conversation. To these may be added the chronic disputant, who is ready to whet his tongue, if not his wits, on any subject under the sun, and the "walking encyclopedia" who is always on the lookout for some victim whom he hopes to awe with his great accomplishments.

It would of course be ungallant to say that any of the fair sex should be included in this category. Whether the theory of the London doctors be a tenable one or not is soon to be demonstrated by experiments in the London hospitals. They hold that sickness is propagated if not created, by talking about it, and that imaginary ailments under perpetual discussion become real ones. Herein is a hint worth heeding. If you will talk, talk health, happiness, good humor and pleasant anticipations. Talk well of your neighbors, and as agreeably as you can, even of your enemies. Be an optimist. Avoid the penalties that come from undue conversational indulgence by not talking too much at any time. After all, the man who says little, and that little well, is not only wiser in his day and generation, but happier, and in the main better liked, than his loquacious brother. It is a consoling reflection, too, that his reserve has the additional advantage of being a mental and moral tonic.

In the Gospel Field

—EVANGELIST WALT HOLCOMB and his singing evangelist, E. R. Smoot, have lately conducted many successful meetings in the Southern and Western States.

—DESPITE ALL APPEALS and protests by the Protestant clergy and many American citizens, the cockpit was a feature of the Manila carnival just ended. It occupied the largest building on the carnival grounds.

—THE CHURCHES OF Holdrege, Neb., are rejoicing over the results of the union evangelistic campaign. Rev. Milford H. Lyon, of Wheaton, Ill., conducted the movement. A tabernacle seating 2,400 was built. A chorus of 150 voices was organized, led by Mr. Lyon's assistant, Clifton Powers. Nearly 600 began the Christian life, the saloons have been driven out, and a movement is being pressed to a successful issue to build a Young Men's Christian Association building.

New York's Free College

THE College of the City of New York opened its new buildings on Washington Heights on May 14, with dedication ceremonies, in which the participants included representatives of the nation, the State, the metropolis and other universities throughout the country. Peculiar interest attaches to this institution, first, because it is a ward of the great city that built the beautiful new buildings and maintains them; second, because it is an absolutely free college, making no charges for tuition, nor even for text-books or for any of the paraphernalia needed by young men in their studies. The present enrolment numbers over 4,000 students and the living alumni exceed 2,700, out of a total of 3,000 students graduated in the sixty-one years of the existence of the college. According to the programme, the ceremonies on the greatest day in the college's history included addresses by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, Mr. Straus, who was appointed by Mr. Roosevelt to "represent the nation at the opening exercises of the country's most important free college."

Governor Hughes was slated to represent the State and Mayor McClellan formally to hand over the keys of the college to its president, Dr. John H. Finley. President Elliott, of Harvard, was down for one of the most important of the dedicatory addresses. In the evening the alumni gave a dinner at the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel to all the distinguished guests of the day, at which further speeches were made in eulogy of the splendid opportunities for a thorough education offered to students who, but for this free institution, might be denied the advantages of college training. Some of the youths who are to benefit by the training in this great college may yet prove an honor to the State and the nation. It is a great privilege and they would do well to show their appreciation by their diligence in study and rectitude in behavior, remembering the admonition of one who valued education above all material possessions:

Exalt wisdom, and she shall promote thee; she shall bring thee to honor. (Prov. 4: 8.)

A Confucian Temple

For the first time in the history of the Chinese in America, action has been taken to establish a centre of Confucianism in this country. This initial step was taken by the Minister of China to the United States, Mr. Wu Ting Fang. At a mass meeting held in the Chinese Theatre, in New York City, Mr. Wu delivered an address in which he called for subscriptions for the building of a Confucian temple in Chinatown. Mr. Wu himself is an earnest Confucian, as are also most of the Chinese in this country, and, as was expected, his appeal for funds met with ready response, especially from wealthy Chinamen, many of whom came promptly to the platform and signed their names to the subscription paper, pledging thus in a few minutes a sum reported at about $100,000. Minister Wu said that the temple would contain, not only halls of worship, but also a library, reading-room and gymnasium. He expressed his opinion that such a temple would add much to the strength of his people in New York. He added, however, that in spite of the high-sounding designation, the proposed temple will be more like a school or an Association building, its purpose being mainly to teach and to facilitate the Confucian philosophy and practices. The lesson taught by Confucius, Minister Wu declared, is the practice of goodness for goodness' sake—"a manly philosophy." Confucian principles, which Minister Wu said would abide forever, were, "Respect those in authority, love one's kin, venerate one's elders." "The proposed temple," he concluded, "is a mingling of Confucius and the West, and I am certain Americans will watch the movement with great interest as a possible concentrated representation, a microcosm of the great awakening that is taking place in China." Mr. Wu diplomatically evaded dwelling at much length on the religious phase of the work of the temple, broadly intimating that the chief work undertaken would correspond in a certain sense to that of a Y. M. C. A., making the temple in effect a headquarters for the mental and physical development of the young men of Chinatown, as well as for the teaching of manners and morals. A number of Christian Chinamen of distinction were present at this important meeting and they, too, delivered addresses favoring the building of a temple of the kind Minister Wu described. On the platform behind the distinguished diplomat was a copy of a Confucian screen, the original of which was made 2,400 years ago. But Confucius, though a famous moralist, was not the founder of a religion. His doctrines have been known and preached in China for the last 2,500 years, yet that country has lain all these centuries in spiritual darkness. Nor will it awaken and rise until a greater light than that of Confucius, the rising sun of Christianity, shines forth over all its dominions.

I am the light of the world; he that followeth me shall not walk in darkness, but shall have the light of life. (John 8: 12.)

Medicine from a Snake

A perilous exploit is reported from the Zoological Garden of New York. A lancehead snake, brought from was repeated until all the venom was extracted, and then the snake was restored to its cage to rest and feed. The doctors, examining the jar, found they had enough of the priceless remedy to last for several years. So powerful is it, say the doctors, that an infinitesimal portion, highly diluted, makes an effective dose. It is difficult to understand how so minute a remedy can cure, but it is certainly a novel idea to extract from so deadly a creature a remedy for disease. Who can tell whether in the coming millennial time God may not transform all the foes of men so that they may do him good and not evil?

The sucking child shall play on the hole of the asp, and the weaned child shall put his hand on the cockatrice's den. They shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain. (Isa. 11: 8, 9.)

A Boy Entombed

Some ten or more boys, all of them under fourteen years of age, have been very busy for two weeks back in a work of excavation. Near the avenue where they live in New York there is a vacant lot. The boys have been reading stories of adventure and of Indian warfare. They determined to construct a cave on the vacant lot, and a boy who had begun to study engineering was their leader. Under his instruction they dug a tunnel twenty feet long, ending in an underground room. In this they had soap-boxes to serve as chairs and a packing-box for a table, and had collected a store of candles. This was to be the council-room. Other smaller rooms were to open out of it, and last week they began to excavate these. The leader went down to examine the work with two of his lieutenants. No sooner had he reached the council room than the roof fell in. One of the boys was caught in the passage, and only his head and one arm were visible. He shouted for help, and was able to tell that the leader was under the soil behind him. He was quickly rescued by the men who came in response to the cries of the boys, but the leader was dead when he was dug out. It was a sorrowful end to their weeks of toil. It may be hoped that the survivors, when they grow up, will not forget the tragic result of their efforts to construct a resort of their own, but will trust in that indicated by the wise king:

In the fear of the Lord is strong confidence; and his children shall have a place of refuge. (Proverbs 14: 26.)

A Missing Heiress

Search is being made for the daughter of a deceased New York policeman, who proves to be entitled to a large share of an estate worth $100,000. Ten years ago the policeman resigned from the force and devoted himself to speculations in real estate. He was at that time a widower with one daughter, then twelve years old. As his traffic in houses prospered enormously, he married again; but the daughter and the new wife did not agree, and one morning the girl was missing. Her father supposed she would soon return, but as she did not he searched for her. It is thought she must have entered domestic service, in which she might easily conceal her whereabouts. During all these ten years no trace of her has been found, and her father found himself baffled in following the faint clues he obtained. Two months ago he died, and now the discovery of his daughter became a matter of legal importance. She is entitled to a large share of the considerable property he left, the extent of which she probably has no idea of, as he was comparatively poor when she left home. Hitherto all inquiries have failed to reach her, and it appears doubtful whether she will be found. If she had only communicated with her father during her absence she might now be in the enjoyment of a fortune. An infinitely greater loss comes to people who hold no communication with their heavenly Father. They suffer the loss of present peace and happiness as well as a future inheritance.

If ye then, being evil, know how to give good gifts unto your children, how much more shall your Father which is in heaven give good things to them that ask him? (Matt. 7: 11.)

Brazil, was compelled to give up its venom for medicinal purposes. The snake is of an extremely deadly kind. The Brazilians call it by a name which means "instant death," and the Brazilian and Portuguese sailors refuse to go on a ship in which there is a live specimen. Nearly a century ago an eminent physician in Germany, Dr. Constantine Hering, discovered that a minute extract of the venom of the lancehead was a remedy for epilepsy, insanity and some acute forms of nervous disease. He obtained a supply and was highly gratified with the results. It has always been difficult to replenish the stock and this is the first time in America that an attempt to do so has succeeded. The snake, which is four feet long, was taken by Snyder, the keeper of the reptile house, to the operating room. There the curator of the museum, Dr. Raymond L. Ditmars, was waiting, with Dr. Ardo Hering, a grandson of the original discoverer. The snake was laid on a table and Dr. Ditmars, watching his opportunity, grasped it just back of the lancetlike jaws. The snake became infuriated, darting its black tongue in and out viciously. Dr. Ditmars held it over a glass jar, over which a piece of gauze was stretched like a drumhead. The snake in its fury bit the gauze and instantly Dr. Ditmars tightened his grip on its neck. A little stream of the venom ran down into the jar. Snyder, who was holding the tail of the snake, shook it, and again it bit the gauze and the venom ran out. The operation

AMERICA'S FIRST BULGARIAN MISSION

Rev. and Mrs. Bagranoff

In charge of the First Bulgarian Mission in America

BULGARIANS in America twenty-five years ago numbered not more than twenty. Those few were here for educational purposes only. The number grew until, at the beginning of the present century, there were about one hundred Bulgarians scattered through the Union.

A more rapid increase in emigration from Bulgaria began five or six years ago; yet, up to 1905, the meeting of two Bulgarians in an American city was characterized by all the rejoicing common to the sudden meeting of two brothers in exile. To-day, however, our Bulgarian population numbers at least 150,000, of which some 70,000 are from Bulgaria proper and the remainder from Macedonia.

What caused this sudden and extraordinary exodus of men and women from the countries named? The reason involves a matter in economics. In Bulgaria, in the last few years, wonderful progress has been made in education, in militarism, in public roads, in railroads, in the rebuilding of ruined cities and in the founding of benevolent institutions. But all this progress cost money; it cost so much more than was derived from the ordinary public revenues, that the government was forced to increase the taxes. Taxes had already fallen too heavily on the working population, and this increased burden now brought widespread dismay. The result was that the workers began leaving the country by the hundreds—all seeking the greater opportunities and higher wages offered by America.

The reason for the exodus from Macedonia, meantime, was political as well as economical. It was the result of the outrages of the last few years—outrages said to have been committed by both Greeks and Turks on innocent Bulgarians.

The largest group of Bulgarians is to be found in the twin cities of Granite City and Madison, Ill., just north of East St. Louis. The Bulgarian colony there numbers about 7,000.

Very few of the Bulgarians in the United States are accompanied by their wives or children. A large number are unmarried. A great number of the married men, however, have expressed their determination to bring over their families as soon as possible. The younger men are already asking for American citizenship, though few of these can speak more than a few words of English.

The majority of these immigrants are poor wage-earners. Until recently they had neither a school nor a church which they could attend. The first to give them attention was Dr. T. D. Logan, President of the Home Missions of the Presbyterian Synod of Illinois. Dr. Logan searched till he found a native minister, the Rev. T. S. Bagranoff of Bald Mount, Pa., who was appointed first missionary in the new field.

Rev. Bagranoff was graduated from the American Collegiate and Theological Institution at Smokov. He finished his theological course at Auburn Theological Seminary, Auburn, N. Y. Then he returned to his native country where, until 1900, he engaged active in the missionary field as a pastor and teacher.

He married Miss Nevenka Gradinaroff, also a native of Bulgaria and a graduate of the American College for Girls at Constantinople. After the wedding they left for America. In New York City they were engaged in the evangelistic work of the tent campaign. Then both Mr. and Mrs. Bagranoff enlisted as students of the Bible Teachers' Training School, conducted by Dr. W. W. White in New York City, where they took a course of Bible study. While there Rev. Bagranoff received and accepted a call from an American church in Pennsylvania. After two years of pleasant and successful service there, they entered into their present missionary work among their fellow countrymen in America.

Dr. Bagranoff's new mission was opened in December, 1907. The work of the mission includes a school in Madison and a branch in Granite City for the teaching of the English language, United States history and geography, government and laws and subjects calculated to promote an intelligent knowledge of American institutions, morals and good citizenship. In connection with the school there is a reading-room supplied with literature of an instructive and moral character. Sunday School and religious services are conducted in the Bulgarian language. Time, energy and money have been spent in helping hundreds of the poorest among the Bulgarian population. Since the first of the present year 140 members have been enrolled in the mission's school and some of these have acquired so much English as to be able to read and write.

Rev. W. W. Jeffries, the synodical superintendent, says of this work: "We are now in the beginnings. But the field is large and inviting and we ask the co-operation of all interested in home mission work."

Family Members Left Behind by Bulgarian Emigrants

BOWERY MISSION PRODIGALS

ONE of the most gratifying features of Bowery Mission work is the number of men and boys who, through the instrumentality of the Mission, are restored to happy relations with their families. During the year many hundreds of such cases occur. It is one of the compensations for the terrible heartache and heartbreak that come to those whose lot it is to work among human shipwrecks. When a letter turns up in the mail saying: "Send my son home at once," it is like a radiant shaft of sunlight shining against the dark background of sorrow and despair.

I remember once sitting in my office face to face with a prodigal, who had shamefully betrayed his father's trust and for two years had kept his loving mother in the most agonizing suspense, but who had come to repentance in the Mission, and had asked me to write home seeking his father's forgiveness. The reply had come and was lying on the desk before us, and my hand trembled as I opened the envelope, for I knew it sealed the boy's fate one way or the other. I tried to read it to him, but my voice broke. When I recovered myself and was able to read the letter, he put his wan face upon his hands, his elbows on his knees, and sobbed like a child. They were tears of joy, however, for the message was: "Send my boy home by the first boat. I will meet him at Savannah, and it will be like the coming home of the prodigal in the Scriptures."

I have sometimes visited the homes in which restored prodigals have been reinstated and nothing more like heaven has ever entered my experience.

Very often we had visits at the Mission from mothers, wives and children, which have been like pilgrimages of homage to some sacred shrine. One night, one of our converts, whom we had not seen for twelve months, paid us an unexpected visit, bringing his wife and a lady neighbor. After the man had given his testimony, his wife rose to her feet to speak, but was unable to do so coherently, her emotions being so intense. Thereupon the neighbor rose, and in glowing language testified to the real change which had come into the life of the man, a change so great that it had stirred all the neighborhood in which he lived.

The following lines are from a letter I have just received:

"It is with a happy mind and heart that I write to let you know that I do not forget you and the dear old Bowery Mission. May God bless you for what you have helped to do for me, and others just like me. You would be surprised to know the change that is in me since I joined the Brotherhood of the Mission. I am writing this letter in my own daughter's home after being separated from her for thirteen years. Is not that a grand testimony? Will it not cheer the heart of dear Mother Bird? God bless you and your little family of workers. Pray for me.

"Yours, JOHN J. CANNON."

On a recent Sunday evening, a special farewell service was held for the encouragement of two young men who were going back the next day to their respective homes in Montreal, Canada. A few months ago, they were both penniless outcasts in the Bowery. They were first noticed in the Bread Line, where an invitation was given them to attend the Mission meetings. They came and were converted. Although both came from the same city, they had not known each other till they met in the Mission Brotherhood meeting. From that time on they were inseparable friends. A David and Jonathan affection sprang up between them. Their tastes, desires and hopes all seemed to run in the same direction, and when one of them announced his intention of writing home, asking for forgiveness, the other quickly followed his example. They both were fortunate in obtaining employment at about the same rate of wages. They attended the meetings regularly together. They agreed to lay by a certain amount of their earnings for the purpose of returning home in decent shape, and, ultimately, both traveled back on the same train to Montreal. Encouraging letters have been received, telling of their joyous reception at home, and of their still being further strengthened in their good resolutions for an upright life.

For the last nine years, visitors to the Mission have noticed an elderly gentleman of very dignified appearance occupying a seat near the platform. This seat this man has filled almost nightly. He rarely, if ever, speaks in a meeting, but his interest in the Mission and everything pertaining to it is so intense that we look upon him as a father, and have learned out of respect to call him "the Deacon." Occasionally he has risen and uttered a very touching request for prayer that he might be enabled to get some news of his family. We have known that there was a tragedy behind it all, but no one ever thought of intruding upon the secret of his grief.

On a recent Sunday, to the surprise of every one, he rose and made what was for him a lengthy speech: "I am going to leave to-morrow to go down East, where, twenty-two years ago, they turned me out. They gave me two chances, one to get away, the other to go to a place where I could not get away, so I took the first alternative. These people down East do not very easily forgive, but I will try hard to convince them that I have left off drinking. JOHN J. HALLIMOND, Supt.

THE TRANSFORMATION OF MARGARET

Synopsis of "Into Still Waters"

THE serial which begins in this issue is the sequel of the story by the same author, entitled Into Still Waters, which appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD last year. For the benefit of those readers who may not recall the leading incidents in that story, we give them below, as they are essential to a proper understanding of the transformation of Margaret.

Little Margaret Kendall, aged five years, arrives with her mother at the Grand Central station in New York. Mrs. Kendall hurries away on an errand, first telling Margaret to wait until she returns. Mrs. Kendall, while crossing a street, is run over and taken to a hospital. Margaret, after waiting a long while, goes out in the street to find her mother. She gets lost. A little street boy takes pity on her and leads her back to the Grand Central; but the mother is not to be found. Margaret tells her new-found friend that her mother wore a blue dress, and the boy then remembers seeing the accident. He does not tell Margaret, however, and finally induces her to go home with him, telling her his name is Bobby McGinnis. Mrs. McGinnis, Bobby's mother, hospitably receives the little waif and treats her as a daughter.

Margaret lives for five years in the slums of New York. She is the child of wealthy and cultured parents; her new surroundings, therefore, seem strange to her, but she adjusts her young mind to the poverty around her. She asks what has become of her mother, but meets with various evasive explanations. Margaret is at last reconciled to her mother's mysterious disappearance. Mrs. Kendall, through all the five dreary years, tries in vain to find her child.

Margaret is put to work in Sullivan's sweatshop in an attic to pull bastings for a few cents a day. Margaret is held prisoner in the sweatshop, and though Mrs. McGinnis finds the distracted mother, Mrs. Kendall, she is unable to locate the child, who has escaped from the sweatshop.

The waif becomes known in the slums as "Mag, the Terror of the Alley." When summer comes, she goes with others to the Bible House to be enrolled among those who go to enjoy the delights of a ten days' visit at THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home at Mont-Lawn, Nyack-on-the-Hudson. The visit of "Mag" is described.

Magie then goes to work in a paper bag factory, then at making artificial flowers in a cellar and saves a little money, living meantime with four other girls. She lives through many adventures and comes to know all the sufferings of the poor. She knows superlative nights while fighting the world practically alone; she knows neglect and abuse. A marvelous change for good is wrought in her through her visit to Mont-Lawn—and it is through being traced to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home that she is at last restored to her mother's arms.

CHAPTER I

MARGARET had been home two hours—two hours of breathless questions, answers, tears and laughter—two hours of delighted wandering about the house and grounds.

In the nursery she had seen the little woolly dog that lay on the floor just as she had left it five years before; and out on the veranda steps she had seen the great stone lions that had never quite faded from her memory. And always at her side had walked the sweet-faced lady of her dreams, only now the lady was very real, with eyes that smiled on one so lovingly, and lips and hands that kissed and caressed one so tenderly.

"And this is home—my home?" Margaret asked in unbelieving wonder.

"Yes, dear," answered Mrs. Kendall.

"And you are my mother, and I am Margaret Kendall, your little girl?"

"Yes."

"And the little dog on the floor—that was mine, and—and it's been there ever since?"

"Yes, ever since you left it there long ago. I—I could not bear to have any one move it, or touch it."

"And was I lost then—right then?"

"No, dear. We traveled about for almost a year. You were five when I lost you." Mrs. Kendall's voice shook. Unconsciously she drew Margaret into a closer embrace. Even now she was scarcely sure that it was Margaret—this little maid who had stepped so suddenly out of the great silence that had closed about her four long years before.

Margaret laughed softly, and nestled in the encircling arms.

"I like it—this," she confided shyly. "You see, I—I hain't had it before. Even the dream-lady didn't do—this."

"The dream-lady?"

Margaret hesitated. Her grave eyes were on her mother's face.

"I suppose she was—you," she said then, slowly. "I saw her nights, mostly; of her life. "You see, first I was lost, and Bobby McGinnis found me. Anyhow, Dr. Spencer says he did, but I don't seem to remember. Things was all mixed up. There didn't seem to be anybody that wanted me, but there wouldn't anybody let me go. And they made me sew all the time on things that was big and homely; and then another man took me and made me paste up bags. Say, did you ever paste bags?"

"No, dear." Mrs. Kendall shivered.

tender, new-found mother of hers was grieved; she must be comforted. To the best of her ability, therefore, Margaret promptly proceeded to administer that comfort.

"Pooh! 'twan't nothin'," she asserted stoutly; "besides, I runned away, and then I had a tiptop place—a whole corner of Mis' Whalen's kitchen, and just me and Patty and the twins to stay in it. We divvied up everythin', and some days we had heaps to eat—truly we did—heaps! And I went to Mont-Lawn two times, and of course there I had everythin', even beds with sheets, you know; and—"

"Margaret, Margaret, don't, dear!" interrupted her mother. "I can't bear even to think of it."

Margaret's eyes grew puzzled.

"But that was bang-up—all of it," she protested earnestly. "Why, I didn't paste bags nor sew buttons, and nobody didn't strike me for not doin' 'em, neither; and Mis' Whalen was good and showed me how to make flowers—for pay, too! And—"

"Yes, dear, I know," interposed Mrs. Kendall again; "but suppose we don't think any more of all that, sweetheart. You are home now, darling, right here with mother. Come, we will go out into the garden." To Mrs. Kendall it seemed at the moment that only God's blessed out-of-doors was wide enough and beautiful enough to clear from her eyes the pictures Margaret's words had painted.

Out in the garden Margaret drew a deep breath.

"Oh!" she cooed softly, caressing with her cheek a great red rose. "I knew flowers smelled good, but I didn't find it out for sure till I went to Mont-Lawn that first time. You see, the kind we made was cloth and stiff, and they didn't smell good a mite—oh, you've picked it!" she broke off, half-rapturously, half-regretfully, as Mrs. Kendall placed in her hands the great red rose.

"Yes, pick all you like, dear," smiled Mrs. Kendall, reaching for another flower.

"But they'll die," stammered Margaret, "and then the others won't see them."

"The—others? What others, dear?"

"Why, the other folks that live here, you know, and walk out here, too."

Mrs. Kendall laughed merrily.

"But there aren't any others, dear. The flowers are all ours. No one else lives here."

Margaret stopped short in the garden path and faced her mother.

"What, not any one? in all that big house?"

"Why, no, dear, of course not. There is no one except old Mr. and Mrs. Barrett, who keep the house and grounds in order. We have it all to ourselves."

Margaret was silent. She turned and walked slowly along the path at her mother's side. On her face was a puzzled questioning. To her eyes was gradually coming a frightened doubt.

Alone?—just they two, with the little old man and the little old woman in the kitchen who did not take up any room at all? Why, back in the Alley there were Patty, the twins, and all the Whalens—and they had only one room! It was like that, too, everywhere, all through the Alley—so many, many people, so little room for them. Yet here—here was this great house all windows and doors and soft carpets and pretty pictures, and only but she never stayed, and when I tried to catch her, she—she was just air, and wasn't there at all. And I did want her so bad!"

"Of course you did, sweetheart," choked Mrs. Kendall, tremulously. "And didn't she ever stay? When was it you saw her first?"

Margaret frowned.

"I—don't—seem—to know," she answered. She was thinking of what Dr. Spencer had told her, and of what she herself remembered of those four years

"Well, you don't want to," volunteered Margaret; and to her thin little face came the look that her mother had already seen on it once or twice that afternoon—the look of a child who knows what it means to fight for life itself in the slums of a great city. "They ain't a mite nice—bags ain't; and the paste sticks horrid, and smells."

"Margaret, dearest!—how could you hear it?" shuddered Mrs. Kendall, her eyes brimming with tears.

Margaret saw, and understood. This

FIRST HERALDS OF THE RISEN LORD

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts*

THE story of the resurrection of Jesus in the fourfold Gospel: How the stone was rolled away. Matt. 28: 1-3. Who saw the angel roll the stone away? Matt. 28: 4. The first visitors to the tomb and what they brought. Mark 16: 1. Luke 24: 1. The stone rolled away a surprise to them. Mark 16: 3, 4. Why Mary Magdalene at once left the tomb. John 20: 1, 2. The other women searching for the body of Jesus in the sepulchre. Luke 24: 3. They were frightened by the appearance of the angels. Luke 24: 4, 5. The words of assurance spoken by an angel. Luke 24: 5, 7. Why the women left the tomb at once. Matt. 28: 8. Peter and John come to the tomb (having been told by Mary Magdalene about the resurrection of Jesus). John 20: 2-10. Mary stood alone at the tomb weeping. John 20: 11. Two angels appeared and she talked with them. John 20: 12, 13. She heard a voice behind her and spoke to the supposed gardener. John 20: 14, 15. It was Jesus himself whom Mary saw. John 20: 16, 17. Whom Mary first told about Jesus appearing to her and speaking to her. Mark 16: 10. Why the disciples mourned and wept even after Mary had told them that she had seen Jesus alive. Mark 16: 11. The women who were on their way to the disciples met by Jesus. Matt. 28: 9. The message which Jesus sent to his disciples by the women. Matt. 28: 10.

Woman's Share in the Resurrection

This part of the resurrection story has particularly to do with woman's share in it. Jesus placed great honor upon women by making them, next to the angels, the first heralds of his resurrection. Wherever the Gospel is preached, women are honored, and their kind deeds done "In His Name" are accepted. They are seldom ordained to formal office in the churches, but they constitute two-thirds of its membership, and do more than two-thirds of its work: last at the Cross, and first at the tomb, they have been testifying of the life of Christ ever since. Only in heathen lands is the ban on women. A young woman was sent from the United States to Korea to teach the women there to read the Bible. But the poor things said, "We haven't sense enough to learn how to read." The missionary reasoned with them by saying: "You have sense enough to cook your husband's food, sense enough to wash and iron his beautiful white coats, and I am sure you have sense enough to learn to read." And so they were encouraged to try. Of course they learned how to read, and to read the Bible, hundreds of them, and then they became Christians, and had names given to them. Strange, they never had names before! Only recently, an interesting Korean girl was brought by a missionary to a lady visiting Korea, saying: "Do you not think it a pity that such a girl as this has no name?" "Give her my name," said the lady, and she was named "Lucy Broad." It was Jesus who called a woman by her name "Mary" in those first solemn and sacred moments after his resurrection. And the woman he called so had been a most unfortunate one, if not wicked, for out of her Jesus had cast seven devils and had redeemed her.

An Uplift to Womanhood

Christianity is lifting the ban that is on women in other lands. Particularly is this so in China, where girls' schools are really becoming so popular that the Chinese people themselves are establishing them, patterning them after the missionary schools. A distinguished Chinese official desired to secure a missionary's daughter to instruct his three daughters in English ways and learning. Miss Janet Reese, only seventeen years of age, was offered the position and accepted it. Almost at once, the great viceroy, Yuan Shi Kai, made application for the services of Miss Reese to teach his five daughters. For three years she continued to teach in Mr. Tong's home in the morning, and in Yuan Shi Kai's yamen in the afternoon, with the result that the education of women grew into such high estimation that colleges, normal training schools, etc., were opened by Yuan Shi Kai and others, and to-day these circles of influence are ever widening. In Canton there is the "True Light School" for girls, which has been in operation over forty years, carried on by two devoted American missionaries. In that school many of the girls commit to memory the whole of the New Testament. Let not the statement be challenged; it is true, and as wonderful as it is true. In that same city of Canton are intelligent, well-educated Chinese girls studying medicine under missionary teachers; some of them have already become proficient in practice. This would not have been possible had not the Christ they have learned to serve and love come to heal the lame and sick, and open the eyes of the blind.

And in Japan the ban is being taken off woman; the factory girls, so weak and sinful under Confucianism and Buddhism, are being led to lead pure Christian lives. Girls' schools, under missionary training, are widespread in their influence. We saw one group of Japanese women being prepared for pastors' assistants by two American lady missionaries. The course they were being given would compare favorably with courses given in the United States to theological students.

Jesus did not make a special beatitude for women when he was on earth, but he certainly meant that women should have a share in all the blessedness of help, those who needed to be helped.

God made the world for women, too:
Its singing birds, its fragrant flowers,
Its lofty peaks and skies of blue
Our Father made, and they are ours.

The Saviour died for women, too:
About the Cross in every land,
They gather with their sin and woe,
And lay them in his pierced hand.

There's Christian work for women, too:
First heralds of their risen Lord,
Great host of loyal hearts and true,
They still proclaim the saving word.

(This poem was written by the Rev. Wilbur F. Crafts after an address given by Mrs. Crafts to a company of several hundred women in Sendai, Japan, on the theme of what Christianity has done and can do for women.)

On one occasion a class of students about to graduate in the Sorbonne Paris were asked by their teacher, "What person who had ever lived in the world they would like best to be?" There was only one woman in the class of one hundred and thirty-seven students, and that was Miss Sevasti N. Kallespere of Athens, Greece. She did not reply until urged by the teacher, and then with tearful earnestness said, "The Virgin Mary." We recall the word of the angel who at the Annunciation said to Mary: "Blessed art thou among women," and should we not therefore hold her in highest esteem and greatest love, but without worshiping her, calling upon her in prayer as we call upon God; we have no authority in the Bible for doing this. But we have much to learn from the obedience of Jesus to his mother when he was a boy, and of his tender love for her when in his dying moments he commended her to the loving care of John, as to a son. Jesus in all his relations to his mother set a seal upon the sacredness of motherhood, and the seal of honor upon womanhood.

How Christ Dignified Woman

In his administrations while on earth he passed not by women. One of his first miracles was the healing of Peter's wife's mother of a fever; the widow's son was the first one called from death to life, and the second miracle of the kind was the raising of the little daughter of Jairus. He gave health to the sick woman who touched the fringe of his garment. He restored health to the little daughter of the Canaanite woman who came to him beseeching. He cured the woman sick of an infirmity for eighteen years. He taught Mary while she sat at his feet. He cast seven devils out of Mary Magdalene. He forgave the sinful woman at whom men were pointing the finger of scorn. He commended the widow, who made an offering of two mites in the temple. He showed his appreciation of the anointing by the woman who loved much because much had been forgiven her. He commended the act of Mary in anointing him for his burial. He spoke words of consolation to the weeping women who followed him to Calvary.

Oh, let me know
The power of Thy resurrection!
Oh, let me show
Thy risen life in calm and clear reflection!
Oh, let me give
Out of the gifts thou freely givest!
Oh, let me live
With life abundantly because thou livest!
FRANCES RIDLEY HAVERGAL.

Reginald loved stories and was all attention. "I was told," said Mrs. Grant-ham, "that after the great fire of London Sir Christopher Wren was called to rebuild St. Paul's Cathedral, which had been destroyed. Before he began his great task, he called a workman, and told him to fetch from the heap of rubbish left by the fire a stone with which he could mark the centre for his new dome. The workman quickly sought and brought the first stone to hand from among the pile of debris. Sir Christopher Wren took it, and scrutinizing it carefully and closely found carved on it the one word 'Resurgam'—'I shall rise again.' And from and about this stone he rebuilt the mighty edifice of St. Paul's Cathedral. And so I think, Reginald," concluded Mrs. Grant-ham, "we may claim from the great Master Builder, Christ, the 'white stone' engraved with the one word 'Jesus,' which shall be our foundation stone."

IN THE BUDDING SPRINGTIME

Folk-Lore and Superstition

By Margaret E. Sangster

WHEN the new moon, a faint crescent, appears in the sky, nine people out of ten prefer to catch the first glimpse of it over the right shoulder, making a wish that they hope will come true. In a hill country of New England I have seen a woman half in jest and half in earnest bow nine times to the new moon, thus invoking good fortune for the season. Few of us remember that this homage to the moon carries us far back into the world's history when the Phœnicians and other Eastern peoples worshiped Astarte. Credulity dies hard. Superstition, pre-eminently the distinction of primitive nations, reaches downward to the beginnings of the race and belongs to the period when the stars in their courses, the sun, the moon and the tides, the wild winds and the surging waves either held men in terror or gave them encouragement to go forward with their enterprises. We need not necessarily regard the desert and mountain children of the past as greatly inferior to ourselves, for some magnificent remnants of their work abide to this day, found in excavations, in ruins and in the pyramids. Although we dwell in the meridian light of applied science and have ceased to marvel at any new possibility of electricity, there are thousands of us who are frankly in bondage to some ancient superstition or other. We do not like to give or receive a knife because it may cut friendship. We prefer not to walk under a ladder, to rock an empty chair or an empty cradle, to sit thirteen at a table or to open an umbrella indoors. We dislike to dream of cats, as when dreamed of these familiar domestic pets signify enemies lurking in ambush. Children who have been left to the care of servants, white or black, are often imbued with superstition in the nursery, and grow up believing this or that and shrinking from this or the other, hardly knowing whence the vague imagery of superstition came from. The opposition to thirteen at the table dates to the Last Supper, where Jesus sat with the twelve, one of whom went forth from the feast to betray his Lord. When a friend apologizes for offering you his hand with a glove upon it, there is a harking back to the middle ages, when a man offered his naked hand in token that it held no unfriendly weapon. Dreams are like mists of the morning. Those who believe in them either as forecasts of good or evil, are allied with the majority in every land and clime who have a certain dread of ghosts and apparitions, who do not care to pass a cemetery after dark, and who affirm with Whitcomb Riley that "the goblins will catch you if you don't watch out."

So long as we confine superstition to the realm of poetry where it properly belongs, it will do us little harm. It is only when it serves to fetter the mind and hamper action that it becomes absurd and uncanny. To walk in fear of anything is to fall into slavery. Non-Christian nations see demons in earth, air and sky, but we who believe in Christ should walk in the light, with clear vision, knowing no perturbation. We are ourselves supernatural beings, and we have a right to believe that we are often helped by invisible agencies, but these are ministers of the kingdom of heaven, and bring good gifts; they are not the emissaries of Satan or of darkness.

As an intellectual study nothing is more interesting than psychic research restricted to imagination's realm. This is not to be confused with superstition. Rather it is scientific. It is a little curious in this connection to observe the similarity in certain stories that belong to the literature of the world. In the Scriptural narrative of Jephtha, the valiant captain who successfully led the children of Israel in a brilliant foray against the children of Ammon, we find that Jephtha made a vow unto the Lord that whatever first came to meet him from his own house on his victorious return should be offered in sacrifice to Jehovah. With consternation and dismay and a father's broken heart, Jephtha found himself met by his darling and pride, his beautiful young daughter.

The story in the Judges is touchingly told. The daughter, having no choice but to yield to her father's rash vow, asked a little respite and was allowed two months, after which the Biblical chronicler tells us her father did unto her according to his word. Thenceforward, for hundreds of years, the daughters of Israel kept an annual lamentation in memory of this ill-fated girl.

In Grecian mythology the story of Iphigenia, daughter of Agamemnon, has some features that are suggestive of the Biblical story. In a book recently published, China in Legend and Story, by C. Campbell Brown, we find a bit of tradition in the same line. Ages ago, a certain builder had been charged with the erection of a beautiful city. Houses, temples and paved streets were

A STREET SINGER IN OLD NEW YORK

Were simple ways, and simple pleasures, too;

The singer and the song would hard hearts melt,

at last complete, but the gods demanded a sacrifice. The builder could not leave his work until a young and spotless maiden had voluntarily sacrificed herself to propitiate the deities who presided over the destinies of men.

The maiden, reared in Oriental seclusion, was to walk in the sight of the populace utterly naked, and in their sight to perform the usual rites in the temple of the gods. She was then to await her doom. Weeks passed, and no one could be found who was willing to endure the personal ignominy of such a sacrifice. Finally the builder's own daughter presented herself, and when the trial was over threw herself from the battlements of the wall down a deep precipice, and was instantly killed. Thenceforward, the inhabitants felt that their city was safe, and thenceforward, too, the girl was remembered and mourned as one who had done a magnificent deed. This story in turn reminds the reader of that of Lady Godiva of early English fame.

In the study of folk-lore and superstition, as well as in following out the familiar history of different peoples, we are more and more forced to the conclusion that there is nothing new under the sun, and that in successive centuries the same tunes with variations are played on the doorsteps of the world.

More about Latch-Keys

AN MANLY boy may be trusted with a latch-key. How shall we define a manly boy? He is one who has nothing to conceal from his parents, who is open and honest about everything, and who considers his mother his best friend. From babyhood this boy has been trusted. His father and mother were not on the watch to discover him in telling untruths. They set him an example of perfect candor and simple truthfulness, and he grew up in a friendly atmosphere in which lies did not flourish. The manly boy has always brought his companions to his home with entire freedom, in deference only to his mother's convenience, and when he goes out after supper to visit a chum, call on a girl friend, attend a boy's club, or keep any other engagement, his father can pretty well gauge where he is going, and would know how to find him were there sudden necessity. This lad is not a cigarette fiend. If he were he would not be manly. No baleful habit strikes at the root of manliness with such fatal certainty as cigarette smoking in boyhood. The boy is as yet inexperienced and crude in some directions, and at times he is conceited and aggressive, as boys are apt to be when first the tides of youth are setting strongly toward maturity, but he is a responsible person. He scorns anything furtive, and he may safely be given a latch-key. Very likely his mother does not go to sleep until she hears that latch-key turn in the front door. She goes to bed and has little excursions into drowsiness and naps from which she easily awakens, but when that well-known step rings on the pavement and the boy runs up the steps, opens the door and closes it softly, and turns out the light in the front hall, saying tenderly "Good-night, mother," as he passes her room, she settles down into a blissful night's rest.

The father has always had good times with his boy, but there are better times coming, times when they will discuss politics together and walk to the polls in company; times when the relation between them shall be more like that of brothers than of father and son.

The question of the latch-key is to some extent a question of locality. There are still neighborhoods where people retire for the night without locking and barring their doors. These places are every year receding farther and farther from thickly populated towns. Doors and windows must be safely closed against those who have no right to enter them, and the latch-key becomes a convenience for those who have errands outside the house in the evening. Most of us can remember how conscience-stricken we have felt when, dwelling under a roof inimical to latch-keys, we have been obliged to make some one sit up for us until a late hour, or have been compelled to arouse the household from slumber when coming home by a midnight train.

A boy who after the age of fifteen is without a sentiment of honor, and who is heedless and irresponsible then, is in great peril of making shipwreck on the reefs and shoals that beset young manhood. To reach that goal unstained, with a clean, wholesome body and a good physical basis, with a strong, fearless mind and a brave outlook to the future, is a splendid consummation in a boy's education. Many more boys are ruined by harshness and nagging than rigid parents understand. Plant the good seed early, and let the sunshine of love aid in its development. Trust the boy and he will not betray the trust.

Aunt Prudence Payson's Catch-All

—T. Your question, if I understand it, is whether or not you can safely consent to marry a man who is leading a Christian life, but who in early youth committed a sin, of which he long ago repented. If you love him why should you sit in judgment upon him. The question is for your own decision. An honorable life in the present, continuing years of well-doing, should, I think, make up for you for the past. It all depends on how much you love him.

ONE BRAVE WOMAN'S LIFE-WORK

How Evangelist Moody's Protege Founded a Settlement and Is Now Reaching Five Hundred Lives

"MR. SANKEY, tell this young lady about the beauties of Northfield. I want her to go up there to school," said the great evangelist Moody, as he waved his hand toward a chair. The previous day, my sister and I had attended one of his large gatherings, and after the meeting had talked with him. I had broken down a bit while she was telling him of the old home which we were about to lose. Suddenly, Mr. Moody, after looking at me intently, said, "How would you like to go to my school? I want you to go to Northfield, where there are about five hundred girls. Come to-morrow morning and see me at the hotel."

Then Mr. Sankey told of the beauties of that lovely spot, how the Connecticut River formed the letter "S" in front of the campus, and laughingly said that it was a positive indication to his mind that it was always intended a seminary should be there.

I still hesitated, remembering my mother's dying request to me to be with my father in his old age. But when Mr. Moody decided on a plan, obstacles had to yield. I was dismissed with, "Tell your father to come and see me to-morrow morning."

So the next morning father went, with the result that in less than three weeks I reached Northfield and was driven through the snow to the school, where I spent six of the happiest years of my life: studying through the school year, and working each summer during the conference season.

Well, I remember, at the close of my second year's stay at the seminary, a little incident arose which Mr. Moody felt I had not understood. In his great-heartedness he said to his wife that he must make it plain to me ere he slept that night. He then told me that he had been watching my progress without my knowledge (a thing he always did with those students to whom he had personally given these advantages), that my life had fitted in as he had thought it would, and that he felt God had a large work in the future for me to do. We had driven out at dusk. On our way home he stopped his horse, took off his hat, and as we both bowed our heads under the starry sky he dedicated my life to God, asking a blessing on me, his adopted daughter in Christ. Had there been no other influence in my life, that evening alone would have urged me to live for the service of others.

After my graduation, that study and work had so told on my health that I had to take months for complete rest. But the door was opened to me at last. Mr. and Mrs. C. R. Otis, of Yonkers, N. Y., who were close friends of Mr. Moody, told me that if I cared to do Christian work in my native city, they would look after my living expenses. This, as they intended, made it possible for me not only to enter the work for which I longed, but also to take up the charge laid on me by my mother.

Six years ago the fifth of last October, I opened the People's Settlement, of Wilmington, Delaware, in one room, with but seven girls. The first question that confronted me was how to meet expenses; for I had started with little encouragement and no active sympathy or help from friend or stranger. But I felt that the Lord wanted me, and that if persistence, hard work and, above all, prayer, could make a thing succeed, this would go. So I began—at first by visiting churches and presenting my work before organizations which the pastors thought would respond to the call for funds. It was a long, lonely, up-hill struggle, seasoned with many rebuffs, but finally enough was gained to give the work an impetus.

At that time I learned of a business man of wealth in Philadelphia who gave twenty cents out of every dollar he earned to the Lord's work. I determined to see him. After telling him of the Settlement's needs, I was utterly amazed to hear him say, "Miss Pyle, I am intensely interested, because when a boy of twelve I, too, lived in Wilmington. My parents at that time lost everything, and I, in working for a tailor, often had to carry goods to that section of the city; many times, I thought, at the jeopardy of my own life. Now how about ten dollars a month?" The following year he sent for me, saying that he had been quietly watching the work, that it was growing so fast he felt the burden too great for one person to carry, and he urged its organization and incorporation, closing with, "As soon as you get that done, Miss Pyle, come and see me." In less than three weeks, all was completed, and the chief justice of the State, a strong Christian character, became our president. I presented myself at Mr. J.'s office, and have scarcely yet recovered from the surprise when he handed me a thousand-dollar gold bond toward a new building fund! The work had reached its first mile-stone toward real success.

After I had opened the Girls' Club, the neighbors warned me to let the boys alone, as the previous year, two young men who tried to do some work with them were pelted with missiles. But those boys were just the ones I wanted, and as I opened the door to their knock, twenty-two little unkempt, unwashed urchins came tumbling into the room. They soon wore out the patience of two volunteer men workers, who claimed that no possible good could come out of "that clan." But the boys and I became close comrades. Often, at first, it was impossible to hear myself speak at their meetings; many times there were black eyes to be bandaged, regular fist fights to settle, and cheating at games to straighten out; but we held together, and finally the lads decided to brace up and be clean, honest boys. A captain came to drill them. Then uniforms had to be procured; home-made ones, to be sure, but they were all the more appreciated. An interested minister gave a stereopticon lecture: five-cent tickets were issued, and the lads cleared over twenty-eight dollars toward uniforms. At our ten-cent entertainment the following June, the boys drilled beautifully before several hundred proud relatives and friends. But none was quite so proud of them as I.

Miss Sarah Pyle

To show their appreciation, some time later they presented me with a picture. It was a great occasion for the little fellows, and as their president mounted the table he said, "Miss Pyle, we gives yer this picture to tell yer we're glad ye're not thin-skinned, but stuck to us. We got this (proudly holding the gift before the crowd) without none of the older folks jabbin' in, an' we want say that when ye get old and gray we fellers are goin' ter pitch in an' look after yer." One little fellow in the rear, evidently feeling that the emotion which momentarily sealed my lips bespoke lack of appreciation, elbowed his way to me, saying, "Miss Pyle, that 'ere picture cost an awful lot. Why, we almost give two an' a half fer it!" Immediately, he received a thrust from the leader. I thought, as I gazed into their eager faces, "Bless their hearts! They little realize how much I appreciate the gift." For many of the lads work hard selling papers, and could ill afford to spare a penny so royally given. To this day, the majority the boys have clung to us. Splendid manly fellows they are, a bulwark of strength and protection to the Settlement. Has it paid? The untold patience required, the strength and time given? I answer most emphatically a thousand times, yes!

A few months afterward we extended our working quarters from one room to include the whole house. It was a deplorable six-roomed place. I remember our first supper, during a severe storm, the rain came pouring through several generous leaks in the ceiling. We closed the house that night singing, "There shall be showers of blessing," to the measured tattoo of the dripping rain, as it was caught in the pots and kettles. We had great sport that winter making ourselves weather-proof.

Four years ago, we opened our first fresh-air camp in Jersey. It proved to be such a haven of rest to tired mothers and little children, that it has become a part of our work. The fresh air and delights of nature have touched some of those boys who needed them most, and opened up a new world. The expense has been met in various and unique ways. Boys have been able to earn their own outing, and sometimes have added to the funds of the Settlement.

For some time, a set of young men has been coming to the Settlement who used to frequent the corner saloon. Three years ago the saloonkeeper sent for the leader of the gang to ask the reason of their absence. The youth thrust his hands in his pockets, jingled the coin there, and said, "Do you hear that, Mr. M.? One year ago you got all our money, and none of us had such respectable clothes (pointing to his suit). No sir! We've got a better place to go to now, and that's the Settlement." It was not the saloonkeeper's last effort however. On Christmas Eve he sent for the boys, offering them as much whisky as they cared to drink, and more to carry home. But they were loyal, and after courteously refusing, came tooting their horns to the Settlement, where they helped trim the tree for our little ones. That was the best Christmas gift I had ever received, and my heart beat with a great, deep joy as they told me of the victory.

It is not easy to tell of the ways in which we go into the homes. One day, Mrs. Y. came rushing into my room like a creature gone mad, crying, "Oh, Miss Pyle, my husband's left the city! The police can't find him nowhere, and when I thought of the way he's treated me, with his drinking and our six little children to do for, I just felt I couldn't stand it. I put the bottle of laudanum to my mouth, and then, of a sudden, I thought of the God you'd been telling us about in Bible class; an' so I just come to you. Oh, for God's sake help me!"

I spent hours in talk with her, and it was a long struggle, but at the end was faith and peace. We helped her in many ways, procured work for her, and finally brought back her husband. They came to see me. It was a memorable meeting. He broke down and confessed that he had a praying mother, and after we had all prayed together he said, "I never seen such a change in any one as in my wife. With God's help I'll be a better man." I felt then that the little room was truly consecrated to God's service, so many wonderful things have transpired there.

Thus we touch life on different sides. The past six years have been full of active service and have been full of blessedness for the workers and myself. Truly God has been with us and prospered us beyond expectations. To-day, aside from three house residents, two of whom are Northfield girls, there are forty volunteer workers who cheerfully give their service a portion of each week. We have fifteen clubs where boys and girls, men and women, meet to learn basketry, iron work, sewing, parliamentary law, etc. There is children's vespers service, young women's Bible class, young men's Bible class, kindergarten, savings bank system, library, mothers' meeting, Penny-a-day Society, boys' brigade, Anti-Tobacco League. In all, we are touching about 500 lives each week. We need sadly our own gymnasium and manual training room, especially for our boys; a cooking school for our little housekeepers; larger kindergarten space and a dispensary. We have no fear of failure, for all things are possible with God, and this is his work. He will speak to his children and they will help us. Doubtless we shall soon break the ground for our building. Every penny counts and will be gratefully received.

vo, three, four people to enjoy it all. Why had not her mother asked— Even to herself Margaret could not say the words. She shut her lips tight, and threw a hurried look into the face of the woman at her side. This dear seam-lady, this beautiful new mother— if there could be any question of her goodness and kindness! Very likely, anyway, there were not any poor— Margaret's eyes cleared suddenly. She turned a radiant face on her mother. "Oh, I know," she cried in triumph. "There ain't any poor folks here, and so you couldn't do it!"

Mrs. Kendall looked puzzled. "Poor folks? 'Couldn't do it?'" she questioned. "Yes; poor folks like Patty and the Whalens; and so you couldn't ask 'em to live with you."

Mrs. Kendall sat down abruptly. Near her was a garden settee. She felt particularly glad of its support just then.

"And of course you didn't know about the Whalens and Patty," went on Margaret, eagerly, "and so you couldn't ask 'em, neither. But you do now, and they'd just love to come, I know!"

"Love to—come?" stammered Mrs. Kendall, gazing blankly into the glowing young face before her.

"Of course they would!" nodded Margaret, dancing up and down and clapping her hands. "Wouldn't you if you didn't have nothin' but a room right down under the sidewalk, and there was such a heap of folks in it? Why, there's everythin'—everythin' for 'em, and oh, I'm so glad, 'cause they was good to me—so good! First Mis' Whalen took in Patty and the twins when the tent man dumped 'em out on the sidewalk, and she gave 'em a whole corner of her kitchen. And then when I runned away from the bag-pasting, Patty and the twins took me in. And now I can pay 'em back for it all—I can pay 'em back. I'm so glad!"

Mrs. Kendall fell back limply against the garden seat. Twice she opened her lips—and closed them again. Her face flushed, then paled, and her hands grew cold in her lap.

This dancing little maid with the sun-kissed hair and the astounding proposition to adopt into their home two whole families from the slums of New York, was Margaret, her own little Margaret, lost so long ago, and now so miraculously restored to her. As if she could refuse any request, however wild, from Margaret! But this—!

"But, sweetheart, perhaps they—they couldn't want to go away forever and leave their home," she remonstrated at last, feebly.

The child frowned, her finger to her lips.

"Well, anyhow, we can ask 'em," she declared, after a minute, her face clearing.

"Suppose we—we make it a visit, first," suggested Mrs. Kendall, feverishly. "By and by, after I've had you all to myself for a little while, you shall ask them to visit you."

"Oh, bully!" agreed Margaret in swift delight. "That will be nicest; won't it? Then they can see how they like it—but here! they'll like it all right. They couldn't help it."

"And how—how many are there?" questioned Mrs. Kendall, moistening her dry lips, and feeling profoundly thankful for even this respite from the proposed wholesale adoption.

"Why, let's see." Margaret held up her fingers and checked off her prospective guests. "There's Patty, she's the eldest, and Arabella and Clarabella—they're the twins, and they're my age, you know, that's the Murphys. And then there's all the Whalens: Tom, Peter, Mary, Jamie, and—oh, I dunno, six or eight, maybe, with Mis' Whalen and her husband. But, after all, it don't make so very much difference just how many there are; does it?" she added, with a happy little skip and jump, "'cause there's heaps of room here for any 'mount of 'em. And I never can remember just how many there are without forgettin' some of 'em. You—you don't mind if I don't name 'em all—now?" And she gazed anxiously into her mother's face.

"No, dear, no," assured Mrs. Kendall hurriedly. "You—you have named quite enough. And now we'll go down to the brook. We haven't seen half of Five Oaks yet." And once more she tried to make the joyous present drive from her daughter's thoughts the grievous past.

CHAPTER II

IT was not long before all Houghtonsville knew the story, and there was not a man, woman or child in the town that did not take the liveliest interest in the little maid at Five Oaks who had passed through so amazing an experience. To be lost at five years of age in a great city, to be snatched from wealth, happiness and a loving mother's arms, only to be thrust instantly into poverty, misery and loneliness; and then to be, after four long years, suddenly returned—no wonder Houghtonsville held its breath and questioned if it all indeed were true.

Bit by bit the little girl's history was related in every house in town; and many a woman—and some men—wept over the tale of how the little fingers had sewed on buttons in the attic sweat shop, and pasted bags in the ill-smelling cellar. The story of the co-operative housekeeping establishment in one corner of the basement kitchen, where she, together with Patty and the twins, "divvied up" the day's "haul"—that, too, came in for its share of exclamatory adjectives, as did the account of how she was finally discovered through her finding her own name over the little cot bed at Mont-Lawn—the little bed that Mrs. Kendall had endowed in the name of her lost daughter in the children's vacation home for the poor little waifs from the city.

"An' ter think of her findin' her own baby jest by givin' some other woman's baby a bit of joy!" cried Mrs. Merton, of the old red farmhouse, when the story was told to her. "But there! ain't that what she's always doin' for folks—some-thing ter make 'em happy? Didn't she bring my own child, Sadie, an' the boy, Bobby, back from the city, and ain't Sadie gettin' well an' strong on the farm here? And it's a comfort ter me, too, when I remember 'twas Bobby who first found the little Margaret cryin' in the streets there in New York, an' took her home ter my Sadie. 'Twan't much Sadie could do for the poor little lamb, but she did what she could till old Sullivan got his claws on her and kept her shut up out o' sight. But there! what's past is past, and there ain't no use frettin' over it. She's home now, in her own mother's arms, and I'm thinkin' it's the whole town that's rejoicin'!"

And the whole town did rejoice—and many and various were the ways the townspeople took to show it. The Houghtonsville brass band marched in full uniform to Five Oaks one evening and gave a serenade with red fire and rockets, much to Mrs. Kendall's embarrassment and Margaret's delight. The Ladies' Aid Society gave a tea with Mrs. Kendall and Margaret as a kind of pivot around which the entire affair revolved—this time to the embarrassment of both Mrs. Kendall and her daughter. The minister of the Methodist Church appointed a day of prayer and thanksgiving in commemoration of the home-coming of the wanderer; and the town poet published in the Houghtonsville Banner a forty-eight line poem on "The Lost and Found."

Nor was this all. To Mrs. Kendall it seemed that almost every man, woman and child in the place came to her door with inquiries and congratulations, together with all sorts of offerings from flowers and frosted cakes to tidies and worked bedspreads. She was not ungrateful, certainly—but she was overwhelmed.

For baby's bath, there is nothing quite so good as Ivory Soap.

Made of pure vegetable oils and containing no "free" alkali, it will cleanse, but it will not harm, the most delicate skin.

Most women know this. They use ordinary soaps for ordinary purposes. But, for the bath, toilet and nursery, where purity is all-important, their preference is for Ivory.

Write for a copy of our booklet, "How to Bring Up a Baby." It contains 40 pages of valuable information about the Care of Children. Every phase of the subject is covered—Food, Sleep, Dress, Cleanliness, Ventilation, the Care of the Eyes, Ears, Nose, Teeth, Hair and Nails. Full of helpful suggestions and sound advice. Best Earth on Earth is NEW YORK CITY REAL ESTATE!

WE own 30,000 lots in New York City, bought three to ten years ago. Two years ago we quit selling in Brooklyn until tunnels and bridges were complete. Tunnel now running—Elevated Railroad starts next month on Williams Bridge—crush on Brooklyn Bridge thing of the past—Manhattan Bridge nearing completion, and we are again in the field with all our forces and resources. The foremost real estate concern in this country will, next fall, begin a campaign of publicity which will startle the world—at the attractiveness of its terms and prices. In the meantime we should be glad to secure the right kind of a representative in each community. We don't want "out-of-work." We want men of high standing, who will thoroughly investigate and whose word carries weight in their own community. Such men can, like our Mr. Z. M. P. Inge, Trustee, of Mobile, Ala., and Rev. R. Rock, of Troy, N.Y., make from $10,000 to $25,000 per year for themselves, and more for their clients. Those who can give only part time make especially successful agents. ADDRESS IMMEDIATELY:

The Nation's Drink Bill*

WILLIAM HARGREAVES, M.D., of Philadelphia, author of Worse than Wasted, estimated the drink bill of the United States for 1900 at $1,465,000,000. He explains his method of computation; says he has made these estimates for twenty years, and that they have never been questioned; that he has laid them before gaugers of the revenue department, before ex-saloonkeepers, and other persons capable of judging, and they agree that his estimates are as nearly correct as it is possible to make them. He insists that his figures are conservative, below rather than above the actual cost. We will take only $1,200,000,000 here, for purposes of comparison. This is probably on the safe side.

We will now place an object or two in the foreground that we may better judge of distance and size. The public school system of our land, that best exponent of democracy and greatest factor in our national assimilation,—for every dollar that the American citizen pays in taxes for public education ($200,000,000), he pays not less than six for liquor. Again, the United States of America, a country vast in extent, first in resources, great in achievement, liberal in expenditure, a world power—the total expenditures of this great nation for one year ($593,000,000 for the year ending June 30, 1902), covering the legislative, executive and judicial branches; including the army, the navy, Indians, pensions, post-office, interest on public debt, and every other last item and source of expense; these liberal expenditures of a liberal government, which the citizens do not always contribute without grumbling, amount to just about one-half of what the same people pay out, in a like period, for strong drink. Subtracting, now, the $300,000,000 which the liquor trade pays back to the people, and we have an absolute waste, or loss, of $900,000,000 and upwards; one billion dollars, approximately.

Let it not be forgotten that this vast sum represents, at its best, an annual waste and loss. That the money is not sunk into the ocean, but is all kept in the country, does not make it one whit less a waste and loss. The expenditure has brought no returns. It is as if this country should engage half a million skilled workmen, set them at making pianos and fine furniture, having them furnish their own materials, and pay them an average of two thousand dollars a year for every man; then give orders that each night the entire finished product of that day's work shall be burned up. The money paid for this work all stays in the country, but it brings no return. It represents destroyed wealth.

The United States could better afford to support a standing army of a million men, gathering up all the unemployed and relieving every overcrowded business and profession, and pay each man an average of a thousand dollars a year, having him out of this sum furnish his own board, clothes and ammunition,—could better afford to support this body of men, and keep them shooting at targets, than it can afford to pay a similar sum to a nearly similar number who now spend their time and labor at making and selling liquor. Each eats up the same amount of wealth of others' toil; neither gives anything in return; with this much in favor of the army—it would at least leave its supporters sober, probably very sober. This country could better afford to support in absolute idleness, as lords and gentlemen, the 200,000 men who run retail liquor establishments in our land, paying them $5,000 a year each, the salary of a United States Senator, than it can afford to pay the same sum to these same men, as it now does, for selling strong drink.

*From A Century of Drink Reform in the United States, by August F. Fehlandt, pp. 422, cloth binding; price, $1. Eaton & Mains, New York, and Jennings & Graham, Cincinnati, publishers.

Out of the money now spent for liquor, our Government could buy out, every twelvemonth, the entire wine, spirit and malt liquor industry of the country, using land and buildings for the benefit of the people, and have a number of millions left besides.

A Widely Read History

THERE is probably no history, since the making of books began, that has been so widely disseminated or has found so many readers among all classes and conditions of men in many countries, as Ridpath's History of the World.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has made inquiries and finds that this wonderfully comprehensive history is receiving every year wider appreciation. It has been placed in hundreds of colleges and libraries in the United States. Complete sets of the work have been sent to delighted purchasers in nearly every civilized country on the face of the earth. Sets have gone to Egypt, to China, to Siberia; a number are in the hands of missionaries in India, and many sets have gone to individual subscribers in Paris and in Liverpool, while numbers have found their way to Australia, to Samoa, and to many islands of the sea.

It is in American homes, however, that Ridpath's History finds its warmest welcome and highest appreciation. This great work was more especially written for the occupants of these homes than for the professional literary man. It is a history for the common people, and one which readers of all classes can thoroughly understand, appreciate and enjoy.

Dr. Ridpath was a born historian. A letter received lately from one of his old teachers says: "Dr. Ridpath had the most wonderful memory for historical facts I have ever known. He never forgot anything that he ever read or heard pertaining to history. When a boy, he once made inquiry for a history of the world and was unable to find one. He wrote to the President of Harvard to refer him to such a work, and received a letter stating there was no such work. This was the inception of his idea for writing the History of the World. Dr. Ridpath determined then and there to devote his life to the preparation of such a work."

The entire publication of this famous History of the World is clean, wholesome and true, from lid to lid. It is a great, comprehensive work, the reading of which "maketh a full man" as far as history, biography, science, exploration and many other branches are concerned, and the diligent study of which, as has been aptly remarked, "is equivalent to a liberal education." Many readers of this journal who have secured sets, esteem them among their most highly valued possessions. In many cases they have formed the substantial nucleus of a home library, and are a never-failing source of entertainment and instruction to old and young.

Dr. Ridpath, it may be mentioned here, was a duly ordained minister of the Gospel. All his literary work, but more especially his masterpiece, the History of the World, has an influence in the homes of the community and the nation for righteousness and for Christianity.

TRINITY'S NEW RECTOR

THE richest church parish in the country, Trinity, has for its new leader the Rev. Dr. William T. Manning, successor to Rev. Dr. Morgan Dix. Dr. Manning was in direct line for this promotion, having been assistant rector of Trinity for the last four years. He was elected to his new post by the unanimous vote of the seventeen members of the vestry, who attended the special meeting held for the purpose. The meeting at which Dr. Manning was elected for one of the most important church posts in America, lasted only twelve minutes, Dr. Manning having no rival in the field. The unique ceremony of "delivering the keys" to Dr. Manning was identical with that used at the induction of the first rector of Trinity, Dr. Ford Compton, in 1696, and has been adhered to ever since. Vestrymen and members of the congregation marched in procession through the churchyard to the main door of the church. The door was locked and the key left in it. The senior warden, in appropriate speech, presented Dr. Manning with the key. The new rector then turned the key, opened the door and led the way up the aisle through the darkened church to the altar, where a prayer was offered to conclude the ceremony.

Dr. Manning was also vicar of St. Agnes' Chapel, in Trinity Parish. He was born in England forty years ago. He was graduated from the University of the South, at Sewanee, Tenn., and holds degrees from other Southern colleges. Ordained in 1891, he was appointed rector of Trinity Church at Redlands, Calif., in 1892; of St. John's Church at Landsdowne, Tenn., in 1896; and of Christ Church, Nashville, in 1898, which post he held till called to New York to join the Trinity forces.

Rev. Dr. William T. Manning

A SOUL AWAKENED IN PRISON

MANY a romance comes to the notice of Christian workers who are interested in the salvation of prisoners behind the bars. One instance showing many strange providences has recently come to the writer's attention:

In the cárcel (prison) at Havana, Cuba, is confined the son of a clergyman of the Church of England. He received a good education, and after taking his B. A. degree, studied medicine and became an army surgeon. Being of a nervous nature, however, he gave it up after four years, entered Episcopal orders and was ordained by the late Bishop of London. For some years he exercised this vocation, but becoming dissatisfied with the church, he became a Roman Catholic. Being then deserted, as he says, by all his friends except his dear old mother, he began to drift, teaching and filling other openings until he became "disgusted with all religion," and finally landed in the Havana jail without hope and without God.

Here a copy of The Railroad Men's Magazine fell into his hands, containing an article in which the old story of the Prodigal Son was paraphrased by a railroader, who had heard it at the Pacific Garden Mission, Chicago. This led him to reconsider his life, and he asked Jesus to help him and to forgive the dark past. He has before him the possibility of from five to eight years in the jail or in the presidio, which is even a worse place for confinement.

Under the impulse of his new religious purpose he sought friends. There is only one other English-speaking man in the prison. There is no library, and no work. All the prisoners do is to wander around the courtyard from 5:30 A.M. until 6 P.M., when they are locked up over night in large rooms, each holding 100 prisoners of all colors and races. In 1892, however, this man had drifted into one of the sessions of the International Christian Workers' Convention held in Boston, when he heard Dr. Torrey say that when he was asked to do anything, he went to God for guidance, and if God said "yes," he did it. This prisoner therefore wrote to Dr. Torrey, telling him the circumstances of his case as related above, and asking for a copy of the Bible and a copy of his book on How to Study the Bible. These have been sent to him, and the prayers of readers are asked that God may bless his Word to this man, strengthening him in his own Christian life and making him a blessing to others.

Federation of Gospel Missions

THE annual convention of the National Federation of Gospel Missions was called to meet in New York May 14 to 17. The programme was as follows: First day, May 14—Evening: Convention assemblies at Christian Missionary Alliance Chapel, Eighth Avenue and Forty-fourth Street, Rev. C. H. Madison presiding. Election of Federation officers for ensuing year. Second day—Session in Alliance Chapel. Reports of superintendents and workers. John Callahan presiding. 7:30 P.M.—Experience meeting. F. K. Ward, of Cedar Rapids, Iowa, presiding. Third day—Discussion of Federation plans and projects. Hon. John G. Woolley presiding. Evening: Seeing New York Missions. Last day—10:30 A.M.: Bedford Street M. E. Church; John G. Woolley will preach. Afternoon: Farewell service in Missionary Alliance Chapel. Evening: Bedford Street M. E. Church. Closing address.

In the afternoons side trips to Central Park, Grant's Tomb, Ellis Island and other places of interest were arranged for the delegates.

FEEDING FOR HEALTH

Directions by a Food Expert.

A complete change in food makes a complete change in the body. Therefore if you are ailing in any way the surest road back to health is to change your diet. Try the following breakfast for ten days and mark the result.

Two soft-boiled eggs (if you have a weak stomach boil the eggs as follows: put two eggs into a pint tin cup of boiling water, cover and set off the stove. Take out in nine minutes; the whites will be the consistency of cream and partly digested. Don't change the directions in any particular), some fruit, cooked or raw, cooked preferred, a slice of toast, a little butter, four heaping teaspoonfuls of Grape-Nuts with some cream, a cup of properly boiled Postum Food Coffee.

The Grape-Nuts breakfast food is fully and scientifically cooked at the factory, and both that and the Postum have the diastase (that which digests the starchy part) developed in the manufacture. Both the food and the coffee therefore are predigested and assist in a natural way to digest the balance of the food. Lunch at noon the same.

For dinner in the evening use meat and one or two vegetables. Leave out the fancy desserts. Never over-eat. Better a little less than too much.

If you can use health as a means to gain success in business or in a profession, it is well worth the time and attention required to arrange your diet to accomplish the result. Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a Reason."

FRONTIER MISSION PERILS

The Romantic Story of the Founding of Mission Work Among the Indian Tribes Along the Missouri River

FOR thirty-two years the Rev. C. L. Hall has been laboring for the salvation and upbuilding of the red man. His work has been among the tribes of Gros-Ventres, Mandans and Arickarees. Long years ago, he came up the Missouri River on a boat to the squalid village about Fort Berthold, where a thousand Indians lived in earth lodges along the river banks. It was a place of evil name. Sons of frontiersmen would gravitate there and sink to lower depths. Men esteemed honorable at home were dragged down and lost there.

When the missionary began to build his home, the stones for the foundation were thrown into the excavation the night after they were hauled. As he was raising the frame, the Indian chief sallied forth with his weapons and threatened to burn it down, but afterwards promised his protection. Before the house was finished, the Sioux "Sitting Bull," who killed General Custer, sent a band to win over the Fort Indians, but the Rees fired upon them. The Rees had lost three scouts in Custer's command. All through the season there were fears of attacks. Amidst such danger and excitement, the preacher told of the Saviour, the "Prince of Peace."

One of the rooms in the old block-house had been for an Indian council room. In this room was held the first Gospel service. Pierre, the interpreter, tells of putting a slip-noose down from the projecting upper story over the neck of a Sioux, hauling him up and taking his scalp. Pierre acted as an interpreter for a time, but it was found out that he was giving his own version of the Scriptures. The Dakota Indian has a vivid imagination. The Indian child can outdo his little white friend in power "to make believe," and the strange myths of their people have a wild imagery like that of Ezekiel. A spirit divides the water and dispels the mist. Water rippling through the weeds is the "hair of the grandfather." A bird crossing a river is a "watcher, who will carry messages back to loved ones." He always looks in his journey for the "thunder bird" and the "storm spirit." But he is ready for the Gospel and listens to it gladly.

Mr. Hall has four congregations and two native assistants or missionaries. At one of the stations, the Rees have erected a neat chapel, giving in labor and material more than a third of the cost. "Pone Wolf," the oldest member, is a head-man, eighty-seven years old. He was a conjurer, and when he was converted, he took his superstitious belongings to the top of a hill and threw them to the winds. A prairie fire consumed them. His two daughters had already begun the Christian way, and in distress the aged Indian prayed that their God would be his God too. His conversion was complete. He and all his household were received into the church.

Mr. Hall for nearly twenty years kept an Indian school. He is planning to take into his home at Elbowoods ten or a dozen of the weakly native children whom no one else will provide for, but who need education all the more on account of physical defects.

A WANDERER BROUGHT BACK

A MAN came to the Whosoever Mission, Germantown, Pa., several months ago, in a deplorable condition. He was converted, and was taken into the Home, and for over five months lived a consistent life. Last month he was taken ill and in a few days died in the Germantown Hospital. A few days later a letter was received from his sister which contained the following newspaper clipping: "Rolan W. Curtin, a brother of Mrs. I. M. Harvey, of State College, who had made his home here for some time, died at the Germantown Hospital last Monday of pneumonia, after an illness of but a few days. The deceased was a member of the well-known Curtin family of this county, his father being Austin Curtin, a brother of ex-Governor Curtin. He is survived by two sisters and two brothers. The remains were interred at Curtin on Wednesday." In her letter his sister said among other things, "I want to thank you for your great goodness to my brother, and if your mission never does anything more than to reform and help him you certainly will receive your reward. I am thankful that he got into the Mission. We tried every way to get him to reform, but he would only laugh. He was a bright young man, but like many others got into bad company, and had been very wild. Oh, how often have I prayed that he might be brought to Christ! I don't think I was ever so happy as when I received his letter just two weeks before his death, telling me I need not worry any more about him, as he had become a Christian and was working in the Home. My prayers were answered."

Night With Our Fleet

PLOWING through the mighty main,
Leaving in our wake a train
Of jeweled foam,
While in the moonlight's ray
Our pennons lightly play
As we roam.

Now no enemy in view
On the calm deep ocean's blue,
All is free,
Now is heard no battle shout,
And our guns look grimly out
On the sea.

In the silent midnight air,
The bright stars glowing there Seem to tell
That guardian spirits bright
In those spacious realms of light, Guide us well.

As I gaze upon the scene,
Sublime and yet serene,
Thoughts will come
Of those absent ones who pray
For us as we take our way
Far from home.

SCHOOL OF THE VESTAL VIRGINS

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in reviewing Ridpath's History of the World, says: "We mark the marvelous influence of Christianity upon the world's progress. He would be a blind reader of history indeed who did not discern, throughout all, the influence of a great Omnipotent hand, guiding and developing all things." The celebrated painting shown herewith from RIDPATH'S HISTORY illustrates a RELIGIOUS custom of the Romans. Ridpath takes the reader back 6,000 years before the time of CHRIST and gives the history of every religion and shows the slow and toilsome progress of man through the centuries, gradually emerging out of PAGANISM and SUPERSTITION into the light of CHRISTIANITY and PROGRESS. PRESIDENT WILLIAM MCKINLEY said:

"I am familiar with the merits of Ridpath's History of the World, and cordially commend it to the scholar as well as to the plain people generally."

PROF. WARREN, Pres't Boston University, said:

"I should be glad to see it placed in the library of every young person in the United States, and even in the English-speaking world. In families where there are bright children it will render excellent service to the cause of popular intelligence."

PROF. LONG, Supt. Public Schools, St. Louis, said:

"I unhesitatingly commend Dr. Ridpath's History of the World as the ablest work on that subject which I have ever examined. The engravings, maps and charts are alone worth the entire cost of the set."

BISHOP VINCENT, Chancellor of Chautauqua, said:

"Ridpath's History is in clear and agreeable style, comprehensive in treatment, readable type and admirable illustrations. This set of books is a permanent college chair of general history in one's own house."

THE BOSTON POST said:

"John Clark Ridpath is above all things an historian. His historical works are accepted as standards in schools and colleges, as well as in business houses and homes. His style is simple, his manner charming."

RIDPATH'S enviable position as an historian is due to his wonderfully beautiful style, a style no other historian has ever equaled. He pictures the great historical events as though they were happening before your eyes; he carries you with him to see the battles of old; to meet kings and queens and warriors; to sit in the Roman senate; to march against Saladin and his dark-skinned followers; to sail the southern seas with Drake; to circumnavigate the globe with Magellan; to watch that thin line of Greek spearmen work havoc with the Persian hordes on the field of Marathon; to know Napoleon as you know Roosevelt.

RIDPATH in your home means you need never spend a lonely evening. You can associate with the world's heroes; you can cross the Rubicon with Cæsar, after which Rome was free no more. You can sit at the feet of Socrates, the loftiest genius of the ancient world. You can kneel at the shrine of Lincoln, "the greatest character of all time, the gentlest memory of our world." It is ennobling to commune with these children of destiny. To be associated with great men is to be great one's self, and you will add to your store of knowledge which is power, and to the richness of your life.

RIDPATH takes you back to the dawn of history, long before the pyramids of Egypt were built; down through the romantic troubled times of Chaldea's grandeur and Assyria's magnificence; of Babylonia's wealth and luxury; of Grecian and Roman splendor; of Mohammedan culture and refinement; of French elegance and British power; of American patriotism and religious freedom, to the dawn of yesterday. He covers every race, every nation, every time, and holds you spellbound by his wonderful eloquence. Nothing more interesting, absorbing and inspiring was ever written by man.

RIDPATH throws the mantle of personality over the old heroes of history. Alexander is there—patriot, warrior, statesman, diplomat, crowning the glory of Grecian history. Xerxes, from his mountain platform, sees Themistocles, with three hundred and fifty Greek ships, smash his Persian fleet of over a thousand sail, and help to mould the language in which this paragraph is written. Rome perches Nero upon the greatest throne on earth, and so sets up a poor madman's name to stand for countless centuries as the synonym of savage cruelty; Napoleon fights Waterloo again under your very eyes, and reels before the iron fact that at last the end of his gilded dream has come. Bismarck is there—gruff, overbearing, a giant pugilist in the diplomatic ring, laughing with grim disdain at France, which says "You shall not." Washington is there, "four-square to all the winds," grave, thoughtful, proof against the wiles of British strategy and the poisoned darts of false friends; clear-seeing over the heads of his fellow-countrymen, and on into another century—the most colossal world-figure of his time

Questions and Answers

B. McK., Three Rivers, Can. Are children born to American parents residing under the jurisdiction of a foreign government considered citizens of the United States or of the country where they were born?

It has been declared by act of Congress that "children of persons who now are or have been citizens of the United States, though born out of the limits and jurisdiction of the United States, are considered as citizens thereof."

D. J. L., Des Moines, Ia. 1. When and where was the Luther League of America founded? 2. What does the League advocate?

1. The first national meeting was held at Pittsburg, Pa., in 1895. 2. It purposes to link together the various societies of young people in the Lutheran Church which are working for the good of the church.

H. M., Norwalk, Conn. What is the wealth of the great nations?

The statistics given below are "estimates," the real values probably varying a little from the figures given. The United States is rated at $116,000,000,000; Great Britain and Ireland, $62,200,000,000; France, $42,800,000,000; Germany, $42,000,000,000; Russia, $35,000,000,000; Austria-Hungary, $20,000,000,000, and Italy, $13,000,000,000.

A. B. T. 1. When a person dies, is it right to say that God called him? 2. What is meant by the transmigration of souls?

1. If the person was godly we may say so, for nothing takes place without God's concurrence. There are, however, some deaths which imply far other than that God is calling; it would appear, rather, that he was forbidding the person to enter his presence. 2. The transmigration of souls is a doctrine originating with the Egyptians, and later taught by Pythagoras: that at death the soul passed into an animal and lived in various forms of animal life successively and returned into a human body after a long period, usually about three thousand years.

B. M., Rahway, N. J. How many persons, approximately, are now receiving famine relief in India?

As stated by Lord Minto, the Viceroy (see CHRISTIAN HERALD of May 13), there are now 1,410,181 persons in receipt of Government relief. The Bombay Guardian of April 11 puts the total at 1,522,000. It adds, "The number of persons in poorhouses continues to decrease."

Subscriber, Greenwich, N. Y. What was the exact date of the death of John Alexander Dowrie, and of what did he die?

He died of paralysis and dropsy March 9, 1907.

Reader, Oakland, Calif. Do all of the States observe Arbor Day?

Every State and Territory, with the exception of Indian Territory and Delaware, has observed a day as Arbor Day. They do not, however, follow the same date.

W. P. A., Newark, N. J. Who is the highest ranking officer in the United States Army and who is the chief of staff?

The highest officer is Lieutenant-General Arthur MacArthur, of Milwaukee, Wis. Major-General J. Franklin Bell, of Washington, D. C., is Chief of Staff.

M. R., Virginia City, Nev. In what year was marriage forbidden to the Catholic clergy, and what was the name of the Pope that promulgated such an edict?

The idea that a member of the priesthood should not marry was of gradual growth. At the first council at Nicæa, 325 A.D., an attempt was made to impose celibacy as a law, but it was unsuccessful. Gregory VII. tried to carry out the idea, and was successful to some extent. After the first and second Lateran Councils, 1123 and 1139, clerical marriages were declared invalid. Since the Council of Trent, in 1563, the law has been strictly enforced.

Reader, Applegate, Mich. Who is the oldest and who is the youngest Senator at Washington?

Senator Allison, of Iowa, is the oldest Senator. He is seventy-two. William James Bryan, of Florida, who died a few weeks ago, was the youngest Senator of the present Congress. He was thirty-one years old.

Reader, Hollis, N. H. 1. How many members has the British House of Lords? 2. How many members in the House of Commons?

1. The House of Lords has 617 members. 2. The House of Commons has 670 members, 30 for Wales, 72 for Scotland, 103 for Ireland and 465 for England.

J. W. R., Linomie, N. Y. 1. When and at what expense was the dam in the Nile River built? 2. How many acres will it render fit for cultivation?

1. The dam at Assuan on the Nile, the largest of its kind in the world, was completed on July 31, 1903, and formally opened by the Duke of Connaught in December of that year. It cost $24,000,000. 2. It will irrigate 600,000,000 acres of cotton and sugarcane lands.

A. A. G., Aitkin, Minn. What meaning is there in giving the freedom of a city to a person?

It is an ancient custom, and formerly meant much more than it does now. It meant that the recipient was granted certain privileges the possession of which gave him immunity from taxation, etc., and the right to do certain as the correct one and the Amalekite story "a fiction of his own intended to ingratiate himself with David, the presumptive successor to the throne." On the other hand, it is held by some that Saul, having given himself a thrall with his own sword, was finally patched by the Amalekite.

Canada Subscriber, Montreal. What is meant by the term "the tenant held his land in socage"?

It was one way of renting land from its owner in the middle ages. The farmer held it in "socage" when he performed certain services for its owner, such as plowing the owner's farm a certain number of days, or paid a fixed rent. It was distinguished from other feudal tenures in that no military service was required.

R. R. W., Pearson, N. M., writes

In the April 1, 1908, number of your valuable paper W. R. Draper speaks of the forty-five million acres of government land in New Mexico "not worth a cent unless irrigated." Now, that is a mistaken idea. The soil here is very productive. The main crops are milo maize, Kaffir corn, Indian corn, and sorghum. Peanuts, melons, cantaloupes, pumpkins, squashes, cushaws, sweet potatoes, cucumbers, turnips, beans and produce very abundantly. Alfalfa tests have succeeded. All these crops are raised on unirrigated lands on the Staked Plains in New Mexico.

Mrs. K., Denver, Colo. Here in Denver a band of God-fearing people are trying to vote liquor. The liquor people are circulating pamphlets telling what a detriment Prohibition is to business. Before me is a picture of over one hundred vacant stores in Kansas City, Kan., and another one saying that the more drunkenness in Maine, more men in the penitentiary there, than in four States where whisky is sold.

Such claims are absolutely untrue of course. They are on a par with the mangling of the census reports by the liquor men, which the Director of the Census has just exposed. The Kansas City story has been fully exploded. See page 347 of CHRISTIAN HERALD of April 22. Their Maine assertion too, is unprovable, because the fact will show the reverse.

Mrs. W., Wadena, Minn. What does the ninth verse of I. Peter, third chapter, mean?

Our best commentators now hold that the earlier interpretations of this which implied that the Gospel of Salvation was preached, were not justified by the context. Scripture everywhere represents man's state after death as irreversible. There is nothing in the passage to show that anything further is meant than that the Gospel was "heralded" (not preached), and that the heralding, or announcement, or publishing of the fact of the finished work was the true interpretation. It is a passage, however, concerning which there have been many different opinions.

Astronomical Queries

Answered by Prof. S. P. Leland, Ph.D., LL.D. Seabreeze, Fla.

R. B. J., Vincent, W. Va. The earth has various magnetic centres toward which the needle points. Beds of magnetic iron, called lodestone, are found in many parts of the earth, especially in Siberia and the Scandinavian Peninsula in the North, and other beds in the Southern Hemisphere. The needle points toward the magnetic centre having the strongest attraction, whether in the Northern Hemisphere or the Southern. Navigators are provided with tables giving the location of these centres, and the variation of the needles in the several seas.

Aula B., Ladora, Ia. The moon makes a revolution around the earth in 29 1/2 days. When it is on the opposite side of us from the sun, it is full moon, because the sun shines upon the side exposed to us. We then see the whole illuminated side. In about 7 1/2 days it will be in the last quarter, and only one half of the exposed side is illuminated. In about 7 1/2 days more, it gets between us and the sun and no part of its surface visible to us is illuminated. It is then in the dark. Then in 7 1/2 days more, one half its exposed surface is illuminated and the moon is in its first quarter. Then comes the full illuminated side again and it is full moon. These constitute its phases. The shadow of the earth has nothing to do with it.

Survivors of the "Gladiator" Disaster on the Upturned Hull

ONE of the most thrilling and tragic disasters at sea occurred off the coast of England during the recent blizzard. The British warship Gladiator was on its way from Portland to Portsmouth, when the hull of a great vessel loomed out of the darkness. It was the liner St. Paul. Before the latter could change its course it rammed the Gladiator amidships. The St. Paul was but slightly damaged, but the warship turned over and sank in shallow water. A number of the sailors were drowned. Those who could got on the upturned hull, and, nothing daunted by the peril of their situation, began to sing.

Reader, Hollis, N. H. 1. How many members has the British House of Lords? 2. How many members in the House of Commons?

1. The House of Lords has 617 members. 2. The House of Commons has 670 members, 30 for Wales, 72 for Scotland, 103 for Ireland and 465 for England.

J. W. R., Linomie, N. Y. 1. When and at what expense was the dam in the Nile River built? 2. How many acres will it render fit for cultivation?

1. The dam at Assuan on the Nile, the largest of its kind in the world, things which others did not enjoy and to have certain homage and service rendered to him. Now, the freedom is simply a formal honor, a compliment paid to distinguished people. It is occasionally done here but is more common in Europe.

A. G., Long Island. In I. Sam. 31:4-5, we read that Saul, after being sorely wounded in battle, took his sword and fell upon it and died. In II. Sam. 1:1-10 it is, however, stated that a young man, an Amalekite, slew the king, as the latter had requested him to do. How are we to harmonize these two statements?

Commentators have apparently agreed on regarding the first account

HIS LIFE FOR THE POOR OF PARIS

Romance of the McAll Missions, Whose American Auxiliary Has Celebrated Its Twenty-fifth Birthday

TWENTY-FIVE years of sustained and systematic endeavor on the part of Christian Americans for the evangelization of France was chronicled at the great anniversary meeting of the American McAll Association held recently in Philadelphia. An interesting feature of the celebration was the bringing in of special gifts by the thirty local auxiliaries and the presentation of written records to be kept as a part of the history of the movement.

The McAll Mission began, like many other great religious movements, in a small way, and with no idea on the part of the founder that the work would be one that would flourish long after he was gone and be supported by the Christian people of many lands.

Dr. R. W. McAll was about fifty years old when he started his work in Paris. He was the son of Dr. Robert S. McAll, a famous Congregational preacher of Manchester, England. The son was converted at an early age, and was determined to follow in his father's footsteps in the ministry. After completing his theological course he became pastor at Sunderland, England, and later at Leicester and Birmingham. He was a man who was not content to go on with simple pastoral work among his own parishioners, but constantly sought new ways of reaching the masses. He soon became as welcome among the people in the poverty stricken quarters of the cities in which he worked as in the homes of his most aristocratic church members. He had a message for all classes, but made an especial appeal to the "unchurched."

Just at the close of the great struggle between France and Germany, Dr. McAll carried out a long cherished plan of a visit to Paris. He was worn out with hard work, a work in which vacations had been few and far between. He thought, now that the Germans had withdrawn from Paris, he could visit the French capital, its art galleries and literary shrines, and derive great benefit from an entire change in his environment.

He arrived in Paris just as the uprising of the worst elements in the city, known to history as the Commune, was being crushed by the loyal portion of the French troops. For a second time within a few months, Paris had seen its streets drenched with blood. Where Dr. McAll expected to see beautiful palaces, gaunt ruins raised their broken and windowless walls to the sky; on every hand he met people despairing, emaciated, even starving.

The good doctor's heart was filled with pity and he felt that here, among these people, was his real life work. He could then speak but little French, but whenever he met a person whose face seemed to indicate a hopeless heart within, he was able to say "God loves you; I love you." And then he would thrust into the stranger's hand a copy of the New and returned with his wife to Paris. He opened his first mission hall in Belleville, a district infested by some of the worst characters in Paris. So great was the interest of the people that others were started. In a few years Dr. McAll had in Paris and other French cities over one hundred and thirty mission halls, and two Gospel boats. Many of his helpers were men and women converted in his mission work and who gladly served without pay to carry the Gospel to others. A McAll mission station often has several halls under its charge.

Dr. McAll passed away in 1893 and his good wife in 1906. So great was the esteem in which he was held that the President of France conferred upon him, in 1892, the decoration of the cross of the Legion of Honor, in recognition of his public service extending over twenty years, and his devotion to humanity—the first time the honor had been bestowed for such services. At her passing Mrs. McAll was buried beside her husband in the famous cemetery of Père la Chaise, not far from the historic corner where, thirty-five years before, they had heard the call of unredeemed France, "Come over and help us." On the granite cross above their graves is engraved in French the favorite text of Dr. McAll—"Venez à moi, vous tous, qui êtes fatigués et chargés. Je vous soulagerai, dit Jésus-Christ." (Come unto me, all ye who labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest, said Jesus Christ.)

The same sweet verse of invitation and consolation is seen on the walls of the speaker's desk in the chapel-boat La Bonne Nouvelle (the Good News), one of the two McAll Mission boats which travel the length of the French rivers, seeking to save the lost. The church bell in the little tower of the Bonne Nouvelle is often the only call to worship in the isolated country districts into which the Gospel boats penetrate. Commenting on this novel method, some French wit of the daily press has asked whether there might not be inaugurated a missionary visiting balloon. In response to the suggestion of Rev. Henri Merle d'Aubigné, head of the work in Paris, a missionary van or automobile

This good man soon became well known to the distressed people, and they began to come to him for his advice in their time of trouble. He worked hard to attain a good French vocabulary, and held several meetings. People came to him to urge him to hold more. The doctor returned to England, told his congregation of his purpose to work for the evangelization of France, resigned his pastorate

"The king's business required haste"

IT was a lie, a miserable subterfuge. The most noble of men sometimes do the most ignoble things. The situation was this: David had incurred the displeasure of King Saul and was a fugitive from his wrath. Saul had sent his agents through the kingdom to apprehend David. Leaving his most intimate friend, Jonathan the king's son, who had befriended him, David journeyed to the city of Nob to apply to the priest Ahimelech for aid. Knowing well that the priest would at once have a suspicion at his sudden appearance and with no retinue, David resolves to fall back on the art of deceit. Accordingly he represents to the priest that he is on a secret expedition on behalf of the king and that the business was so urgent that he had been obliged to leave with the utmost haste and so had brought neither food nor sword with him. A retinue of men, he said, were at an appointed place awaiting his arrival.

On this representation of his plight Ahimelech gave him the shew-bread from the altar, which was not lawful to eat but for the priests, there being no other provision at hand. The sword of Goliath was also presented to David, which he eagerly accepted, believing it might be a good omen in that it was the same sword he had used in killing the giant.

A Disastrous Deception

Without entering further into the narrative, suffice it to say that the outcome of this deception was most disastrous for Ahimelech and David himself. A spy in the service of Saul had been a witness to the whole transaction, and when it was reported to the king, Ahimelech, the innocent party, was put to death, and David himself was pursued with still greater ferocity. To die may be a necessity, but to lie can never be a necessity. It is better to die, if need be, for the truth, than to live at the price of a lie scorching the soul.

The king's business required haste, or was urgent. It is my purpose this morning to transfer this passage, which was originally an ignoble lie, to the expression of a noble principle—to the thought of the message and mission to the world of the great God through his Son Jesus Christ and the disciples who walk in his steps. "On the King's business," then, is our theme for the morning. "The King's business requires haste," i. e., is urgent. Three thoughts are suggested from this text—the King's business, the agents of the King's business, the urgency of the King's business.

It is rather late in the day to deny the existence of the King. This is not a hap-hazard universe. Chance, we are quite sure, is not an able enough architect to have planned and builded these hills and mountains, rivers and seas, skies and landscapes fair. Things have not just happened. How does the gold-miner know there is gold in yon mountain? He knows it by the particles of gold which the river washes down from that mountain, and with which it fringes its banks. Waves of melody beat upon your ear. They come from the house of your friend. The doors are shut. The shutters are closed. You can not see your friends. Yet you recognize their voices. How do you know there is music there? The sound vibrations convey the knowledge to you. How do I know there is a King, a God? I see his footprints in creation. I see his calligraphy in the illuminated manuscript of the skies. I hear his voice in my inner consciousness. God is, and because God is, he is for some purpose, some business. Herein we see the character of the King and the nature of his business.

God's Attitude to the World

God is no idler. Idleness is at a discount in his economy of grace. God is a worker. It is only work that is at a premium. Quiescent ease is not the atmosphere he breathes. Rather energetic activity is the environment in which he lives, and moves, and has his being. Not a palace so much as an arena is characteristic of God's existence in the universe. Not the encampment but the march is the normal state of his being. The symbol of God's attitude to the world is not the great boulder that remains quietly in its receptacle in the side of the mountain, but the stately river that flows on perpetually and rolls on irresistibly to the sea. Activity—ceaseless activity—is the attitude of God to the world and the world of humanity. What a God, what a King is this! Does he not lead us over the burning sands and rest us in luxuriant glades? If there are disappointments at Marah there are surprises at Elim. Sometimes he leads us by a cloud, but he speaks to us by a human voice. Ofttimes he chooses a thundercloud as the canvas on which he paints his promise in rainbow hues. His beneficent purpose and activities are not restrained nor are they confined to a select few in the great family of humanity. The sun does not shine for a few trees and flowers, but for the wide world's joy. "The lowly pine on the mountain-top waves its sombre boughs, and cries, Thou art my sun; and the little meadow-violet lifts its cup of blue and whispers with its perfumed breath, Thou art my sun; and the grain in a thousand fields rustles in the wind, and makes answer, Thou art my sun." So God sits effulgent in heaven, not for a favored few, but for the universe of life; and there is no creature so poor or so low, that he may not look up with child-like confidence and say, "My Father, thou art mine."

Infinite Love and Sympathy

Then think of the nature of the King's business. It is the manufacturing of worlds and the institution of laws for their government. So nicely adjusted are these laws that there is not a clash among the myriads of worlds that roll through space. The great systems of suns and planets, galaxies and constellations move in their appointed orbits. And God is not only the Divine Mechanic, he is also the Divine Artist. His universe is not only mechanical, it is also artistic. Beauty is joined with utility. Does he not paint the sunsets and give to the lily its sweet fragrance, its delicate texture, and its lovely line? Does he not clothe the mountain with majesty and the sea with sublimity? Yes, this is his business; but this is not his supreme business. The supreme business of the King is with the world of men—the creatures of his own hand and created in his image.

It is with an infinite love that the King loves his subjects. But ingratitude and disloyalty have spurned that love. Sin has poisoned the fountain of man's being and has alienated him from the King's heart and the King's court. But the heart of the King yearns for his wandering child, and his supreme business is to bring him back to innocence and purity, love and hope and heaven. To this end his only begotten Son came and gave his life a ransom for many. The nature of his business then is redemptive. He would play upon the keys of man's life and bring forth the hidden harmonies. He would touch his mind with the magic wand of immortal truth. He would touch his heart with the pathos of sympathy and brotherhood. He would touch his will with a divine ecstasy. He would touch his conscience with the poetry of the ideal. He would touch his spirit with high resolves and immortal cravings. He would touch and save his soul for time and eternity. This, this is the supreme business of the King.

The Evolution of Manhood

The world is full of agents and promoters. Many and vast are the schemes exploited. Great business enterprises have been exploited by men who have been the agents of wealth and power, and with this strong backing, together with their own ample girth of brain, wise forethought, keen foresight and marvelous executive efficiency, they have enlarged the dimensions of trade, and have made for themselves honorable reputations. Vast schemes of knowledge have been launched upon the world by men who have enriched the mental halls of humanity, widened individual capacity to be and to do, and opened up avenues leading to the highest and the best in life, earning for themselves, too, the title, benefactors of the human race. But the scheme which Jesus launched upon the world was the business of the King—the evolution of manhood into the stature of the Divine. And when we walk in his steps we become the agents and promoters of the mightiest, the vastest, and the most glorious business on earth, a business that the angels of heaven would fain take up. Herein we see the honor of the calling and the responsibility of the position.

Think of the honor of the calling. To become a mighty factor through divine grace in the building up of the Kingdom of God, to become a partner with him in the great business of character building—there is no higher honor, no higher privilege in the world. To speak the word that shall start in the mind of a brother a train of thought that will bring him, like the prodigal of old, to himself and to God; to evince a sympathy toward one who has passed through the deep waters of trial so that song finds its oratory in the heart and the shadow flees away; to give a brotherly grip of earnest solicitude to one who is wavering on the very edge of some frightful precipice of evil, and to enable him to walk again the broad table-lands; to be the means in God's hands of saving a soul from death and of covering a multitude of sins—ah! this, this is to be on business for the King. And it is the honor of the calling that tints all life with the tints of the beautiful.

Our Responsibility

Then let us realize the responsibility of the position. It is a heavy, a vital business in which agents we are engaged. It involves great responsibility. "I can not sweep the darkness out, but I can shine it out," said John Newton. We can not scourge dead works out of the church, but we can live them out. If we accuse the church of having pneumonia, let us who are individual air-cells in that church breathe deeply, and wait patiently, and pray believingly, and one after another of the obstructed cells will open to the Spirit till convalescence is re-established in every part. Individual responsibility—not responsibility in the mass. No man can eat, drink, or sleep by proxy. No man can get the alphabet learned for him by another. Just as it is with the mind and body, so is it with the soul. There are certain things absolutely needful to the soul's health and well-being. Each must attend to these things for himself; each must repent for himself; each must apply to Christ for himself and for himself each must speak to God and pray. You must do it for yourself, for by nobody else can it be done. And no one else can perform the duty which devolves upon you as an agent of the King's business. You must do your own promoting. Your responsibility can not be shifted to the shoulders of some one else.

Alas! alas! what shifting of responsibility there is among those who profess to be on business for the King! What specious excuses are offered! Think you not that the King sees through the flimsy veil with which you would fain cover your responsibility? Ay, your fellow men see it too. There are enigmas to clear up, problems to solve, sufferings to assuage, poverty to alleviate, sad hearts to cheer, the discouraged to be nerved with a mighty hope, the dying to be guided to the haven of rest, the living to be pointed to the Lamb of God, and the immortal soul to be assured of its power of endless life. The position of the agent in the King's business is that of solemn responsibility.

The King's Business Urgent

The King's business requires haste; that is, it is urgent. When your child whom you love as your own life was taken suddenly ill in the night and the tides of life seemed to roll their surge-beats on the other shore, you sent in great haste an imperative message to your physician to come with all despatch to the rescue of your child. The business of the physician was urgent. When the fortunes of war seem to be going against the gallant regiment and they are retiring before the destructive fire of the enemy, the commander of the retreating regiment sends a messenger post-haste for reinforcements. The need is urgent, and if that need meets with a prompt response victory may perch upon the banners of defeat. And when the child of God discerns the signs of the times, and learns the lessons in the school of the Spirit, and is dominated by the mighty motive of the Christ, and has caught the new vision of the triumphant life, then will he be conscious of the urgency of the King's business, and with great alacrity will he spring to the doing of it. That the King's business is urgent may be seen from the spirit of the age and the open door of opportunity.

The age is such that men are asking the question, Is Christianity losing its grip? This question is prompted by certain facts. In a statement published in the New York Times, Dr. C. E. Jefferson, of the Broadway Tabernacle, made special reference to conditions in New York. These are his words: "Manhattan Island is more and more the

THE AWAKENING OF MONT-LAWN

The Scene at Mont-Lawn, from the Terrace in Front of the Homestead Building

THE Children's Paradise is under the magic touch of spring. The hills are putting on their robes of green. The Hudson sparkles in the sunlight. The smiling face of May gives greeting, as another season of preparation for our little guests is in progress. Mont-Lawn is a busy place. While Mother Nature loses no time in tinting the wide lawns and whispering to dogwood, lilac, and other flowering shrubs that it is time to spread their blossoming branches, while cherry, pear, and apple lie in their pink and white profusion, the sound of the carpenter is heard in the land. A new dormitory cottage is rapidly approaching completion. This building, very beautiful in its architecture, with heavy stone foundations and picturesque gables, will contain seventy-six cots. Seventy-six little hearts will be made glad, in addition to the former numbers of tiny guests.

Here is an opportunity for seventy-six additional endowments of cots for the season of 1908, a season which we hope to make a record-breaker, in bringing happiness to the poor children of New York. The past winter has been one of great financial stress even among the so-called well-to-do. How much more heavily has the hand of privation fallen upon the families of the man out of a job, through the long, cold, cruel winter months!

Many a little one has gone to school with scarce enough food partaken of to last until the meagre lunch. Many a little form has shivered for want of sufficient clothing. It has been "hard times" in truth for many who before this last winter never had felt the tangible sting of poverty.

But "lo, the winter is past, . . . the flowers appear upon the earth; the time of the singing birds is come." How many little ones are looking forward to the one bright spot in the whole year to them—their ten days' sojourn at Mont-Lawn. How they count the days until the summons comes, that the Home is ready to welcome them!

Already letters are being received at the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, begging for a chance to go again to the Home—letters written by the little ones themselves, wonderfully well written, considering the baby hands which penned them.

Not always dimpled and rosy, these little fingers—more's the pity—little hands that will soon have to help carry the burden of life, to assist father and mother in the care of the family; "little mothers," yes, and fathers, too. Must we not do what we are able to crowd into their lives all the brightness we can?

Loving hearts and willing hands go from cottage to cottage, from the beautiful Temple to the dining pavilion and rainy-day playroom with its castle-like tower; every nook and corner is inspected, every door and window opened, letting in God's sunlight and fresh air. Gardens are planted, shrubs are trimmed, lawns and walks receive minute attention. Renovation and renewing is in the air. Every one sings and whistles about his work, when Mont-Lawn awakens from its winter's sleep. Every one is happy, each feeling that he has a personal interest in this great work for His little ones.

How joyous is the thought that all its beauty, which means the salvation of many a little child, is made possible by the kind and loving friends who are among those whom the Lord loveth—cheerful givers!

Twenty-one dollars endows a cot for the season. Twenty-one dollars brings life, health and strength to seven little ones, who have a vacation of ten days each; three dollars provides a ten-day outing for a little tenement boy or girl.

Good, wholesome food in abundance, the sweetest and cleanest of beds, the wide, green fields to roam in, unite to make a ten days' stay at Mont-Lawn a never-to-be-forgotten episode in the lives of children who otherwise might never know the beauty of God's country, might never hear the sweet message of peace which may come to them in after-life as they remember the teachings at Mont-Lawn.

Paris of pleasure-seekers and the London of business; it is more and more a foreign city. Of our 2,500,000 population, the Roman Catholic Church claims 930,000. There is a Protestant remnant of only 720,000, which is 50,000 less than it was ten years ago. Only the smallest fraction of these 720,000 nominal Protestants have any connection with the churches. It is not easy for churches to work here, and it grows harder all the time. The last decade has been the most strenuous and discouraging for Christian workers which this city has probably ever known." This somewhat pessimistic view is more than sustained by figures gathered by the New York Federation of Churches. The metropolitan churches, it has been said, are financially richer today than ever before. There are magnificent church edifices, but they can not fill them. Nor is the problem of religious decadence confined to New York City. It exists in many sections of the country.

Now, aside from all faults in the church itself, aside from faults in the preachers, aside from all this, this at least is true—the spirit of the age is plumb against the King's business. And what is this spirit of the age? Intensely materialistic. The first duty is to get land and money, place and name. The world is a sort of Vanity Fair. Success is reckoned in coin of the realm. Objects in life become mere things. Truth and beauty and the ideal dwell in the mystic shades of the unnatural and the unreal. As for a halo—there is no halo about anything under the sun. The spirit of the age makes the King's business urgent. A writer reminds us that a picture like Millet's "Angelus" comes like a voice out of the skies, bidding our age stop, ponder and adore. Even if the burden of existence be the digging of potatoes, and the ever pressing questions be, What shall we eat? What shall we wear? still beneath the growth of the potato is the mystery of God, and beneath food and clothes is the soul with its limitless wants; else our men and women would be little different from the clods of the field, of the earth, earthy. Yes, the Angelus bell does break in upon the materialistic solitudes of our day, and calls all human life to be reverent and worshipful.

to the agents of the King, the strongest possible argument for its urgency, and is, therefore, the creation of the door of opportunity. When the attempt was made to persuade Napoleon that a certain military expedition could not be made because of the Alps looming up as a mighty barrier, he exclaimed, with a wave of his hand, "There shall be no Alps!" And when the church of Jesus Christ, the aggregate of the agents in the King's business, is really in for business, and conceives of the business of the King as the only real reason for her existence; when she looketh forth as the morning, is fair as the moon, clear as the sun, and terrible as an army with banners, then the magnitude of the task will be to her the golden opportunity. When we, as the disciples of our blessed Lord, have truly caught his spirit, and echoed his note of the heroic in our lives; when we have been possessed of his passion and compassion, and have stopped acting as if we were fooling with heaven and frivolling with hell; when the Pentecostal baptism of fire has been poured out upon us and the beacon lights of eternity thus kindled shall flame with a mighty evangelism; then will the church create the mighty opportunity which shall prove in a very tangible way her belief in the all-conclusive urgency of the King's business.

The Christ who loved us and died for us demands of us our best. The door of opportunity opens the way for us to do our best. When the great military chieftain pointed his soldiers to the Pyramids, he reminded them that forty centuries were looking down upon them. The thought thrilled them and nerved them to do their best and thus they measured up to their splendid opportunity. The Christ of history, the hero of Calvary, the lover of the soul, the Saviour of the world, the Master of character—God over all—is looking down upon us from his throne in the skies; and shall not the thought of it thrill us with a new purpose, a new consecration, a new devotion of love, that shall respond gladly to the loud call of a matchless opportunity?

We have spoken of the King's business as revealing the character of the King—a God of activity; and the nature of his business—the redemption of humanity. We have spoken of the agents of the King's business, how honorable is the calling and how responsible the position. We have spoken of the urgency of the King's business, as emphasized by the spirit of the age and the open door of opportunity. My concluding word is this: We can not enter into the spirit of the King's business, we can not understand its scope, or be efficient in it, save as we come into living, vital touch with the King. You are familiar with the old story of the auction sale in a London curio shop. The auctioneer brought forth an old, dirty, battered, begrimed violin. He said, "It is worth its weight in gold, a genuine Cremona, made by Stradivarius himself." But the crowd doubted. The Stradivarius name was not cut in. Only five guineas were bid for it. The auctioneer said, "It is ridiculous to sell such a rare violin for such a small sum." Just then a rather prepossessing man entered the shop, edged his way through the crowd, picked up the violin, tightened its strings, took the bow and gently drew it over the strings; and, lo! a soft and entrancing harmony poured forth that held the people spell-bound, and involuntarily they exclaimed, "Paganini!" When he stopped playing the bidding became spirited, and the violin was finally sold to Paganini himself for one hundred guineas. That very evening he held an audience entranced by the matchless harmonies he drew forth from the old, battered and begrimed violin. The violin needed the touch of the master to bring forth its hidden power. You, my friend, as you look within yourself, may be deeply conscious of the discords in your life; you may feel that within you there is no power of efficiency to make you of service in the King's business. Listen: You are discounting yourself. Let your personality be touched by the Master's hand, and hidden symphonies will pour forth.

The touch of the Christ is vital to the King's business. Brethren, we are born to the purple. We are born to the throne. We are born to the sceptre. We are born to the crown. But we can never ascend the throne, we can never wear the purple, we can never wield the sceptre, we can never have our brow graced by the crown, save as we come into living touch with the King. God help us all to be on the King's business; for the King's business is urgent.

THE FIGHT FOR THE MOTTO WON

AFTER six months of agitation, during which the entire Christian community was sympathetically enlisted in behalf of the restoration of the motto, "In God We Trust," to our national coinage, the victory has been splendidly won. The bill providing for the restoration of the motto on the coins passed the Senate unanimously on May 13, having previously passed the House by a practically unanimous vote. It becomes a law within thirty days after receiving the executive approval.

There have been many features about this battle that make it a memorable one. The motto, "In God We Trust," was placed on the coins during the Presidency of Lincoln, and while the Hon. James Pollock was Director of the United States Mint. It was a period of great national stress and trial, and during those dark days, the President and his nearest advisers—all men of deep religious convictions—felt that it would be appropriate to put on the gold coinage of the country an expression of our people's trust and confidence in God. From 1861 to 1907—forty-six years—the motto remained undisturbed. There was no suggestion of removal made in any quarter until a year ago, when new designs for the coins were called for. To the astonishment of the whole country, the new gold coinage with the St. Gaudens design appeared minus the motto.

When the people began to realize that the reverent and time-honored motto was really gone from the face of the national coins, an agitation was at once begun for its restoration. It was the general feeling that the effacement of this public acknowledgment of the Deity was an act which not only demanded explanation, but which should be reversed at the earliest opportunity. Hundreds of letters poured into THE CHRISTIAN HERALD office from all parts of the country, urging this journal to exert its influence in behalf of restoration, and when the flood-tide of the agitation was reached these letters swelled into the thousands.

Yielding to the universal demand from men and women of every religious denomination, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD communicated with leading members of Congress on the subject of restoration. Hon. Morris Sheppard, of Texas, and Hon. Ollie M. James, of Kentucky, two members of the House of Representatives, who were in the heartiest sympathy with the restoration movement, led the campaign in the House. Several bills were introduced and those were referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights and Measures, the Chairman of which is Representative William B. McKinley, of Illinois. A compromise bill, drawn by Chairman McKinley, was finally agreed upon and reported to the House, which on March 16, by a vote of 259 yeas and five nays, passed the measure after a long and interesting debate. During the discussion, the immense mass of protests sent by Christian men and women from all the States to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, was laid before the House and many of the letters read in order to show the extent and character of the public feeling on the subject. A large number of these CHRISTIAN HERALD letters were spread upon the pages of The Congressional Record.

But the bill for the restoration of the motto has yet to run the gauntlet of the Senate. It was sent to the Finance Committee, and after many urgent requests that it be considered, it was called up by Senator Aldrich, of Rhode Island, in Committee. There had been suggestions that the bill would be allowed to die in Committee and would never be reported to the Senate; but to these THE CHRISTIAN HERALD gave little heed, believing that the Senators, equally with the Representatives, were appreciative of the tremendous sentiment that had arisen on this subject all over the land. This proved to be the case, for when the bill came up in the Finance Committee on May 12, it was discussed briefly and unanimously approved. It was then immediately reported to the Senate and placed upon the calendar, and on May 13 it passed the Senate unanimously.

The success of the measure is largely due to the energetic and insistent efforts of Congressmen Morris Sheppard, Ollie M. James and W. B. McKinley of the House of Representatives, and Messrs. Bailey Aldrich and Burrows, with their associates in the United States Senate. What these legislators have done entitles them to the gratitude of the nation. As far as the part of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in bringing this about is concerned, we are sincerely thankful to have been once more the chosen channel through which public opinion has expressed itself so effectually on a great question which deeply touched the religious feelings of the American people.

We trust that never again will the motto disappear from the face of the coins of our Republic.

THE GOVERNORS IN COUNCIL

WITH an attendance of almost every Governor from the States comprising the Union, and with prominent statesmen, manufacturers and labor leaders as guests, the Conference of Governors called by President Roosevelt to meet in the White House on April 13 was a most notable assembly. They were called to discuss "the conservation of the Nation's natural resources," a subject that affects the interests of all the States without exception and one which is holding no small place in executive recommendations to State Legislatures. President Roosevelt, it is said, has had the plan of such a meeting under consideration for several months, and all of the State executives who could come to Washington at the date set were present. At the formal dinner given in the beautiful state dining room of the White House, on the evening previous to the opening day of the Conference, thirty-six Governors of States were present, besides those of Hawaii, Porto Rico, and distant Alaska. Prominent statesmen who had applauded or criticised one another's public acts, met for the first time and shook hands as if they were old friends; party lines were forgotten and a general spirit of cordiality seemed to prevail.

The opening session was held on the morning of the 14th, in the famous East Room, which has been the scene of so many historic gatherings. Forty-five Governors were present, and other persons of national note filed in until at last five hundred were seated in the rows of chairs or banked about the walls. They comprised Senators, Representatives in Congress, Justices, members of the Cabinet and noted representatives of all lines of industry.

President Roosevelt's opening address took fifty-five minutes for its delivery, and it will rank among his most able and constructive utterances. When he finished the part dealing with the work of the Inland Waterways Commission, every Governor in the room cheered.

Secretary Root, Mr. Andrew Carnegie, and Mr. John Mitchell were the principal speakers besides the President at the first session. Andrew Carnegie spoke as an expert on "The Conservation of Ores and Related Minerals." "Iron and coal," he stated, "are the foundation of our industrial prosperity. Unless there is careful husbanding or revolutionizing inventions, or some industrial revolution comes which can not now be foreseen, the greater part of those estimated 2,500,000,000 tons of coal, forming our original heritage, will be gone before the end of the next century. I believe, as a practical man accustomed to dealing with those mineral factors on which our National prosperity is based, it is time to take thought for the morrow."

A LIFE OF CHRISTIAN WORK ENDED

THE editorial staff of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has been bereaved by death of its oldest and best-loved member, Dr. Benjamin J. Fernie, who passed away at Lakewood, N. J., at an early hour on Monday, May 11. He had been afflicted with heart trouble for several years past, and when, three months ago, his illness assumed an acute form, he withdrew to a large extent from his active literary work to undergo treatment at his home in Brooklyn. For a time he seemed to improve, and his physicians decided that a change of air and surroundings would be conducive to recovery. Accordingly they conveyed the sufferer to Lakewood; but he had hardly arrived there before he was seized with a violent congestive chill. He rallied, however, and hopes once more grew bright that he might be restored to health.

When Sunday, May 10, dawned quiet and peaceful it was evident that Dr. Fernie had again experienced a relapse and that his vitality was fast ebbing away. His mind was clear and his body was not racked by pain on the last Sabbath of his earthly sojourn. Those who sat watching by the sufferer were themselves comforted by the words of faith and assurance that fell from his lips from time to time. A little past midnight, he breathed his last. His going out was as calm and peaceful as a child falling asleep.

Benjamin James Fernie was born in the town of Halesowen, in Shropshire, England, November 29, 1842, and was the only child of Henry Fernie, a prosperous merchant and leading churchman of that place, and Elizabeth Pittell. He came of a long line of Congregational clergymen, and was educated with a view to following in their footsteps. As his education progressed, he began to develop a love of literature, which grew stronger as the years advanced. He wrote many essays and was an active member of several literary societies in Worcester, and soon began to be known as a writer of ability. He often said that those early days in Worcester were among the happiest of his life. He was a keen nature lover and somewhat disposed to archæology, and greatly enjoyed taking quiet trips into the country and visiting the ancient manor-houses and historic places of which there are many in that part of England. He took long driving trips on the river Severn every summer. The great Gothic cathedral held a special charm for him. He would go to the vesper services, and, half hidden in some quiet corner, listen to the notes of the organ and the sweet voices of the chorists.

He had already so far progressed in journalistic work that he resolved to make it his life profession. Accordingly he went to Leamington, where he passed several years writing for the religious press and acquiring new and valuable experience. In 1876 he moved to London and became one of the editors of the English Christian Herald under the management of Rev. Michael Baxter, in which capacity he did such excellent work that in 1878 he was commissioned by Mr. Baxter to come to this country and establish an American edition. He began work in his new field under many difficulties, but enjoyed a fair measure of success.

When THE CHRISTIAN HERALD passed into the hands of the present Editor and Proprietor, Dr. Louis Klopsch, Dr. Fernie continued with the new management. His contributions to this journal during all these years of service took a wide range, touching every variety of topic suited to the requirements of a religious paper. He was an ardent theologian, soundly orthodox and a great lover of the "old Gospel," which he esteemed as the sole and sovereign remedy not only for the sinner but for all the evils that affect society at the present time. His broad views and generous opinions and the soundness of his Scriptural expositions have received the widest endorsement among the multitudes who read his articles in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Among other unique features which he introduced was the department known as "The Bible and Newspaper"—an application of Scriptural truths to current events.

THE LATE DR. BENJAMIN J. FERNIE

Associate Editor of "The Christian Herald," Born 1842; Died 1908

He conducted it with rare skill and ability up to the very last week of his life.

It would be impossible to estimate the extent of the influence of Dr. Fernie's teachings during all these years of incessant activity. No writer better understood his public, and probably none in recent years has ever come closer to the hearts and consciences of so many of God's people. There were times when his pen literally seemed to be tipped with living Gospel fire. He could move to pity, or rouse to indignation; and through it all there was a vein of kindness and gentle consideration which warmed and comforted even while it admonished. His creed was broad enough to embrace all Christian denominations, and he never failed to present the Fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man in language that was simple, direct and convincing. He was a master of spiritual narrative, and his mind was a storehouse of illustrative anecdote. His knowledge of the Scriptures was something remarkable. Hundreds of sermons, by preachers of every Protestant denomination, passed under his scrutiny every year, many of them the ablest efforts of the leading pulpits of two continents; but he invariably chose the "plain old Gospel" for presentation in the columns of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in preference to those that treated of doctrinal topics or theological disputation. Such was his love of the Bible that it was his constant companion, and after his death his daughter found beneath his pillow the Bible he had used for years. He passed away with his head pillowed upon Christ and the Book. In private life Dr. Fernie was a warm friend and a generous companion, and was greatly loved by his associates. He had at all times a list of private pensioners who lived largely on his bounty—unfortunate men, whom he had helped through years of struggle and adversity. In addition to his editorial duties, he found time to be active in various benevolences. He was one of the officers and directors of the Bowery Mission and an enthusiastic supporter of the work of that institution. He was also an incorporator and trustee of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home at Mont-Lawn. He was one of the founders of the Mayesville, S. C., Industrial Institute for the training of colored boys and girls, an organization which has grown to be one of the most notable of its kind in the country. During its early struggles, his pen and influence helped materially to smooth the way and to bring friends and supporters to the Mayesville work. Besides the foregoing Dr. Fernie was actively identified with practically all of the charities and benevolences, national and international, which have found presentation in the columns of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD during the last twenty years. His whole life was one of unostentatious devotion to duty and he reckoned no sacrifice too great, no expenditure of time and labor too onerous, if only he could assist in bringing comfort to some suffering one or help a wandering soul to find peace and pardon. In recent years, he has written thousands of letters of spiritual advice and consolation, to correspondents in almost every State of the Union, who appealed for counsel at some crisis in their lives. Among these unrecorded efforts of his pen, there are doubtless hundreds of cases where he has been the means of bringing blessing and spiritual consolation to those who needed it above all else. Dr. Fernie leaves a wife and four children.

Three of the latter, one son and two daughters, are married. His wife was Miss Elizabeth Catherine Smeeton, of Warwick, England, and she, like her husband, was a descendant of a family famous for its long line of Congregational preachers.

The funeral took place from his late residence, Bushwick Avenue, Brooklyn, N. Y., on May 13, the services being conducted by Rev. D. Niles, assisted by other pastors. Rev. Dr. Iglehart paid a warm tribute to the deceased, with whom he had been personally acquainted for a number of years. There were many floral tributes, some of them being the offerings of the proprietor and editors of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Mr. Fernie's associates. The interment took place in Evergreen Cemetery, Brooklyn.

has been employed during the past year to carry the Gospel message to unreached, unchurched towns and villages and hold services in these places, similar to those in the floating chapels, the boats, for two or three weeks at a time.

The work has been conducted steadily through the years. At present there are fourteen McAll mission halls in Paris and vicinity, and twenty-eight provincial stations. Marseilles has three missions; Calais, Nice, and Saint-Etienne, two each. The mission at Nemours under Mr. M. E. Darby is the outcome of the visit of the Bonne Nouvelle, which, after a lapse of over two centuries, brought back the New Testament and its wonderful message into the broad and smiling valley of the Loire. In the hitherto Christless little town, preaching services are now regularly held.

The halls of the McAll missions are centres of varied activity. Religious services are held almost daily. In addition there are Sunday and Thursday schools, Societies of Christian Endeavor, mothers' meetings, men's clubs, temperance work and prayer meetings. Many of the workers are French pastors and French lay-workers, who serve, as do many of the English-speaking helpers, for love of the cause, unpaid. About $60,000 annually is the expenditure for the work.

At its twenty-fifth anniversary the American McAll Association pledged itself to a greater effort in the organization of home auxiliaries for the maintenance of this great Gospel work in France. The fact that there is not more than one Protestant to fifty of the population, and not more than one earnest evangelical pastor to fifty thousand people, makes France a fruitful field for evangelizing endeavor. The call comes from scores of places for help from the heavy burden of atheism under which the country has been suffering.

The leaders of the Association are Mrs. Charles H. Parkhurst, New York City, President; Mrs. Abraham R. Perkins, 302 West Upsal Street, Germantown, Philadelphia, Pa., Treasurer; Mrs. H. L.

Finns Against Socialism

THE Finnish people throughout the United States, and especially in the West, are making a determined effort to stamp out the anarchy and discontent which have been instilled into some of their people by unscrupulous leaders. Those of Socialistic tendencies represent only about two per cent. of the Finns in this country. The majority of the Finns are good, law-abiding, Christian people, who wish to command the respect of the country of their adoption. To set themselves right before the public they have issued a protest which they hope will bring them the good will of all true American citizens. At a meeting recently held in Eveleth, Minn., resolutions denouncing the Socialists were signed by 260 Finnish citizens.

Our Dead Associate

DEATH has again invaded the editorial circle of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Dr. Benjamin J. Fernie, our veteran Associate and the longest in service, has gone from us. His chair is vacant, and his familiar place knows him no more. His kindly face, his valued counsel and ripe judgment, the store of knowledge that was always available to those who enjoyed his friendship—all are passed beyond recall.

But the influence of his life and work during these thirty years of service remains, and will continue to be felt as the years roll on. His life was devoted to the uplift of humanity. He gave to the poor, the suffering, the sin-burdened, the best that was in him. His unselfish helpfulness, his innate generosity, the spontaneous outpourings of his inmost spiritual convictions, which found expression in his editorial work and in his daily life, were felt far and wide. His hand was ever open to the needy, his heart ever ready to sympathize with the distressed, and his pen was at the service of every good work. To thousands of those in spiritual trouble, his cheering words and sound Gospel advice have brought consolation and hope.

Touching countless lives, who can estimate the moral and spiritual influence of such a worker?

To his associates who labored by his side, he was a dear comrade and a beloved friend. They will long cherish his memory and they know that this world was better because he lived in it, and performed so faithfully and well the work allotted to him.

Memorial Day

MORE than forty years have passed since the white flowers of peace sprang from the crimson soil of war in this great land of ours. During four terrible years, indelibly stamped on the memories of all who lived through that fateful period, the one topic in every home, North and South, was the war. Probably no similar war in the long history of the world involved issues more vital to a nation than did this Civil War of ours. Certainly no war of modern times shows a longer list of men slain in battle, of homes bereft of their natural supporters, of men crippled and wounded, of towns burned and looted, in short, of the awful calamities and catastrophes that follow in the wake of fraternal strife.

Forty years is a very brief interval in the life of a nation, although it looms large in the life of an individual. It has been a sufficient time to prove that the peace which followed the conflict was to be enduring, and to bring forth constantly fruits of good will and prosperity. The men who did the fighting did not remain foes when the battles were over. They were soon ready to clasp hands in friendship; and when there came the little flurry of the Spanish-American War, which, compared to the other, was a mere tempest in a teapot, those who wore the blue and those who wore the gray were again ready to stand shoulder to shoulder under the old flag.

The young people who have grown up since the Civil War do not in the least understand what that storm of passion and those days of anguish meant to North and South. To the children at school the story is a chapter to be learned and recited, and it is much less interesting in their eyes than the earlier story of the Revolution, or the still earlier one of the French and Indian War. Although this state of things is a little irritating to the people who were part of the tremendous time, when both North and South had their heroes, and when an honest difference of opinion could be settled only by the sword, it is, on the whole, perfectly healthy and natural and altogether for the best. As time passes, every asperity will be softened, old hates will be obliterated, and everywhere the united nation will take pride in standing in the front rank of the world's progress.

Memorial Day, originating in a desire to decorate the graves of the dead who had died in battle, preserves and epitomizes a tender and beautiful sentiment. We have too few such aids to patriotism. The day gives us another opportunity for a holiday in the early summer, when nature is everywhere doing her utmost to repair waste places and make beautiful the gardens and fields.

The quiet sleepers who will never again wake to reveille until the resurrection morn, were sturdy men-at-arms and performed their allotted tasks with valor while they lived. They have left us a legacy worth more than gold, they were brave and loyal, and they fought a good fight, under whichever flag they fell. They would not wish to cloud the gaiety of youth, nor to be remembered to-day with tears. The laughter of happy crowds, the refreshment of a day's outing for busy toilers, is a good way of keeping their memory green.

The Motto to Go Back

IN behalf of all thoughtful and reverent Americans THE CHRISTIAN HERALD extends congratulations to the members of the Finance Committee of the United States Senate for its action on the bill providing for the restoration of the motto, "In God We Trust," to the national coinage. On May 12, Senator Bailey, of Texas, called up the bill in Committee, and it was unanimously approved. It was then placed on the Senate calendar, and next day was passed by a unanimous vote.

By passing the bill, the Senators as well as the Representatives have won what is far more precious than cheap applause: the grateful remembrances of loyal, patriotic, God-fearing Americans everywhere.

To Senators Bailey, Aldrich, Burrows and their associates, and to Representatives Sheppard, of Texas, James, of Kentucky, and McKinley, of Illinois (author of the Restoration Bill), especial thanks are due for the splendid service they have rendered in a matter which affected neither politics nor tariffs, nor any similar considerations, but which touched the hearts and consciences and stirred the highest patriotism of the American people.

As long as the stars shine out on our nation's flag; as long as the Republic endures, may the motto remain, to show to the world that we are not a people living in spiritual darkness, but that we reverently acknowledge God in all things, and look to him as the Author of all our blessings.

Converging Views

A FRANK discussion of an important social question has the same effect, if the question is one of morals, that good ventilation has upon a crowded building. Those who remember Dwight L. Moody, the great evangelist, recall his dislike of an auditorium where the people were drowsy because of bad air. On one occasion, when speaking from a platform in a large city, Mr. Moody suddenly stopped and said, "Those who are afraid of draughts will please put on their overcoats and wraps. The Lord does not want us to worship him in a poisoned atmosphere. I request the janitor to open all the windows and the audience will rise and sing a hymn." On another occasion at Northfield, when people were growing restless and uneasy, Mr. Moody again paused abruptly and said, "There is some reason why you can not sit still. I think the reason must be that your attention has been too long directed to one point. I shall ask the Mount Hermon choir to sing again, and then we will resume the subject which we are studying." Frank discussion and fresh air are essential if we are ever to arrive at helpful conclusions in matters relating to the good of society. Socialism has been much misunderstood, and confused in some quarters with anarchy, with which it has nothing whatever to do. Socialism merely aims to carry forward in modern times the Gospel of St. Paul. As one member of the physical body can not suffer without involving the whole body in pain and weakness, so there can be no injustice, no distress, no wretchedness in any part of a nation that does not, sooner or later, send a vibration of suffering through the nation as a whole.

There are two kinds of Socialism—the one good, the other the twin-brother of Anarchism. True Socialism, written large, means the brotherhood of man and the Fatherhood of God. It aims to elevate and uplift, not to disorganize and destroy. It has nothing in common with the so-called Socialism which finds expression in violence and which sows widespread the seeds of discontent.

Religious Child-Training

The Last Editorial Written by Dr. Fernie

LETTERS that come to us from all parts of the country show that with all our study and experience we have not yet solved the problem of religious education. In some districts the utmost liberty prevails, in others the teacher is restricted to reading the Bible without comment, and others the Bible is altogether excluded from the schools. To each of these systems there are strong objections. No conscientious parent is willing to have his child taught in school doctrines that he regards as erroneous. Though the majority of his fellow citizens believe in those doctrines and so are able to have teachers of that creed appointed, he naturally resents such teaching being given. In the schools where the Bible is read without comment, the difficulty of answering questions that a intelligent child is sure to ask must be felt by every teacher, and he is naturally puzzled how to give the information required without touching the delicate ground of doctrinal belief. The third plan of excluding the Bible altogether, offends still more decidedly the religious conscience. It is felt to be utterly inconsistent to leave out of the educational programme the Book which is the basis of our civilization.

In the face of these difficulties shall the child be reared without any religious education? Shall we sharpen his intellectual faculties and equip him with accomplishments and give him full store of knowledge, and fail to deal with the soul, the most important part of his nature? Will not such a course increase his powers of doing evil, without directing him to that spiritual force which could restrain the evil? Under such a system, shall we not throw wide the gates that keep the road to vice and immorality, to chicanery and fraud?

There is another alternative that should be applied in any case. The Church, in its many denominations, ought to take up the difficulty. It is obvious that the home instruction is inadequate. The parents, who are the natural teachers, are too often compelled by the exigency of life to leave the religious teaching of the child to others. The fact has been recognized by the organization of the Sunday School; but it is obvious that the brief period that the child once a week is taught spiritual and divine things bears no relation to their importance. It is evident that the time has come when all the churches must make better provision for the religious education of the children, both in striving to make the Sunday School more efficient, and by enlarging its opportunities by special services for children, or in some other way. To ignore the subject is to invite social as well as religious peril.

The address delivered by Dr. F. C. Iglehart, D.D., at the funeral of Dr. Benjamin J. Fernie, will appear in next week's issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

A Temple of Republics

ON May 11, President Roosevelt, in the City of Washington, laid the cornerstone of the first International Temple of Peace, Friendship and Commerce, the tangible evidence of the desire of the twenty-one American Republics that war shall be no more in the Western world and that material prosperity promoted by international trade shall take its place. Distinguished men were present at the laying of the cornerstone and messages were spoken or sent by representatives from all of the twenty-one republics of America. The new building is to be the joint property of all the republics. The site provided by the American Congress is within a few hundred yards of the White House and is adjacent to the State, War and Navy Buildings and the Corcoran Art Gallery. Mr. Andrew Carnegie contributed three-fourths of a million dollars to the erection of the building and each of the republics has added an appropriation to the fund. The building is to be the home of the International Bureau, maintained by the American republics and is to be made the centre of a continuous campaign of education, where one country may obtain accurate and up-to-date information of any other. A library on all subjects American is to be secured, and by every possible means the American governments are to be brought closer together with intimate acquaintanceship. The imposing building will stand on a five-acre reservation. It will be 169 feet square, the main portion standing two stories above a huge studded basement and being in turn surmounted by dignified balustrades. The rear portion, in order to cover a capacious assembly hall, will rise still higher. The general architecture will suggest Latin-American treatment, out of respect to the fact that twenty out of the twenty-one republics are of Latin origin. A large reading room will be a feature, where can be seen all the South as well as North American publications, besides important historical data. A beautiful assembly chamber that, for present purposes, may be called the "Hall of the American Ambassadors," will provide the only room of its kind in the United States especially designed for international conventions, receptions to distinguished foreigners, and for diplomatic and social events of a kindred nature. The bureau is strictly an international and independent organization maintained by the joint contributions, based on population, of the twenty-one American governments. We have not been without our difficult problems of solution in the United States, but the republics of South America have had a very troublesome and disastrous time in their national and international struggles and revolutions. The success of the United States government has been a splendid example and inspiration to the sister republics of the South, and the foundation of this Pan-American Palace of Peace, Friendship and Commerce, is an important epoch and will be a potent instrument in securing the prosperity and happiness of the Western Hemisphere, and in promoting that good will among men and nations which is the ideal and purpose of the King of kings.

And they shall beat their swords into plowshares, and their spears into pruninghooks: nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more. (Isaiah 2: 4.)

The Sad Leper Girl

Bertha Osis, a Russian girl leper, brought from Penikese Island, Buzzard's Bay, on the Cape Verde packet schooner Ramona to New York reant's illness. She was sent to the Massachusetts leper colony on Penikese Island. When it was found that she had not been here three years the authorities were very glad of a chance to send her back to Russia. She was placed in the padded lunatic hospital on the foredeck of the Hellig Olav. There may be prudential reasons that justify this course, but it seems a pitiful thing to send this poor girl back to Russia to die, when she desires to remain in this country. Whom the hand of man casts out, the heart of God takes in. The great Physician who in the parlor of the church. He was one of the truest and best men we had in this church, always faithful to every trust, and was constancy personified. I am certain if he had had his choice of a place from which to go to heaven, next after his own home, he would have selected the house of God, which he loved like he did his own life." A death like this at first seems a very shocking thing, and yet, could there be anything more beautiful than for a father in Israel to be translated from the house of the Lord? And the suddenness of his taking off was only the chariot with steeds of a little swifter foot or a band of angels with a little swifter wing, sent to carry his faithful child home.

And Enoch walked with God: and he was not; for God took him. (Gen. 5: 24.)

Waste Forces

Mr. J. J. Hill, president of the Great Northern Railway, made an address at the Congress of Governors held at the White House, in which he emphasizes, in a very strong manner, the waste of the natural resources of the country. Among other things he says:

The forests of this country, the product of centuries of growth, are fast disappearing. The best estimates reckon our standing merchantable timber at less than 2,000,000,000,000 feet. Our annual cut is about 40,000,000,000 feet. We are consuming yearly three or four times as much timber as forest growth restores. Our supply of some varieties will be practically exhausted in ten or twelve years; in the case of others, without reforestation, the present century will see the end.

The exhaustion of our coal supply is not in the indefinite future. The startling feature of our coal production is not so much the magnitude of the annual output as its rate of growth. If coal production continues to increase as it has in the last ninety years, the available supply will be greatly reduced by the close of the century.

The iron industry tells a similar story. The total of iron ore mined in the United States doubles about once in seven years. Our production now is over 600 pounds per capita. We do not work a mine, build a house, weave a fabric, prepare a meal or cultivate an acre of ground under modern methods without the aid of iron. And the supply of this most precious of all metals is so far from inexhaustible, that it seems as if iron and coal might be united in their disappearance from common life.

It is vitally important to stop the destruction of forests, the evaporation of rivers, the exhaustion of mines, the impoverishment of the soil, but it is still more important to stop the tremendous wastes in the mental, moral, and spiritual realm. It is more necessary to cure the wastes of the intellect, caused by ignorance or idleness, that of moral loss produced by evil appetite and bad habit, and to the spiritual nature, caused by indolence, selfishness and sin. If the religious energies of the followers of Christ in the world to-day could only be utilized, it would be a very little time before the whole world would be brought into his Kingdom.

And not many days after the younger son gathered all together and took his journey into a far country; and there wasted his substance with riotous living. (Luke 15: 13.)

Her deportation has been ordered at the request of the State of Massachusetts. She dreaded going back to Russia. She begged to be allowed to live and die on Penikese Island, with her leper companion, Lucy Peterson. She fears that her native country may send her to Siberia. She easily passed the physical examination at Ellis Island for admission to the country. She took service with a family at Brookline, Mass. In August last the Boston Board of Health received an anonymous letter revealing the nature of the serv-

Translated From the Church

It was on a beautiful Sunday morning recently that Father Osborne went to the Tremont Methodist Church, of New York City, to worship as usual. The minister was at prayer when he reached the vestibule. He went into the church parlor and before the minister's prayer was ended he sank down in his chair and died. Dr. Barnett, the pastor, said: "I have a sad announcement to make to this congregation. Father Osborne has just passed away

CLOSE OF THE NORFOLK REVIVAL

THE Chapman-Alexander two weeks' mission in Norfolk, Va., has closed with the whole city aroused with new spiritual fervor. Many hundreds have confessed Christ; thousands of church members have been quickened, and a new impetus has been given to Christian work of every kind.

One evening, an actor about to leave the city dropped into the meeting to while away the time before his train departed. He was so deeply impressed that he did not leave the city that night. He became deeply concerned for his soul's welfare and remained in the city for nearly a week, attending the meetings night after night. One evening he sent in a request for prayer, signed, "A Son of Sin." When a worker spoke to him one night, he confessed that he was tired of the life and that he knew he ought to become a Christian. He further stated that his father had been a Baptist minister, and his mother was a godly woman. He had, however, just signed a contract for theatrical work and could not see his way out of the dilemma before him. That night, however, alone in his room, he definitely accepted Christ, and will quit the profession.

Several reporters have joined the Pocket Testament League and are enthusiastic over it. One who has reported the meetings continuously was on a leading Philadelphia paper during the work of Dr. Torrey and Mr. Alexander there two years ago, and was converted. At the conclusion of the first meeting in Norfolk, he went back to the newspaper office, overflowing with happiness and singing "The Old Time Religion." Quickly the other reporters and even the printers gathered around him, and they made the newspaper office ring with the old-time revival melody.

Among the many remarkable conversions which have occurred here, one of the most interesting is related by Mr. William Asher, the Rescue Mission evangelist. One night, at the conclusion of his Gospel meeting in a low class variety theatre, he was walking along the street talking with a man, when he noticed a man walking in front who was partially intoxicated, but seemed eager to speak to him. After a few moments' talk the man definitely accepted Christ, and they had prayer just as they sat together on the door step. It turned out that he was the manager of a store in Norfolk. This man's wife afterward told how their home had been transformed since her husband had accepted Christ.

A dramatic event was the children's parade two days before the mission ended. Nearly 7,000 children from the Sunday Schools of the city formed in line and marched through the streets, headed by a sailors' brass band, and by a company of marines and another of militia. A throng of about twelve thousand gathered in the square in front of the Court House, where brief addresses were delivered by Dr. Chapman, Mr. Charles T. Schaeffer, the Children's Evangelist, and Mr. and Mrs. Alexander. On the steps of the Court House was a children's choir composed of several hundred boys and girls arranged in the form of an American flag.

The last day of the Mission was "Mothers' Day." In the afternoon, old ladies were carried to the church in carriages and automobiles.

Miss Bertha Irene Chapman, daughter of the evangelist, has helped and inspired thousands by her beautiful singing of new and old Gospel hymns. She is to be married on June 2 at the home of her father at Winona Lake, Ind., to Rev. C. P. Goodson, pastor of the King's Highway Presbyterian Church in St. Louis.

The Norfolk Mission closes the season's work of the evangelists. After a mass meeting at Kansas City, May 23, in connection with the Presbyterian General Assembly in that city, Mr. Alexander and his wife will sail for England. The latter part of July they expect to return to this country to be present at the Christian Workers' Conference at Northfield, Mass., and at the Bible Conference at Winona Lake, Ind. Next fall Dr. Chapman and Mr. Alexander expect to spend several months working in England.

NOT only cakes and tidies gave Mrs. Kendall food for thought during those first few days after Margaret's return. From the very nature of the case it was, of necessity, a period of adjustment; and to Mrs. Kendall's consternation there was every indication of friction, if not disaster.

For four years now her young daughter had been away from her tender care and influence; and for only one of these four years—the last—had she come under the influence of any sort of refinement or culture, and then under only such as a city missionary and an overworked school-teacher could afford, supplemented by the two trips to Mont-Lawn. To be sure, behind it all had been Margaret's careful training for the first five years of her life, and it was because of this training that she had so quickly yielded to what good influence she had known in the last year. The Alley, however, was not Five Oaks; and the standards of one did not measure up to those of the other. It was not easy for "Mag of the Alley" to become at once Margaret Kendall, the dainty little daughter of a well-bred, fastidious mother.

To the doctor—the doctor who had gone to New York and brought Margaret home, and who knew her as she was—Mrs. Kendall went for advice.

"What shall I do?" she asked anxiously. "A hundred times a day the dear child's speech, movements and actions are not what I like them to be. And yet—if I correct each one, it will be a continual 'don't' all day. Why, doctor, the child will—hate me!"

"As if any one could do that!" smiled the doctor; and the look in his eyes Mrs. Kendall dropped her own—the happiness that had come to her with this man's love was very new; she had scarcely yet looked it squarely in the face.

"The child is so good and loving," she went on, a little hurriedly, "that it makes it all the harder—but I must do something. Only this morning he told the minister that she brought Houghtonsville was a bully place," and that the people were 'tiptop.' Her table manners—poor child! I ran away from the table and cried like a baby the first time I saw her eat; and yet—perhaps the very next thing she does will be so dainty and sweet that I could declare the other was all a dream. Doctor, what shall I do?"

"I know, I know," nodded the man. I have seen it myself. But, dear, he'll learn—she'll learn wonderfully fast. You'll see. It's in her—the gentleness and the refinement. She'll have to be corrected some, of course; it's out of the question that she shouldn't be. But she'll come out straight. Her heart is all right."

Mrs. Kendall laughed softly, though her eyes were moist.

"Her heart, doctor!" she exclaimed. "Just there lies the greatest problem of all. The one creed of her life is to 'divvy up,' and how I'm going to teach her ordinary ideas of living without shattering all her faith in me I don't know. Why, Harry"—Mrs. Kendall's voice was tragic—"she gazes at me with round eyes of horror because I have two coats and two hats and two loaves of bread, and haven't yet 'divvied up' with some one who has none. So far her horror is tempered by the fact that she is sure I didn't know before that there were any poor people seen Joe Bagley yesterday morning I'm afraid you'd have changed your opinion of her gentleness. She—she fought him!" Mrs. Kendall stumbled over the words, and flushed a painful red as she spoke them.

"Fought him—Joe Bagley!" gasped the doctor. "Why, he's almost twice her size."

"Yes, I know, but that didn't seem to occur to Margaret," returned Mrs. Kendall. "She saw only the kitten he was tormenting, and—well, she rescued the kitten, and then administered what she deemed to be fit punishment

Kendall, faintly; but she shivered again as if with a sudden chill.

CHAPTER III

SCARCELY had Houghtonsville recovered from its first shock of glad surprise at Margaret's safe return, when it was shaken again to its very centre by the news of Mrs. Kendall's engagement to Dr. Spencer.

The old Kendall estate had been for more than a generation the "show place" of the town. Even during the years immediately following the loss of little Margaret, when the great stone lions on either side of the steps had kept guard over closed doors and shuttered windows—even then the place was pointed out to strangers for its beauty, as well as for the tragedy that had so recently made it a living tomb to its mistress. Sometimes, though not often, a glimpse might be caught of a slender, black-robed woman, and always there could be seen the one unshuttered window on the second floor. Every one knew the story of that window, and of the sunlit room beyond, where lay the little woolly dog just as the baby hands had dropped it there years before; and every one knew that the black-robed woman, widow of Frank Kendall and mother of the lost little girl, was grieving her heart out in the great lonely house.

Not until the last two years of Margaret's absence had there come a change, and then it was so gradual that the townspeople scarcely noticed it. Little by little, however, the air of gloom left the house. One by one the blinds were thrown open to the sunlight, and more and more frequently Mrs. Kendall was seen walking in the garden, or even upon the street. Not until the news of the engagement had come, however, did Houghtonsville people realize the doctor's part in all this. Then they understood. It was he who had ministered to her diseased body, and still more diseased mind; he who had roused her from her apathy of despair; and he who had taught her that the world was full of other griefs even as bitter as her own.

Not twenty-four hours after the news of the engagement became public property, old Nathan—town gossip, and driver-in-chief to a generation of physicians, Dr. Spencer included—observed triumphantly:

"And I ain't a mite surprised, neither. It's a good thing, too. They're jest suited ter each other. Ain't they been traipsin' all over town tergether, an' ridin' whar 'twas too fur ter foot it? . . . Ter be sure, they allers went ter some one's that was sick, an' allers took jellies an' things ter eat an' read; but I had eyes, an' I ain't a fool. She did good, though—heaps of it; an' 'tain't no wonder the doctor fell head over heels in love with her. . . . An' thar was the little gal, too. Didn't he go twice ter New York a-huntin'?"

who did not have all these things. Now that she has told me of them, she confidently looks to me to do my obvious duty at once."

The doctor laughed. "As if you weren't always doing things for people!" he said fondly; then he grew suddenly grave. "The dear child! I'm afraid that along with her education and her civilization her altruism will get a few hard knocks. But—she'll get over that, too. You'll see. At heart she's so gentle and—why, what—" he broke off with an unspoken question, his eyes widely opened at the change that had come to the other's face.

"Oh, nothing," returned Mrs. Kendall, almost despairingly, "only if you'd there and then. When I arrived on the scene they were the centre of an admiring crowd of children"—Mrs. Kendall shuddered visibly—"and Margaret was just delivering herself of a final blow that sent the great bully off blubbering."

"Good for her!"—It was an involuntary tribute straight from the heart.

"Harry!" gasped Mrs. Kendall. "Good—a delicate girl!"

"No, no, of course not," murmured the doctor hastily, though his eyes still glowed. "It won't do, of course; but you must remember her life, her struggle for very existence all those years. She had to train her fists to fight her way."

"I—I suppose so," admitted Mrs.

THE POWER OF AN ENDLESS LIFE

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts*

THE same day at evening." It was the evening of the first Lord's Day, on which Jesus had risen from the dead. He had risen early in the morning, even before it was light. Where had he been all day? Mary had met him beside the tomb in the garden; and the holy women had met him on their way to the apostles; and two travelers had walked with him on the way to Emmaus, though they did not know with whom they walked. He had sat at table in their home, and had broken bread with them, and then had vanished out of their sight.

"The doors were shut where the disciples were assembled for fear of the Jews." Probably in the same upper room where they had eaten the Lord's Supper with Jesus. They were all there save Thomas. Two men from Emmaus had come to tell the apostles that they had seen the risen Christ and had walked with him. Why were the disciples fearing the Jews, when they should have been waiting in tenderest expectancy for him who had sent them word that they should go into Galilee to meet him? But the message had seemed an idle tale of the women, and they believed them not. And neither did they believe the testimony of the two from Emmaus.

"Jesus came and stood in the midst." Did they welcome him with open arms or with reverent salutations? No, we are told, "they were terrified and affrighted and supposed that they had seen a spirit." And why? Because Jesus came into their midst without the door being opened. Jesus' resurrection body may have differed from his previous body, but certainly it must have been known to them that Jesus had the power to appear and disappear at will (Luke 4: 28-30; John 8: 10-39).

"Peace be unto you." A beautiful message from the Prince of Peace. It meant peace with God, sins forgiven, harmony with the will of God; the peace of righteousness (John 14: 17, 21, 23); peace in their desires to all mankind. It was this large peace that Christ desired for his followers. This was the customary form of salutation, "Salaam," but it had new meanings coming from the lips of Christ.

"He shewed them his hands and his side." This he did in tender, divine patience, giving a sign by which they might know him. Seeing the nail prints and the spear wound they would surely know he was their very Jesus. And to convince them that he was not a spirit, he asked for food, and when they brought him broiled fish and honey comb, he ate of it (Luke 24: 41-43).

"As my Father has sent me, even so I send you." It was their commission to go into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature. He breathed on them and said unto them, "Receive ye the Holy Spirit." And so power was given unto them to forgive sins.

A larger measure of power was promised to them (Luke 24: 49), which was realized at Pentecost. Oh that we might feel his inspiring breath upon us to fit us for loving service to all about us, in our home and in the world. We know that he is breathing upon us when we feel him in our thoughts.

"Thomas was not with them when Jesus came." How much he missed by being absent! He was so outside of the circle of sympathy that he declared he would not believe it was Jesus himself until he should put his fingers into the nail prints and thrust his hand into Jesus' side. Some one has said: "Thomas was not so much of a doubter as he was a realist."

not "the power of an endless life"? When the apostles were fully assured that there was life beyond death for Christ and so for themselves, they were prepared for service and even for sacrifice in this world as their training for a larger life beyond, and because in such service they would still be serving a living Master.

"Nothing more perfectly reveals the moral character of a doubter," says N. J. Cooke, "than the instinctive tendencies of his mind during his mental conflicts. In Pilgrim's Progress, Christian and Pliable both fell into the Slough of Despond. Pliable struggled to the side nearest to the City of Destruction, but Christian, with infinite toil, reached the side nearest the Celestial City." Thomas got out of the slough of doubt on the celestial side, and developed into an have been under suspicion of collusion if more uniform.

The story of Thomas illustrates the saying that "immortality was brought to light by the Gospel." A party of tourists, each carrying a candle, were exploring a celebrated cave in America. One of them was feeling greatly disappointed with the place, of which he had heard much. But suddenly the guide set light to a roll of magnesium ribbon he carried. In a moment the whole scene was changed. The grandeur, height and beauty of his surroundings now held that disappointed visitor spellbound. Dropping his candle, he gazed in awe and delight at the wonderful effects of mingled crystals and stalactite as revealed by that clear and splendid light.

Many years afterwards, describing some of the details of the sight, that American minister compared himself when exploring that cave to a man reading God's Word, with only the little candle of his own human intellect to guide him. He may be learned enough to translate it into four or five languages and yet fail to see the risen Christ revealed in it, or to discover any of its hidden beauties, because he has not dropped his own candle and relied on the illumination of "the Spirit of Truth." "The Spirit searcheth all things, yea the deep things of God." "He will guide you into all truth."

"Why, Peter, still at work on that same great chain? What a slow fellow you are! Hurry up, man, and get to something else." The old blacksmith smiled and carefully examined the last link of the chain. Did it ring sound? Was it absolutely flawless? that was the question. Link by link the chain grew, and was coiled in a corner of the smithy, but by and by the patient old hands that had done their work so faithfully were forever folded to rest.

And men came and carried away the huge chain and put it on board a ship, where it lay unnoticed and unused for many days. One dark night a storm arose. The captain, looking anxiously into the darkness, said to himself, "We are in for a gale." Soon he commanded the men to let go the anchor. Down she sank through the boiling waves, until the anchor at last touched bottom. "Will it hold?" the sailors wondered, as they felt the ship quiver under each fresh shock. One imperfect link, and the chain must snap. But the anchor held; every link of the chain was perfect.

Faith's anchor chain has four links: the belief of the intellect, the submission of the will, the trust of the heart, the faithfulness (faith made full) of the life, and every one of these links must be strongly made, for a chain is no stronger than its weakest link. Many are carried away by every wind of doctrine because their intellectual beliefs are weak and uncertain, or their will lacks decision and persistency.

"Thomas, reach hither thy hand and thrust it into my side"

"After eight days." It was the next Sabbath evening, the apostles being again assembled in the upper room, not for fear of the Jews, but expecting that Jesus might come again, and Thomas was this time one of the number. And Jesus did appear as before, the doors being shut. And again Jesus greeted them with, "Peace be unto you." He had hidden himself all that week as if once more to make the first day of the week the day of days.

"Thomas, reach hither thy finger and behold my hands, and reach hither thy hand and thrust it into my side, and be not faithless but believing." Who had told Jesus of Thomas's unbelief? We do not know. Jesus did not need to be told, for he can read all hearts.

"My Lord and my God." Thus did Thomas make his confession.

"Because thou hast seen me thou hast believed." It was a gentle reproach, and yet severe, as Jesus contrasted him with those who would believe without visible proof.

What now is the central mountain range of truth in these verses? Is it active, brave disciple. A traveler in India a few years ago came in contact with a large band of Christian people who called themselves "St. Thomas Christians," and claimed to be the descendants of those who had heard the apostle Thomas preach the Gospel. They also claimed that no missionary had ever been among them.

The martyrdoms which the apostles endured because of their belief that Christ had risen from the dead and was a living Lord and Saviour proves that they fully believed it. That Paul, the educated persecutor, became a witness unto death that Christ lived and reigned, converted one great infidel, Lytleton, who could find no other cause than the resurrection of Christ that would be adequate to produce such a marvelous result. Greenleaf, the standard authority among lawyers on the laws of evidence, finds that the New Testament proof of the resurrection and other facts of Christ's life bear all the legal tests of historic evidence, seeming discrepancies being especially valuable as showing the independence and truthfulness of the witnesses, whose testimony would

Commencement Days

A HOST of young people will soon arrive at that brilliant turning point in life known as Commencement. It used to be a puzzle to my juvenile mind why the ending of the school year should be called the commencement, the latter word being to me synonymous with beginning. Yet the close of a college term of four consecutive years is in reality the commencement of active life for the students who must now enter the ranks of the world's workers. In this country we have few idlers. The sons of the rich as frequently as the sons of the poor enter upon careers of absorbing activity. Their education has all along been intended to fit them for the places they are to fill. One of the best things college education accomplishes, is to break down certain foolish barriers of caste and to obliterate accidental distinctions that come from circumstance and fortune. The girl who has had a liberal allowance has shared recitations and competed in sport with another girl who was glad to make a little money go a long way, who very likely paid part of her expenses by hard work in the summer vacation, or by undertaking extra duties out of college. The man who works his way and who is frankly unable to afford any expense that has to do with mere pleasure, may be as popular a fellow as his friend who owns a motor-car or drives his own horses, belonging to the set who wear purple and fine linen. Snobbishness seldom thrives in college life.

The last week before the break-up has its side of shadow to young men and women who must henceforth go on their separate ways. As never before they realize that childhood with its dreams and joys must now be left behind. They shoulder their burdens and step forward gallantly on the path of maturity.

Each summer sees a throng of newcomers in professional ranks. The young doctors and lawyers and ministers who begin to serve the public are not precisely discounted on account of youth, particularly in the medical and clerical ranks. Possibly the young lawyer must wait longer to gain a firm foothold than the man who chooses another profession, because most people are reluctant to risk their property in inexperienced hands. An old lawyer keeps on winning laurels and receiving large retainer fees at a period when congregations show no little weariness with an elderly pastor, for example. A physician has a protracted career of usefulness, and so long as his strength continues and his professional reputation is unblemished, he may count on the loyalty of his patients. There is, nevertheless, a deepening impression as to the value of youth in the medical profession. Constant advances are made both in medical practice and surgery, and the young doctor who wins his diploma this year, who is willing to work hard and to grind, who in every way keeps himself up to date, may confidently look for a good measure of success without too long a delay. As in the past, so in the future, it will be proved that there are surprises in store for parents and faculties. It is not always the graduate whose record has been most brilliant and who has taken the largest number of prizes who achieves most in the competitions of real life. The hard working, plodding student often surpasses in the race the classmate who carried all before him in academic days. On the whole, the men and women who will make most of their lives have had an all-round training, physically and mentally, and bring health, energy, common sense, and disciplined powers to the every-day contest.

Girl Graduates and Gowns

The cost of a daughter's graduation from either high school or college is often appalling to the man of moderate means. In some localities little girls cannot be graduated from the grammar school without a really absurd outlay in the way of flowers, satin slippers, a frilled frock and a carriage, the whole amounting to a bill of expense that will cripple a poor family for several weeks. The custom of making the graduation ceremony an affair in which presents loom large on the part of friends and neighbors is to be deprecated, and indeed it would be in far better taste to have a change of a radical nature in the whole proceeding. So long as there is one girl in a class who cannot easily afford the expense of a costly graduating gown, the rest of the class should forego ostentation in favor of simplicity. Seldom is there a class of any size in which there are not several girls to whom the expense of graduation is an incubus. Either young girls should be graduated in their ordinary caps and gowns, a custom that obtains in some colleges, or else they should be limited

By Margaret E. Sangster

Our Girls and Marriage

I REMEMBER an old-fashioned gentleman who was fond of saying that in his opinion no young woman was ready for marriage unless she could make a shirt, broil a beefsteak, and bake a loaf of bread. In his early days it seems that shirts were made by hand, with no end of fine, dainty stitches, including hemstitching on bosoms and wristbands. The old gentleman said that unless a girl was past-mistress of this sort of fine sewing, she would never make a good wife. Then, too, he held that she must be a thoroughly competent cook, or else she could not supervise the oven and the gridiron. Times change and we change with them. Although many good people affirm an opposite opinion, I have always held that an intelligent American girl may easily acquire everything she needs to know about practical housekeeping in a few weeks. As for the making of shirts, that difficult art has now passed out of the domestic realm into the hands of manufacturers, and girls are not expected to know anything about it. It is, in fact, much more expensive to make such articles at home than to buy them. But as in these days many young women are looking forward to marriage, it is well worth their while to consider what a young wife specially needs to be prepared for her vocation. For one thing she needs firm and elastic health. By this is not so much meant actual robustness as the sort of buoyant health that enables one to go through the day's work without headache and backache, that enables a woman to smile at nerves and hysteria, and helps her to be a good comrade to the man she has married. Next, a young wife needs a serene, quiet, and unceasing faith in God. A wife who marries without real faith has no defense against the trials that are inevitable in every life. Again, she needs common sense and patience, and these will enable her to adjust herself to circumstances and to keep from fretting when she discovers that though her husband may remain her lover, he will not always continue in the stage of adoration that appertained to courtship. A young wife should learn how to cut her garments according to her cloth, how to economize, how to make the most of a little, how to assume her place as a member of society with dignity. She will make the greatest of mistakes if she turns herself unnecessarily into a drudge, if she runs to wait on her husband at times when he might as well wait upon her, and if she contentedly slips into the background while he steps to the front. Wives sometimes do this through thoughtlessness. Husbands are public spirited and gradually drift into having a great many engagements outside the home, while wives remain simply and solely domestic. There should always be the golden mean. Nobody can make so good a wife to an American man as an American girl, and we cannot help regretting that so often our American girls are turning away from their native land, and giving themselves to foreign husbands. No matter how high the place a man may have to offer abroad, those of us who are conservative think our girls would be happier and safer were they to choose their mates at home.

To Remove Swedenborg's Body

The body of Emanuel Swedenborg, after resting in the vault at the Swedish Church, St. George's-in-the-East, London, for 136 years, is shortly to be removed to Sweden and reinterred there. Application was made a few years ago for its removal, but was refused by the British government. Now the application has come from the Swedish government itself and the request has been granted. The body will be conveyed to its final resting place by the Swedish frigate Fijgia.

THE TEA PARTY

We have such fun when dolly's friend comes here to visit her and me. All day we play, and at the end I give them both a cup of tea.

to the wearing of precisely such a costume as they usually have for attendance at church and Sunday School.

Tennyson's Princess should be read over again in these summer days. What a gift of prophecy the poet had! Little he knew how swiftly his dreams were destined to come true, and how familiar every one would be before very long with the sweet girl graduate in her golden hair. There is a great deal of sound philosophy as well as of beautiful poetry and eloquent diction in Tennyson's immortal idyl.

The Transformation of Margaret

fur her, an' wa'n't it through him that they finally got her? 'Course 'twas. 'Twas him that told Mis' Kendall 'bout that 'ere Mont-Lawn whar they sends them poor little city kids ter get a breath o' fresh air; an' 'twas him that sent on the twenty-one dollars for her, so's she could name a bed fur little Margaret; an' 'twas him that at last went ter New York an' fetched her home. Yes, 'twas allers him. Thar wa'n't no way out of it, I say. They jest had ter get engaged!"

It was not long before the most of Houghtonsville—in sentiment, if not in words—came to old Nathan's opinion: this prospective marriage was an ideal arrangement, after all, and not in the least surprising. There only remained now the pleasant task of making the wedding a joyful affair befitting the traditions of the town and the honored name of Kendall.

In all Houghtonsville, perhaps, there was only one heart that did not beat in sympathy, and that one, strangely enough, belonged to Mrs. Kendall's own daughter, Margaret.

"You mean you are going to marry him, and that he'll be your husband for—for keeps?" Margaret demanded with some agitation, when her mother told her of the engagement.

Mrs. Kendall smiled. Thered mounted to her cheek.

"Yes, dear," she said.

"And he'll live here with us?" Margaret's voice was growing in horror.

"Why, yes, dear," murmured Mrs. Kendall; then, quizzically: "Why, sweetheart, what's the matter? Don't you like Dr. Spencer? It was only last week that you were begging me to ask some one here to live with us."

Margaret frowned anxiously.

"But, mother, dear, that was poor folks," she explained, her eyes troubled. "Dr. Spencer ain't that kind, you know. You—you said he'd be a husband."

"Yes?"

"And—and husbands—mother!" broke off the little girl, her voice sharp with anguished love and terror. "He sha'n't come here to beat you and bang you 'round—he just sha'n't!"

"Beat me!" gasped Mrs. Kendall. "Margaret, what in the world are you thinking of to say such a thing as that?"

Margaret was almost crying now. The old hunted look had come back to her eyes, and her face looked suddenly pinched and old. She had come close to her mother's side and caught the soft folds of her mother's dress in cold, shaking fingers.

"But they do it—all of 'em," she warned frenziedly. "Tim Sullivan, an' Mr. Whalen, an' Patty's father—they was all husbands, every one of 'em; and there wasn't one of 'em but what beat their wives and banged 'em 'round. You don't know. You hain't seen 'em, maybe; but they do do it, mother—they do do it!"

For a moment Mrs. Kendall stared speechlessly into the young-old face before her; then she caught the little girl in her arms.

"You poor little dear!" she almost sobbed. "You poor forlorn little bunch of misguided pessimism! Come, let me tell you how really good and kind and gentle the doctor is. Beat me, indeed! Oh, Margaret, Margaret!"

CHAPTER IV

IN spite of Mrs. Kendall's earnest efforts, Margaret was not easily convinced that all husbands were not patterned after Tim Sullivan and Mike Whalen. Nor was this coming marriage the only thing that troubled Margaret. Life in the Alley was still too vividly before her eyes to allow her to understand any scheme of living that did not recognize the supremacy of the sharpest tongue and the heaviest fist; and this period of adjustment to the new order of things was not without its trials for herself as well as for her mother.

There were the callers, too—beautiful ladies in trailing gowns, who insisted upon seeing her, though why, Margaret could not understand; for they invariably cried and said, "Poor little lamb!" when they did see her, in spite of her efforts to convince them that she was perfectly happy. And there were the children—they, too, were disconcerting. They came, sometimes alone, and sometimes with their parents, but always they stared and seemed afraid of her. There were others, to be sure, who were not afraid of her. But they never "called." They "slipped in" through the back gate at the foot of the garden, and they were really very nice. They were Nat and Tom and Roxy Trotter, and they lived in a little house down by the river. They never wore shoes nor stockings, and their clothes were not at all like those of the other children. Margaret suspected that the Trotters were poor, and she took pains that her mother should see Nat and Tom and Roxy. Her mother, however, did not appear to know them, which did not seem so very strange to Margaret, after all; for of course her mother had not known that there were any people so near, otherwise she would have shared her home with them long ago. At first, it was Margaret's plan to rectify this little mistake immediately; but the more she thought of it, the more she was convinced that the first chance belonged by right to Patty's family and the Whalens in New York, inasmuch as they had been so good to her. She determined, therefore, to wait awhile before suggesting the removal of the Trotter family from their tiny, inconvenient house to the more spacious and desirable Five Oaks.

Delightful as were the Trotters, however, even they could not come up to Bobby McGinnis for real comradeship. Bobby lived with his mother and grandmother in the little red farmhouse farther up the hill. It was he who had found Margaret crying in the street on that first dreadful day long ago when she was lost in New York. For a week she had lived in his tiny attic home, then she had become frightened at his father's drunken rage one day, and had fled to the streets, never to return. All this Margaret knew, though she had but a faint recollection of it. It made a bond of sympathy between them, nevertheless, and caused them to become fast friends at once.

It was to Bobby that she went for advice when the standards of Houghtonsville and the Alley clashed; and it was to Bobby that she went for sympathy when grievous mismanagement of the knives and forks or of the folded square of cloth brought disaster to herself and tears to her mother's eyes. She earnestly desired to—as she expressed it to Bobby—"come up to the scratch and walk straight"; and it was to Bobby that she looked for aid and counsel.

"You see, you can tell just what 'tis ails me," she argued earnestly, as the two sat in their favorite perch in the apple tree. "You don't know Patty and the Whalens, 'course, but you do know folks just like 'em; and mother—don't you see?—she knows only the kind that lives here, and she don't understand. But you know both kinds, and you can tell where 'tis that I ain't like 'em here. And I want to be like 'em, Bobby, I do, truly. They're just bang-up—I mean beautiful folks," she corrected hastily. "And mother's so good to me! She's just—"

Margaret stopped suddenly. A new thought seemed to have come to her.

"Bobby," she cried with sharp abruptness, "did you ever know any husbands that was—good?"

"Husbands? 'Good'? What do ye mean?"

FLY TO PIECES

The Effect of Coffee on Highly Organized People

"I have been a coffee user for years, and about two years ago got into a very serious condition of dyspepsia and indigestion. It seemed to me I would fly to pieces. I was so nervous that at the least noise I was distressed, and many times could not straighten myself up because of the pain.

"My physician told me I must not eat any heavy or strong food and ordered a diet, giving me some medicine. I followed directions carefully, but kept on using coffee and did not get any better. Last winter my husband, who was away on business, had Postum Food Coffee served to him in the family where he boarded.

"He liked it so well that when he came home he brought some with him. We began using it and I found it most excellent. While I drank it my stomach never bothered me in the least, and I got over my nervous troubles. When the Postum was all gone we returned to coffee, then my stomach began to hurt me as before and the nervous conditions came on again.

"That showed me exactly what was the cause of the whole trouble, so I quit drinking coffee altogether and kept on using Postum. The old troubles left again and I have never had any trouble since." "There's a Reason." Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

THE MIDGET CLUB

Conducted by Aunt Prudence Payson

When the little friends write to the Midgets' Club will they please remember that Aunt Prudence likes to have them write very plainly on one side of the paper only? Here is a letter from a laddie who has a very good school:

I am a little boy seven years old. I have six cats, three bantam chickens, two ducks and a pet tiger. I have a lot of toys. I go to school next door with two little girls, Elsie and Mabel. I go to Sunday School every Sunday. I have not missed one since I started last year. Your little friend, ERWIN THOMAS.

My next little correspondent has had great grief in losing his dear father. I know you will all be sorry for him. I am glad that he lives on a ranch and that he has an older sister and so many pets:

Dear Aunt Prudence, I would like to belong to the Midget's club. I am 8 years old last month. I have a dog, a cat and a cow. We live on a small farm. I go to school in the second grade. I have never been very strong or well. My own dear papa was buried three weeks ago to-day. I miss him so much. My sister is 15 years old. I hope you will write to me. Good-by, WARREN J. BEECH.

I wonder whether Love wrote her letter on the same day that Erwin wrote his. What a sweet little pet is that baby sister! I wish I could hear her sing:

2515 Hanover Ave.,
Richmond, Va.

Dear Aunt Prudence: I am a little girl six years old. I live in Richmond, Va. I have three little sisters, named, Elsie, Allene and Mary. Little Mary is 19 months old, she can sing the tune of five or six hymns. I have no pets, but I have 17 little baby chickens. I go to school at home. My teacher is Miss Hattie Blankingship. I am studying the second speller and copy book the third reader, arithmetic and geography. This is the first session I have ever been to school. I go to Sunday School every Sunday. I have only missed one since last August, and then I had the German measles. Your little friend, LOVE ARCHER.

Two little correspondents write from Nasqua, New Hampshire. Their names are Ruth E. Seavy and William C. Bron. On the farm where they live there are three hundred chickens and twenty cows. It is fun to feed chickens and I think it likely that my five-year-old Ruth often helps to do it. William is a little older and goes to school. Next summer they are going on a visit to Vermont. Perhaps they will tell us about it then.

Julia M. Stewart writes from St. Johnsbury, Vermont. She lives in the sugar country and they were making maple sugar when she wrote.

Here is a bright letter from a little correspondent who describes her home so well that Aunt Prudence can see it:

South Cove, Victoria Co., C. B. Canada.
Dear Aunt Prudence:—In the last copy of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD I noticed that a new Midget's Club was starting, and I would like to add my name to the list. My home is in Cape Breton on the shores of the beautiful Bras d'Or Waters. Our farm is situated on a point of land, and so is bounded on three sides by water, which in winter is covered with ice, and we have lots of skating, but in summer it is pleasanter when there is all gone, and we can go boating and bathing which we very often do.

I have a large shepherd dog called "Pat" and a little gray kitten called "Thelma." My home is a mile from school. I go every day and like studying and reading very much, especially the "Pansy" books and "Around the world" in the "CHRISTIAN HERALD."

FLORENCE W. MAC IVER.

His is from a little twin sister:

Maquon, Ill.
Dear Aunt Prudence Payson:—I read your letter in the CHRISTIAN HERALD. I hunt the eggs. I have a hundred and four eggs last night. I have two kittens. They follow me when I go to hunt my eggs. One is blue and the other is gray. We have the Federal and the other Confederate. We have forty three lambs. We feed three on the table. One has no mother and the other two have. We feed the one that has no mother a bottle full. The other two we feed a bottle between them. Papa feeds them when he gets up and we feed them before we go to school then at noon then when we come home from school at 4 o'clock then before we go to bed. I go to school. I study Spelling, Arithmetic, Reading, Language, and Geography. I take them just as I wrote them. I like to go to school. When I get all my lessons I sew. I have read twelve books through this winter so I thought I would sew some. The we in my letter is my twin brother. His name is Halsted. We are nine years old. Yours truly, MURIEL A. MURRAY.

Mabel Clare Good, who lives in Alumine, Virginia, sends a charming little letter, and asks Aunt Prudence to write a story that girls would like to read. Aunt Prudence means to do it. She wonders whether girls and boys will like the same kind of story. Mabel has no pets. Probably she is herself a pet to her brothers and sisters.

Carrie M. Bickel, a little Pennsylvania girl, shall have some of the stories she wants one of these days.

Ruth Moore writes from Jones, Montana. Her mother has taken THE CHRISTIAN HERALD eight years and that is just as long as Ruth has lived.

This letter comes from a manly little Canadian:

Place Sans Bruit, P. O., Quebec.
Dear Aunt Prudence: I am a little boy eight years old living near the city of Quebec in Canada. I would like to belong to your Midget Club so will try to write a letter and hope it will be good enough to print.

My father has a farm about three miles from the city, and as my brother and I go to school in town we have a long walk of about a mile and a half and then we take the car for about two miles. Some times the snow is up to our knees, and one cold day I got my ear frozen, and I had the earache for a long time. Father often drives us to school when it is very stormy. On Saturday we have great fun playing in the snow. We had a great big snow house but it fell in, and last Saturday we built two snow men and played they were targets and snow balled them till we knocked them down. I had a nice little dog for a pet but one day he went off down the lane and never came back again.

We have a great big Newfoundland named Rex and he went off one night but we found him next morning. What I would like to see best in the corner of the paper is my own letter.

Your little friend
LINDSAY SEMPLE

Other correspondents are, Rudyard John Long Griffiths, who is named for Rudyard Kipling, and who won a silver medal in a school oratorical contest last winter; Mabel Stinson, Willa Creighton, Florence Amment, Blanche and Louisa Wooldridge, Ruth Behrens, V. Vush, Susan L. Witmer, Emorie Edwina Mulling, Constance Clough Mullings, Harold Winstead Millings, Grace Smith, and Janette Jones. Other names will be given the next time. You are all welcome in the Midgets' Club.

The Heavenly Home

I WISH 'twere so that I could know
Just where the heavenly home may be;
But this is sure, a love all pure
Must live throughout eternity.
The One who gave and took away
Will give my dear ones back some day.

The power of faith that conquers death,
The love supreme that gave God's Son,
The promised word of our dear Lord
Have rolled away the grave's great stone.

Just on the other side I see
My own at home, awaiting me.

In each loved face, a sweet new grace
Changes the old familiar guise.
A hand divine has touched each line,
A wondrous light shines in dear eyes.
And so they praise, and serve, and wait
Till I shall pass the pearly gate.

When we shall meet, and I shall greet
Each loved one on that golden strand
With Christ the Son, who brought us home,
We'll study heaven's glory land.

There, day by day, taught by my own,
I'll learn the wonders they have known.

A COURSE IN ESPERANTO

LESSON No. 11—By Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

THE following is the complete grammar of Esperanto as given by Dr. Zamenhof, the aŭtoro, in his book Fundamenta Krestomatio:

1. THE ARTICLE. There is no indefinite article; there is only a definite article la, alike for all sexes, cases and numbers.

2. THE SUBSTANTIVE. Substantives have the termination o. For the formation of the plural the termination j is added. There are only two cases: nominative and accusative; the latter is obtained from the nominative by the addition of the termination n. The possessive is expressed by de before the noun.

3. THE ADJECTIVE. The adjective ends in a. Cases and numbers as with the substantive. The comparative is made by means of the word pli, the superlative by plej; with the comparative the conjunction ol is used.

4. THE NUMERALS. The cardinal numerals (they are not declined) are: unu, du, tri, kvar, kvin, ses, sep, ok, naŭ, dek, cent, mil. The tens and hundreds are formed by the simple junction of the numerals. For the signification of ordinal numerals, the termination of the adjective is added; for the multiple, the suffix obl; for the fractional, on; for the collective, op; for the distributive, the word po. Besides that, substantival and adverbial numerals can be used.

5. THE PRONOUNS. Personal pronouns, mi, vi, li, ŝi, ĝi, (referring to thing or animal), si, ni, vi, ili, oni; the possessive pronouns are formed by the addition of the adjective termination. Declension is as with the substantives.

6. THE VERB. The verb is not changed in person or number. Forms of the verb: The present tense (the time being) takes the termination as; the past tense (the time been or having been), is; the future tense (the time about to be or going to be), os; the conditional mood, us; the imperative (ordering) mood, u; the infinitive (indefinite) mood, i. Participles (with an adjective or adverbial sense): Active present, ant; active past, int; active future, ont; passive present, at; passive past, it; passive future, ot. All forms of the passive are formed by help of a corresponding form of the verb esti and a passive participle of the required verb. The preposition with the passive is de.

7. THE ADVERB. Adverbs end in e; degrees of comparison as with adjectives.

8. THE PREPOSITION. All prepositions require the nominative.

9. PRONUNCIATION. Every word is read as it is written.

10. ACCENT. The accent is always on the penultimate syllable.

11. COMPOUND WORDS. Compound words are formed by the simple junction of words (the chief word stands at the end); the grammatical terminations are also regarded as independent words.

12. NEGATION. With another negative word the word ne is omitted.

13. DIRECTION. In order to show direction, words take the termination of the accusative.

14. USE OF PREPOSITIONS. Every preposition has a defined and constant meaning; but if we have to use some preposition and the direct sense does not show us what special preposition we are to take, then we use the preposition je, which has no independent meaning. Instead of the preposition je we can also use the accusative without a preposition.

15. FOREIGN WORDS. The so-called foreign words, that is, those which the majority of languages have taken from one source, are used in the Esperanto language without change, receiving only the orthography of the latter language; but with various words from one root it is better to use unchanged only the fundamental word, and to form the rest from this latter according to the rules of the Esperanto language.

16. ELISION. The final vowel of the substantive and the article can be omitted and replaced by an apostrophe.

Sentences Embodying the Sixteen Rules

La dek-unua. La dek-sesa de Aprilo. Kioma horo estas? (What hour is it?) In asking questions concerning the time of day "kioma" is used.) La cent-tridek-naŭa tago de la jaro. [Esperanto students are invited to send translations of the sentences to Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts, 206 Pennsylvania Avenue, S. E., Washington, D. C. Give the number of the rule in connection with each sentence.]

ANSWERED PRAYERS

Mrs. P. Canada. "I wish to publicly acknowledge that God answered a special prayer for temporal assistance, when we were in great trouble. Praise him!"

Mrs. R. E. S., Missouri. "God does hear and answer prayer. My little son, through an accident, was near to death. I prayed God to spare him. Praise his holy name! He did."

M. M. J., Michigan. "With gratitude to my Heavenly Father for the restoration to life and health of a very dear one, who was near unto death's door, but restored in answer to our prayers."

Mrs. M. A. B., North Dakota. "I would like to have my name numbered with those who have received answers to prayer. I have been sick a long time, and now I am being healed in answered prayer."

Reader, Virginia. "I wish to acknowledge God's goodness to me in answering many prayers. I had business trouble and took it to God in prayer. He has answered. I can not doubt such a loving Father."

L. L. A., Maine. "God, many times for over twenty years, has answered prayer in my behalf, when all earthly help has failed, and I know, were it not for God's mercy in answering prayer, I should not be living. He never fails to keep his word."

Reader, Ohio. "I promised that if my prayers were granted, I would acknowledge it to the world. He has answered in an unexpected way. I realize more fully than before that all things work out for good to them that love and serve Him."

Readers, Iowa. "We wish to acknowledge to the world the Lord's kindness in answering prayer. He always answers prayers of faith, if they are for our highest welfare. He surely converts our struggles into joyous and peaceful victories, if we call on him for help, and follow his just ways."

T., Canada. "I have had so many prayers answered that the difficulty is in selecting special cases. All my life God has been answering my prayers. Lately, through a mistake in judgment, I thought I would be involved in some trouble; I took it all to God in earnest prayer, and he heard and answered, and all resulted most happily."

Mrs. E. M., Maryland. "When everything looked so dark, the Lord heard my cry and answered my prayer in relation to my boy who had left home. I wish to acknowledge God's goodness."

Reader, Missouri. "I was in great trouble. I promised God if he would answer my prayers, I would acknowledge it through your paper. I wish to thank God for all his goodness to me and mine."

Converts in Brazil's Prison

BESIDES the general evangelistic work among the civilians and soldiers of the far interior city of Goyaz, Brazil, a splendid work is being done among the convicts of the big State prison. I have just returned from one of my regular visits, and would like to give your readers a glimpse at the lives and surroundings of the poor wretches who inhabit this, a typical Brazilian jail. Many of them are doomed to waste away and die within its dark, joyless walls, without Christ and without hope.

On approaching the building—a large rectangular one of two floors, with red tiled roof and whitewashed walls—I am challenged by the sentry, but appealing to the officer of the guard, I am invariably allowed to pass through the massive iron gates which bar the entrance, and once inside I am free to visit any part of the prison. The interior is divided into some five wards, to contain some twenty to thirty prisoners each—in addition to the jailers' room, the prison chapel, and a kind of courtyard about which a few privileged prisoners are allowed to roam more or less at liberty. Access to the the two sets of bars, warmly shake my own and bid me welcome. One is the man Jeronymo, already referred to: he has not long been converted, can read his Bible, and chatters away to me like a child. His companion is a young man of quite a different type, tall, quiet and thoughtful looking, with a white, rather haggard face, touched with melancholy.

We carry on our conversation freely and without hindrance; and though the other convicts appear to pay little attention to us, I sometimes have an impression that they are listening attentively to my words of comfort and exhortation to their two fellow prisoners, whom they despise and persecute because of their faith and prayers.

Then I visit Brother Pedro, another convert in the prison. It is now six years since I first met him, and five since his conversion through reading the Scriptures alone in his prison cell.

Pedro has been such an exemplary prisoner that he has won the confidence of the prison authorities, and is now allowed to live in the prison chapel, where he also carries on his occupation of slipper-making, a large wards, or great cells, can only be made by means of a ladder let down through a trap door in the ceiling of each.

Peering through these bars into one of the compartments, a number of convicts may be seen sitting or lying on the floor. Some are engaged in making slippers, while others pace the floor like caged beasts. Nearly all are smoking and a few are carrying on a conversation in which oaths and blasphemy are freely mixed. The whole appearance of the place is wretched, dirty and unwholesome; the cells are damp, and literally swarm with rats; and, there being neither beds nor seats provided, the unhappy prisoners sleep on the bare boards. During the nights from May to August, when the cold wind whistles in through the bars, the prisoners suffer considerably. Oh for a David Howard in South America! Happily the sunshine is allowed to stream in through the gratings of the outer windows, but somehow it fails to scatter the prevailing gloom, and the oppressive air on a hot summer day is like that of an oven.

Just now a little black convict, Brother Jeronymo, accompanied by two prison guards, came to visit me and to purchase a Portuguese copy of St. Paul's Progress, for which he had been saving up. Occasionally the convicts are allowed out for about an hour to make any purchase necessary, to carry water from the neighboring stream.

Calling through the prison bars to attract attention, immediately there is a stir in one dark corner, and two of the inmates hurry toward the iron gratings, and stretching their hands across the intervening space between portion of the profit on which he regularly gives to our Mission funds, that others of his countrymen outside the walls may hear and partake of the blessings that have meant so much for himself. He sometimes sends as much as ten shillings at one time.

The prison chapel was designed for Romish worship, but Pedro has decorated its walls with many large Gospel texts. On my entering he jumps from his stool and gives me a strong Brazilian hug, for there are no bars between us here, and his happy, smiling face betokens his satisfaction. We have a long talk together, and perhaps a little Bible study and prayer. Pedro has served only half his sentence of thirty years.

[The work above referred to is carried on at one of the ten stations at present occupied by the South American Evangelical Mission, of Liverpool, England. Brazil has some twenty millions of people, some hundreds of cities and thousands of small towns and villages, while the entire foreign missionary force available for direct evangelization does not reach one hundred. There is every freedom for work, and the doors are open. Two of the members of the Mission, Mr. and Mrs. W. Carl Cooper, of Sao Paulo, Brazil, will probably reach North America about June next, and will be glad of invitations and opportunities to present the needs and rich opportunities of this land, and especially the need of an Evangelical Orphanage for Brazilian children. Friends in the United States should communicate with Rev. D. M. Stearns, 167 West Chelton Avenue, Germantown, Pa., or in Canada with Rev. R. V. Bingham, Toronto.]

Which is which?

You think you can tell the difference between hearing grand-opera artists sing and hearing their beautiful voices on the Victor. But can you?

In the opera-house corridor scene in "The Pit" at Ye Liberty Theatre, Oakland, Cal., the famous quartet from "Rigoletto" was sung by Caruso, Abbot, Homer and Scotti on the Victor, and the delighted audience thought they were listening to the singers themselves.

At Rector's, the noted Chicago restaurant, when some of the grand-opera stars sang, with piano accompaniment, the diners listened with rapt attention and craned their necks to get a glimpse of the singers. But it was a Victor.

In the rotunda of Wanamaker's famous Philadelphia store the great pipe organ accompanied Melba on the Victor, and the people rushed from all directions to see the singer.

Even in the Victor laboratory employees often imagine they are listening to a singer making a record while they really hear the Victor.

Why not hear the Victor for yourself? Any Victor dealer will gladly play any Victor Records you want to hear.

He Will Hold Me Fast

"Thy right hand shall hold me"—PSALM 139: 10

ADA R. HABERSHON

ROBERT HARKNESS

1. When I fear my faith will fail, Christ will hold me fast;
2. I could never keep my hold, He must hold me fast;
3. I am precious in His sight, He will hold me fast;
4. He'll not let my soul be lost, Christ will hold me fast;

When the tempt-er would pre-vail, He can hold me fast.....
For my love is oft-en cold, He must hold me fast.....
Those He saves are His de-light, He will hold me fast.....
Bought by Him at such a cost, He will hold me fast.....

REFRAIN. a tempo

He will hold me fast, He will hold me fast;
hold me fast, hold me fast;

For my Sav-iour loves me so, He will hold me fast.

By special permission—Copyright, 1906, by Charles M. Alexander. International copyright secured.

This most popular of the latest Gospel songs was written by Robert Harkness, the brilliant Australian pianist and composer, and becomes a favorite wherever used. It has been used widely by Mr. Alexander. At Northfield last summer at the Christian Workers' Conference it was hummed and whistled and sung all over the grounds. It is a great favorite with men. The following incident, told by Miss Ada R. Habershon, of London, the author of the words will show its helpfulness in daily life: A man who was addicted to drink and swearing heard "He Will Hold Me Fast" sung in a meeting one night, and decided to hand over his life to Jesus Christ. He went away with the name of the song, "He Will Hold Me Fast" burned into his mind and heart. He said that at times when he was tempted most to drink, he would begin to sing "He Will Hold Me Fast," and think of the words, and in this way he got the victory. He was a truck driver, and when tempted to swear the most in the midst of his work he whistled and sang the hardest. Ever since then he has been kept from both swearing and drinking.

Called Higher

Mrs. Margaret Craven passed beyond lately at Waukesha, Wis., at the age of ninety-three.

Mr. Robert A. Hunter, of Jasper, Ind., aged 86, passed away lately after a brief illness. He was a lifelong member of the Presbyterian Church.

Mrs. Eleanor Frankland, of Belle Plains, Me., lately passed to the beyond in her eighty-fourth year; after a life rich in the qualities that evoke admiration.

Mr. Emil C. Rieff, of Newark, N. J., passed to his reward lately after an active life that had an influence for good upon all who came in contact with him.

Mr. H. C. Lindo, of Port Antonio, Jamaica, formerly of Spanish Town, son of Mrs. C. H. Lindo, passed away lately after a life of great usefulness.

Mrs. Orpha Thompson, wife of Joseph P. Thompson, of Santa Ana, Calif., passed from this life lately at Benning, Calif. She was a member for many years of the United Presbyterian Church.

Mrs. S. E. Clark, Bluff Springs, Ill., aged seventy-nine, passed away lately, her manner of living having ever been a beautiful example of Christianity applied to daily life.

Entered into rest at Philadelphia, Pa., Mrs. Carrie Scott. She was a devout Christian and interested in all humanitarian and religious work. She was a friend of dumb animals and her life was "useful to those living creatures who could not speak for themselves." She was an honorary member of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals of the State of Pennsylvania for many years. She was also a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Her place in the hearts and lives of a wide circle of friends cannot be filled.

Mrs. Jane Butcher, of Brooklyn, N. Y., passed to her reward lately, after nearly seventy years of active church work. She joined the church when twelve years of age and died in her eighty-sixth year.

Mrs. S. A. Meek passed from this life lately at the home of her daughter, Mrs. C. E. Lothrop, at Knoxville, Tenn. She requested that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S Red Letter Testament be read at her funeral. She was eighty-five years of age.

Jacob Hilfrich, of Carrollton, O., was lately called to his reward in his ninetieth year. He had been a lifelong member of the Lutheran Church, ever ready with a hand and purse to help the poor and needy, and responded to all calls to feed the hungry in foreign lands.

Mr. W. H. Williams, who entered into rest lately at Birmingham, Ala., was thirty years an active member of the Presbyterian Church and for many years a leading elder of the South Highland Church of Birmingham. His influence will be felt for years by all with whom he came in contact.

Mrs. Elizabeth Murray Shaw, widow of the late Thomas G. Shaw, entered into rest recently at the home of her daughter, in Avondale, Pa. She was in her ninetieth year. She was the mother of eleven children, one son giving his life for his country at Green Plains, Va., in 1864. She was a consistent member of the Methodist Church for more than sixty years. She took great pleasure in reading THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

DR. TALKS OF FOOD

Pres. of Board of Health

"What shall I eat?" is the daily inquiry the physician is met with. I do not hesitate to say that in my judgment a large percentage of disease is caused by poorly selected and improperly prepared food. My personal experience with the fully-cooked food, known as Grape-Nuts, enables me to speak freely of its merits.

"From overwork, I suffered several years with malnutrition, palpitation of the heart, and loss of sleep. Last summer I was led to experiment personally with the new food, which I used in conjunction with good rich cow's milk. In a short time after I commenced its use, the disagreeable symptoms disappeared, my heart's action became steady and normal, the functions of the stomach were properly carried out and I again slept as soundly and as well as in my youth.

"I look upon Grape-Nuts as a perfect food, and no one can gainsay but that it has a most prominent place in a rational, scientific system of feeding. Any one who uses this food will soon be convinced of the soundness of the principle upon which it is manufactured and may thereby know the facts as to its true worth." Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a Reason."

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

JESUS THE CONQUEROR

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

WHEN our beloved Lord had given up the ghost, the same Jews who had feared to enter the judgment hall lest they should be defiled, required that the body of Jesus as well as those of the thieves should not remain on the cross on the Sabbath day. Strange that sinners should fear defilement from him who alone cleanseth from sin! Perverted human nature calls "evil god, and good evil" (Isa. 5: 20)! Hate gave orders that their legs should be broken, to hasten the lingering death of crucifixion. But it had been foretold of Jesus, "A bone of his shall not be broken," for he is the very Passover Lamb (Ex. 12: 46; Nm. 9: 12); he is the righteous One (Is. 53: 20). Jesus was dead already, and "they brake not his legs." They pierced his side, for yet another Scripture had to be fulfilled, "They shall look on him whom they pierced."

But that body of Jesus, which was despised and loathed by the Jews, was dear, infinitely dear to his disciples. No sooner had he breathed his last breath than a reaction took place among these timid and faithless ones. He who had been up to this time only a secret disciple, Joseph of Arimathea, the only member of the council who had not consented to Jesus' death (Luke 23: 51), hesitated no longer to declare himself, but went boldly to Pilate and begged the body of Jesus. Pilate would have saved Jesus if he had not feared for his own interests, and was nothing loath to favor his disciples now. Nicodemus, too, who had once spoken for Jesus (John 7: 50, 51), now brought a costly and lavish compound of myrrh and aloes to prevent the decomposition of that sacred body. But God was beforehand with him. Of Jesus it was written, "In him was life." He could not see the corruption. Egyptian mummies have been preserved over three thousand years, the features as perfect as the day when they were embalmed, but when they are exposed to the air, the dust returns to earth as it was, and they crumble into a shapeless mass. But Jesus is "the Life" of men. He is "that Eternal Life which was with the Father and was manifested unto us" (I. John 1: 2). He needed no spices to conserve his body from corruption, for there was life power in Jesus to quicken the dead. They laid him in a new tomb, with the spices, the chief priests only interfering to seal the stone and set a watch. Strange that his enemies, who did not believe on him, took measures to prevent his resurrection, while his disciples, to whom he declared repeatedly that he should rise again, prepared his body for a long sleep in the grave! The chief priests and Pharisees were they who noted his words, "After three days I will rise again."

Mary Magdalene and the other Mary, probably the mother of Jesus, sat without the sepulchre until the Sabbath, when they rested according to the commandment (Luke 23: 56). But one of them could not rest apart from Jesus. Mary Magdalene (if, as some suppose, she was the same as Mary of Bethany) had understood that Jesus should die, had anointed his body for the burying, and, no doubt, had more comprehension of the resurrection than had the rest of the disciples. No sooner was the Sabbath past, than, long before the day dawned, "while it was yet dark," she was at the sepulchre. She was the first to discover that the stone was rolled away, that the precaution of the chief priests had, some way, been in vain. The "watch" of Roman soldiers was on guard no longer; something, she knew not what, had happened. When God leads on his believing children to know something of the power of Christ's resurrection they find themselves out in all their experiences and in all their expectations. It is glorious indeed to know Jesus as a Saviour who died for us in the past, and who reveals to us the forgiving love of our heavenly Father, and who opens to us the door into everlasting blessedness.

"Jesus, I Live to Thee"

[This hymn has been adopted by Mercersburg Academy, Pennsylvania. It was written by Rev. Henry Harbaugh, in Mercersburg, in 1850, where he was minister of the Reformed Church.]

JESUS, I live to thee,
The loveliest and best;
My life in thee, thy life in me,
In thy blest love I rest.

Jesus, I die to thee,
Whenever death shall come;
To die in thee is life to me,
In my eternal home.

Whether to live or die,
I know not which is best;
To live in thee is bliss to me,
To die is endless rest.

Living or dying, Lord,
I ask but to be thine;
My life in thee, thy life in me,
Makes heaven forever mine.

Among the Workers

—EVANGELIST LEWIS SHELLHORN of Ashland, N. J., has just closed a series of revival meetings in Wanamie M. E. Church, Wilkesbarre, Pa. Hundreds confessed Christ.

—REV. O. S. THOMPSON (Presby.), Paullina, Ia., writes: "We expect to receive seventy-five new members from the revival meetings conducted here by Evangelist Smiley, just closed. Many of our leading business men, for whom we have prayed for years, are among the converts."

—MISSIONARY FRANK H. L. PATON, son of the late Rev. John Paton, the pioneer missionary in the New Hebrides, writes us from Melbourne that the Gospel work in the islands prospers, despite many hindrances, especially those that are put in its way by white men. The writer refers to the traffic in liquor and firearms, which is still continued in the islands.

J. JAMES TISSOT

Immortalized by his brush interpretation of the Scriptures

Reproduced in all the Rich Coloring of their Priceless Originals.
Contained in 2 Artistic Portfolios---Old and New Testament Series

NO words can adequately paint the marvelous beauty, deep feeling and wealth of Oriental coloring in this noble Picture Gallery; the rugged strength and reverent delicacy of the master's brush; the superb grouping of the figures; the forceful character delineation, and, best of all, the wonderful handling of the subject-matter, so that, however the eye may be ravished by form or color, the vital truth that lies behind the picture seems in every instance to fairly stand out from the page.

Direct, simple and irresistible is this art of Tissot to young and old; it appeals to and interests men and women in every walk of life and defies the most exacting critic. Finally, these inspiring pictures, masterpieces of art though they be, go straight to the heart of the little child and make the beautiful Bible stories real.

Before Tissot, German painters had given to the world a Teutonic Christ, Anglo-Saxon painters an English Christ, and the great Italian masters their Italian Madonnas and portraits of our Lord. Not until Tissot had there ever been a Christ of Palestine—the real Jesus of Nazareth. Speaking of his work, Tissot said: "Every artist has his ideal; mine is the Truth."

And so when this inspired Frenchman, already a painter of great distinction, felt his higher calling he went straight to the Holy Land for his material. There he traveled into the remotest parts, studied ancient manuscripts, learned the traditions and folk-lore of the countries and peoples, ate their food, thought their thoughts, worked and lived with them for twenty years. At the end of this time the fruit of his labors was found to be no mere fanciful creation, but the inspiration of the Scholar-Historian-Artist; a wonderful unfolding of Bible history; a series of true-to-life and true-to-nature pictures, that carry us from Genesis down to the Ascension of our Saviour—the great achievement of a great painter whose genius had already won for him academic honors before this final triumph immortalized his name!

Nothing So Clearly Conveys the Gospel Story as These Superb Art Treasures

SUNDAY SCHOOL TEACHERS

Whatever the Sunday School lesson for the day, you can "drive it home" with one of these wonderfully beautiful and realistic pictures as you can in no other way. Every Tissot subject gives the teacher enough talking points to hold the attention and unflagging interest of a large class on even a "restless day"; answers the very questions that would otherwise have to be looked up; is a time-saving, practical teacher's help. From the infant room to the Bible class these invaluable pictures soon come to be a very material part of the lesson itself, and, as more than one prominent clergyman has pronounced them, "an inspiration in religion; an education in history; a revelation in art."

CHILDREN OF ALL AGES

Every child loves pictures; every child loves color. Every child loves the Bible stories better than any others—when these are illustrated with Tissot pictures. Indeed, no more beautiful way of imparting the Scriptures to children of all ages will ever be found. Through them you unfold the Bible stories in their true setting; the characters become real flesh-and-blood people, and the story of the Saviour glows in a broader and yet more intimate light. Give the children these pictures one at a time as they learn their Bible stories and parables, and let them paste up picture books for themselves. Could there be any better pastime for a rainy Sunday?

THE YOUTH OF JESUS (Reduced Size)

STUDENTS AND ART-LOVERS

To the lover of "art for art's sake" Tissot's Masterful Work needs no word of comment, and from the point of view of the critic and scholar, these pictures are recognized as authority on all matters of dress, custom, scenery and details of life in Palestine in Bible times. Invaluable as a supplement to any research work in connection with either the Old or New Testament, they solve the answers to countless questions that perplex the student of Bible and Ancient History.

A COMFORT TO SHUT-INS

Finally, to you who because of illness, advancing age, or from any reason whatsoever, are forced to rely largely on the fertility of your own minds for occupation and diversion, these Tissot Portfolios are indeed a godsend. They make "the story that is ever new" even more absorbing and beautiful, clear up a hundred points on which you have long felt in doubt, and correct wrong impressions. Each is a treasure portfolio that will prove inexhaustible, and a satisfying joy your life long.

THE PASTOR'S HELP

Simply to look over this collection is a step in one's education. It is really to see a series of illustrated sermons; it is to read a commentary in form and color by a Christian artist.

WASHINGTON'S RISING GENERATION

WHILE the statesmen and social leaders of Washington are attending to their legislative duties, or teas and parties, the real "younger set" is following its own diversions and making the democratic friendships for which the Capital City is unique.

The youngsters of society have no social feuds to support, no rivalries to pursue and no heart burnings because some one's invitation list so far exceeds his or her own. If so, they gurgles out their protests in the unintelligible language known only to their fond mothers.

In no city of the United States, or perhaps in Europe, are the babies of the well-to-do afforded greater outdoor privileges. It is impossible for their ultra fashionable mammas to give their afternoons—and many of their mornings—to the babies of the family, and so the youngsters are left the greater part of the day in the care of their nurses.

While the winter afternoons afford many of the babies a few hours of sunshine, it is in the springtime that juvenile Washington turns out into the parks in such numbers that from a distance it is sometimes difficult to pick out these fascinating little bright coated blossoms from the real flowers in the park. They swarm into the bright reservations and romp over the green, roll their hoops or play children's games throughout the afternoon.

Diplomatic, official and resident society send their children into the parks on bright afternoons. Dark-skinned little foreigners mingle with rosy-cheeked American tots, French nurses chatter with one another in their own tongue, while here and there one hears the brogue of a genuine Irish girl or the unmistakable accents of the old negro "mammy."

If there is one youngster in Washington who should lay claim to being the most democratic juvenile in the Capital it is Quentin Roosevelt, youngest son of the President. When Quentin is ready for school he straps his books over his shoulder, mounts his wheel and rides away just like any other American boy. He is a pupil at the Force School, one of the public schools of Washington, and when he arrives there in the morning he is just "Quentin" or "Roosevelt," and there is no disposition on his part or on those of his fellow students to regard him in any other light than just as a plain American boy and one of their schoolfellows. Since he was a very small youngster Quentin has gone to school by himself. Occasionally during the past year a Secret Service man has accompanied the President's son to school and called for him later in the day.

Like his distinguished father, Charlie Taft, son of the Secretary of War, thoroughly enjoys life and goes on the principle that good friends are worth making in any walk of life. Charlie has a sunny disposition and is always ready with a smile. Young born in Paris just two years ago. Kathleen is always to be found in the custody of a genial-faced Frenchwoman whose every outline marks the smart nurse of the Paris boulevards. The little girl is a firm friend and great chum of the Baroness Mela Hengelmuller von Hengervar, the four-year-old daughter of the Austrian Ambassador and the Baroness Hengelmuller, who seems almost too small to carry the title by which she is known.

Mela is a most resourceful and interesting little girl. When she is in the big embassy home of her parents she spends all her time at her mother's side. She answers the telephone in the private rooms of the Baroness and is quite equal to carrying any message that may come for either of her parents. When the Baroness goes for her daily drive at five o'clock in the afternoon her little daughter is almost sure to be beside her. Usually several of the pet dogs of the Ambassador's family are to be found in the wake of their young mistress.

One of the most recent additions to diplomatic circles is the family of the Turkish Minister, Mehmed Ali Bey. Five quaint children make up the minister's family, and until they moved out to 1810 Calvert Street several months ago they, too, spent their afternoons in the fashionable park section of Washington. Now they romp about the parking leading to the National Zoological

Park or within sight of the legation building. The oldest of the children, Sherife, a girl of twelve, is a most remarkable child. She speaks English perfectly, having learned it in the high schools of Constantinople. Frequently, when she is at home, she acts as interpreter for her parents or members of the legation staff. Sherife is a student at the National Cathedral School for Girls. The next in age to Sherife is a boy, Issedin; then comes the second girl, Suart; another boy, Nassur, and the baby, a girl, Lelia. In spite of the fact that these children come from the heart of the Sultan's kingdom, Mme. Mehmed always displays the most American tastes

Taft and Quentin Roosevelt are great chums, and, like the son of the President, Charlie goes off to school in the morning with his books slung over his shoulder, ready to "shoot" marbles with the first fellow that comes along. Charlie has many stories to tell of his recent world trip with his distinguished father, and he has seen many unique things which escaped the eyes of his elders.

One of the most fascinating members of the "younger set" is little Miss Kathleen de Martel, the two-year old daughter of the Viscount de Martel, third secretary of the French Embassy, and the Viscountess de Martel. Kathleen is as chic a little French maid as ever crossed the water. She was

A Sermon by
Rev. Ferdinand C. Iglehart, D.D.

The Immortality of Influence

TEXT—Heb. 11:4
"He being dead yet speaketh"

BYRON, in his Song of the Greek Poets, calls upon the living to arise and listen to the voices of the patriotic dead, "Tis but the living who are dumb; the voices of the dead sound like a distant torrent's fall." The spirit of our dead brother speaks sweetly, loudly, eloquently to us, and it is fitting that we, his stricken family, his co-workers in his profession, his friends and neighbors, and the hundreds of thousands of friends who knew him and loved him through his writings from week to week, should listen to the things he has to say, to the lessons he has to teach us.

This life teaches us the value of intellectual ability and culture. The best blood ran in his veins; he was of the royal lineage of a Christian home. Under its environment and inspiration, he had the Christian ministry in view. He was providentially led into religious journalism, where he had an audience larger than a hundred average pastors of churches. By his thorough education and wide reading, he was peculiarly qualified for success in the life work into which he was called. About thirty years ago he came from England to America, to found the American branch of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of England. It took a good deal of courage for a young man to cross the ocean and become a pioneer in this new field; but he at once manifested those qualities of mind and heart that have made him so useful and successful in his public work. His life was the symbol of indomitable industry. In these days when there is a disposition to shirk work, it is refreshing to see one who was such an example of tireless energy. Work was his joy, his life.

Greatness of Heart

Dr. Fernie's spirit teaches us the value of the affections in the formation of individual character and the successful accomplishment of life's purpose. Bacon has said: "All our actions take their hues from the complexion of the heart, as landscapes their variety from the light. It is sometimes thought that those who can see an idea most clearly, and give it accurate expression, who can lay down problems for solution and solve them, are the greatest men. This is a mistake. The greatest men are the greatest-hearted men. The enlightened public opinion of the ages renders this verdict. For in the heart are justice and equity, fidelity and bravery, faith and love, sweeter, tenderer than all. Dr. Fernie was a large-hearted man. If our brother's intellect was a mountain losing its blue summit in the sky, his heart was like a deep blue sea. Sometimes he dipped his pen in bitterness as he recorded his hatred of some wrong; but usually it dripped with the sweetness of love, and for almost a generation he has charmed the thousands of readers who did not know him personally, with the magnetism of his love.

He was one of the most unselfish of men. The large number of persons whom he helped with his purse were known alone to himself and his God. Pathetic instances have been told me of those whom he has helped over the rough places on the roadway of life, and I suspect that the Master, ere this, has said to him: "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, ye have done it unto me."

Many-Sided Benevolences

He did not confine his benevolences to individuals whom he aided, but was related in a vital way to such great institutions as the Bowery Mission, of which he was a trustee, to the Children's Home at Mont-Lawn, N. Y., of which he was one of the original trustees, to the Mayesville, S. C., Industrial Institute for Colored Boys and Girls, of which he was one of the founders, and to the national and world-wide charities which were organized by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. But the pennies and dollars which he gave to the poor, which were so beautiful and valuable, were only the symbols of that richer charity which he dispensed in giving to the world bright thoughts and holy principles, for they were the seeds from which vast forests of highest thought and holiest endeavor have sprung. They are the fountains from which rivers of pure sentiment and divine love have flown, to enrich with new life and clothe with verdure the fields through which they have passed. The bread and clothing he bought were not to be forgotten, but the food he gave the mind and the bread he furnished the soul were the richest gifts man can give to man.

There is a beautiful legend which tells of three maidens who were loitering along the banks of a silvery stream. One held in her hand a bunch of blue violets; another a bunch of ripe strawberries; the third held the tips of her fingers in the silvery stream. An old woman came along leaning on a staff, asking alms. The three maidens refused her. A maiden down the stream, not so well clad, dropped a penny into her hand and she vanished. She appeared again in the form of a fairy and said: "I see you are in a dispute as to which has the most beautiful hand. Hold up your hands; I will settle the dispute." They did so and she said: "It is not the hand that is fragrant with the odor of blue violets; it is not the hand that is crimsoned with strawberries; nor is it the hand washed white in the silvery stream that is the most beautiful." Then, casting her eye down the stream to the maiden not so well clad, who had given her the penny, she said: "It is the hand that helps others that is the most beautiful." These hands of our departed brother, now so cold, were beautiful because they helped others. He never thought of working for himself but always for others—for his loved ones at home, for his companions in his profession, and for the great multitude whose lives he influenced through his far-reaching pen.

The Value of Integrity

Our brother's career teaches us the lesson of incorruptible integrity. Integrity is from "integer," which means whole. He was a whole man. He would have been the last one to claim anything approaching holiness of character; he would count himself farthest from his own ideal; yet those who were nearest to him, knew him to be morally an ideal man. Through grace divine, his character was pure as the brightness of the sunbeam, as the whiteness of the snowflake, as the clearness of the spring, as the blueness of the sky.

If there is one truth which his life emphasizes more than any other, it is the value of the Bible in the formation of individual character and in the regeneration of human society. He was a life-long student of its sacred pages. He was a life-long interpreter of its divine meaning. He was a perpetual exponent of its saving principles. Few men in America knew the text of the Scriptures better, or understood their meaning more perfectly; for he not only had the keenest intellectual perception, but also the quickest moral sense and the loftiest spiritual inspirations. He introduced and edited the "Bible and Newspaper" page of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, holding the Bible up constantly as a mirror into which this busy, laughing, crying world might look and behold its own image. His expository work led him to read and re-read the text, until his spirit seemed to breathe the spirit of the Book. He prized the Book because it told of his Lord and Master, because it revealed his Saviour on the Cross; and he spent his life in retelling the good news of the Gospel through the press, because he knew how certain and mighty to save the Crucified One was.

As a rare perfume in a vase of clay
Pervades it with a sweetness not its own,
So, when Thou dwellest in a mortal soul,
All heaven's own sweetness seems around it thrown.

We have very dull ears to-night if we can not hear the spirit of our brother beseeching us to take the Bible as the foundation of our individual character and Christ as the regeneration of our lives, and if we do not hear the exhortation to preach the Gospel and bring men to Christ. Hawthorne tells the story of the man who had a great fire and burned up everything of value in the town; all the furniture and paintings and silver and gold plate and jewelry and wardrobes and plumes and crowns. Some one said to the fireman: "There is one thing that has not been put on the fire and that is the Bible." The man answered: "The Bible can not be destroyed by fire. The covers and the marginal notes will burn, but not a verse of the text can be destroyed." And so they threw on the huge leather-bound Bible, after everything in the town had been burned in the huge pile. They found the Bible in the ashes, with the covers burned off and the marginal notes consumed; but not a verse of the Book was destroyed. Dr. Fernie believed in the indestructibility of the Book and he built his house for time and his mansion of eternity on its as a foundation.

When they were carrying him to Lakewood, hopes of recovery, a few weeks ago, he called for the Bible to take with him. They told him he was too sick to study or to work upon the corrected proof which had engaged his mind and hand, and he said: "I must take it with me; it would be the last thing in the world that I could think of leaving." And his daughter told me this pathetic fact—that after his death, she found her father's Bible under his pillow. He laid his head down on the Book that was a part of his life, and upon the blessed Christ of the Book he went to sleep and breathed his life out sweetly there. It will be of deepest interest to the multitudes to whom he ministered so long, to read this dying tribute of his devotion to the Living Word, and they will receive fresh inspiration to study an obey God's revealed truth.

The Lessons of a Modest Life

The lesson of meekness and humanity taught by this life must not be overlooked. He never sought for the centre of the stage to be noticed by men, or to play his part in any spectacular way; but with an unassuming and almost retiring disposition, he was one of the most potential factors of his generation. The truest symbols of mental and moral progress are not the booming of cannon, the sound of trumpets, the beating of drums, or the rattle of wheels; they are the opening season, bringing flowers and harvests of fruits; they are the silent light calling the world out of darkness and slumber into beauty and toil. In his ministry to the mind and in his comfort to the heart, for these thirty years our departed friend has been like a lighted candle in a darkened room, the sunshine scattering the clouds away of a rainy day, the melody of a harp, the lustre of a diamond, the sound of a bird and the fragrance of a bed of roses in June.

His beautiful spirit suggests the immortality of earthly influence. If every word spoken in the open air in its vibrations goes around the earth, if every tread of softest foot on earth's carpet touches in its physical influence the furthest star, how limitless must be the divine message and godly foot-step of such a man as this! From his modest editorial chair he spoke to an audience that reached around the world, and to attempt to measure the influence that went out to the millions he led to better thought and better living, would baffle any language to describe or arithmetic to compute. Those that work in cloth work in that which the moth destroys; those that work in wood work in that which the worm grinds to powder with its teeth; those that work in brass work in that which the rust corrodes; those that work in marble work in that which time hammers to pieces with his chisel and his mallet; but those who work on immortal minds, those that work on immortal hearts, as our dear brother did, and those who work for the happiness and salvation of their fellow men, work upon that which shall never fade nor fail, that which shall brighten in the light of time and grow brighter still under the fires of the last day. And when time, in his mighty revolutions, shall have withered the forests, dried up the rivers, torn down the mountains; when this little planet shall have been flung away as a worn-out garment; when the very stars themselves shall have fallen from their places in the canopy of blue, beyond all the crash will be God and the good, and those for whom we have wrought and our loved ones and ourselves, and we shall go in to go out no more forever.

Brain-Workers and Heart-Workers

The world owes a debt of gratitude to the brain and heart workers which it can never repay. Those who wear sashes and gold lace and carry swords and have crowns on their heads, are not the only ones who are the founders of States, as the people generally believe; but it is the sincere, humble, honest individuals, persistent consecrated men and women, who find the truth and speak it, who know the Christ and love him, that are the true foundations of church and state in every land and every clime. It has been the lives and labors of men like this man that have contributed so largely to the prosperous church and happy state in our own fair land.

May God bless his sorrowing family and with tenderest touch may he wipe away every falling tear and cause his weeping children to realize that "earth

*A Memorial Address delivered at the funeral of the late Dr. B. J. Fernie.

The Farmer-Preacher of Florida's Keys

PROBABLY the most unique character in all the isles off the east coast of Florida known as the Florida Keys is Samuel Johnson, of Key Largo. Here is a man who brings Christianity into his business, into his daily transactions in the markets of Key West and of the isolated region in which he lives. He is now seventy years old, though he carries on his Christian work with all the vigor of his earlier years. He has worked principally among the natives of the keys; but since the coming of the wonderful sea-going railroad that is to connect all the keys with Key West and Miami, his influence is extended even to railroad laborers and tourists. This "Grand Old Man of the Florida Keys" lives on a large plantation on the largest of the long narrow islands, Key

Samuel Johnson

Largo being some thirty miles long and two miles across in its widest part. The hamlet near which his plantation is located is called Planter—just south of the historical caves where once pirates of the Gulf of Mexico and West Indian waters hid their booty. Here he reared five sons and two daughters.

In the years not so very far back, the natives of the Florida isles, called "Conchs," lived by wrecking. One day, many of them live by the sponge-trade and fishing. On the Key Largo plantations, however, pineapples, bananas and other tropical fruits and vegetables are raised. Mr. Samuel Johnson is one of the largest of these plantations. Date palms and coconut trees grow in profusion on Key Largo, and grape-fruit, oranges, sapadillos and mangoes are raised on a large scale.

Mr. Samuel Johnson was one of the first pioneers to settle on Key Largo. He is of English stock, and came from the Bahamas many years ago. He cleared the jungles and waste places of the isle and planted things that would be useful to mankind. His first home, a mere cabin, is now a dignified but simple structure built of wood, facing the sea, back of which run the plantation grounds.

The little frame building near Mr. Johnson's plantation is the Methodist church, of which the "grand old man" is the chief elder, the natives regarding him with deepest respect, if not awe. On the other keys, there are also tiny chapels; but if it happens, as it often does, that there is no minister to officiate, Mr. Johnson is sent for, and fills the vacant pulpit to the entire satisfaction of all his hearers. Well, indeed, does he perform the office, exhorting with the earnestness of the old prophets, encouraging the weak, and stimulating feeble faith.

Rising before daylight every day, he holds family prayers in his home. Following the simple morning meal, when the sun is just rising, he takes his basket on his shoulder, and bursting out into one of the familiar and beloved Moody and Sankey hymns, he trudges forth to his day's work on his plantation, his aged wife walking by his side; for the two work every day in their fruit orchards and vegetable patches, the products of which he ships to Key West.

It is amusing to hear the old man shouting out a favorite paraphrase (Prov. 24:29-33) as he walks on to his plantation, as if to chide the slumbering world at this hour:

'Tis the voice of the sluggard, I heard him complain.
You awoke me too soon, I must slumber again.

Again, he sings at the top of his voice:

I passed by his garden, I saw the wild brier.
His thorns and his thistles grew higher and higher.

This old man exerts a tremendous power for good among his friends and neighbors. He makes himself felt in all the markets of the keys, because, as a fruit raiser, he practices what he calls basket-bottom honesty. The fruit in Mr. Johnson's baskets is as sound at the bottom as at the top. He calls it "a Christian basketful."

With heart-content shining in his face, he often goes with his fruit to Key West, in the schooner The Island Home. On board that boat, sitting jovial and genial among the sailors, Samuel Johnson starts up a hymn appropriate to whatever occasion. The tune is taken up by others and grows into a great chorus, the words of praise and devotion touching more than one rough heart. Many a fisherman will in good time acknowledge that he owed his conversion to the old hymns started by Mr. Johnson on the sail-boat.

In the village of Planter there is one store. It is the postoffice where THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is always eagerly awaited. It is at once grocery and drug-store and rally-ground of the hamlet. It is kept by John Wesley Johnson, one of Samuel Johnson's sons. The father has had a sign put up over the entrance door, reading:

GENTLEMEN WILL NOT—BUT ALL OTHERS ARE REQUIRED NOT TO—USE PROFANE LANGUAGE ON THE PREMISES

In the fishing season, from twenty to thirty Spanish-mackerel fishing sloops run in to Planter. Here, there may be seen sailors from every part of the West Indies and our Northern States, even from the halls of the Bowery. In the evenings these sailors congregate at the little store, and it is for them that the quaint sign was put up over the post-office. Its influence has worked wonders.

It is obvious that Mr. Johnson extends his ministries beyond the hours of Sunday service and worship. He tends the sick, visits and consoles the mourner, and brings the light of the Gospel into the family life of the little hamlet. His day always closes with family prayers around the altar of home where Samuel Johnson wrestles in prayer for the souls of men among whom he works. It may, indeed, be said that the life of this obscure Florida key is all the sweeter, cleaner and nobler because of the example and precepts of its "grand old man," Elder Johnson.

dressing these attractive youngsters. The girls usually wear modish little dresses such as one could see on American children. The eldest boy wears sailor suits, while the youngest looks just like a spunky little American boy in a "Buster Brown." Another diplomatic family which always attracts attention on the streets of Washington are the children of Señor N. Veloz Goitica, first secretary and chargé d'affaires of the Venezuelan Legation, and Mme. Veloz. There are four children in the family, two smart little girls and two boys. The eldest girl, Elvira, is a fascinating little South American with hair "bobbed" in the fashion of the day and set off with large white bows. Her modish little white frocks, socks and patent leather slippers set off her childish beauty and make her look even younger than her eight years. Elvira and her sister Luisa attend the Force School, and are associate pupils of Quentin Roosevelt. The little boys, Luis and Francisco, are still in the kindergarten.

Another little belle in the diplomatic set is Kathleen Moncheur, the four-year old daughter of the Belgian minister and the Baroness Moncheur. Kathleen is a typical blonde beauty, and with her golden curls tucked coquettishly under a big embroidery hat and her familiar happy smile she is not only the pet of the legation but of society generally. Kathleen has an Irish nurse who is as loyal to her young charge as a devoted attendant could possibly be. She is never happier than when romping with her in H Street, where the legation is situated, or in Farragut Square, one of the parks a half block away.

dren of Mrs. Samuel Reber, are nearly always to be found in the up-town parks. They are typical American children, full of spirit and fond of "bean bag" and other sports that interest youngsters.

Three newcomers are conspicuous in the younger circle in Richmond Pearson Hobson, second; Philander C. Knox, third, and the charming baby of Commodore M. J. Lawrence. "Young Hobson," as he is affectionately called, takes his views of life from the daintiest of wicker basket carriages. He protests with his tiny fists clasped tightly when things do not go to suit him, and gurgles delightedly at his nurse maid when they do. He is just six months old and the real ruler of the charming Hobson home at 2117 S Street. Philander C. Knox, third, is an embryonic statesman who rules the home of the Senator from Pennsylvania. The Knox baby is always the centre of a group of children, when their carriages are brought together in Dupont Circle or Farragut Square, where the children of the fashionable world congregate, and make as interesting a picture as the visitor can see in Washington.

THE CHARM OF LIFE IN EGYPT

Most Fascinating of Oriental Lands, Though Almost Unchanged in the Passing Centuries

By CHARLES M. PEPPER

THERE is a freshness about life in Egypt which makes it to me the most fascinating of all the Oriental countries. I suppose this is because the life of to-day is linked so closely with the Egypt of 5,000 years ago. During a stay of several weeks it seemed to me that there was hardly a day without something that either revived the past or reminded me of all that is peculiar about Egypt, including its Mohammedan creed.

One afternoon I would pick up a paper and read about the new discoveries of the archæologists and how the digging was still confirming the Biblical record. Once I read of the discovery by Professor Sayce of a fragment of a lost Gospel. This was of the latter part of the second century and identified the high priests with the Pharisees. Again it would be an excavation which would throw new light on the books of the Old Testament. These archæological revelations make one reflect on how fully the Bible has been confirmed by the actual records of the past. It is gratifying to know, too, that many of the most important discoveries have been made by American archæologists. There is absorbing interest in visiting the ruins which abound not only up the Nile, but in the neighborhood of the pyramids. One day I took a donkey and with a guide who had been educated in the American Mission School I went out to Memphis, the ancient capital, to see the great granite statue of Rameses II., now prone. It is a huge reminder of human vanity.

But really to know something of the ancient life of Egypt it is not necessary to go away from the National Museum in Cairo, for everything is gathered there. It was astonishing to see how the children of forty and fifty centuries ago had the same toys as those of to-day. I don't imagine, either, that the children themselves were very different. They are represented as holding their fingers to their lips in token that children should be seen and not heard.

In the days of Moses the chief concern of the parents was to preserve their offspring from the evil spirits, and this is perhaps the explanation of the numerous rings, anklets, and bracelets which were then worn, all of them being used as amulets or charms.

Children in Egypt worked in those days, herding the geese and cattle and gathering herbs. It is said that they could swim from infancy, and this is quite probable, for to-day they are sometimes called the "Nile ducks" and there was a similar way of designating them many centuries ago.

In the museum there are many toys which we think are very modern, yet some of these must be at least 4,000 years old. The Egyptian children had naughty crocodiles, figures with movable arms, rag dolls, pigs, and ducks on wheels. The boys played marbles, as they do to-day in Cairo and Alexandria, and whipped their tops, as the boys of New York or Philadelphia now do. So much regard was felt for the children that their toys were buried with them.

Some things were taught those Egyptian children that children of to-day often forget. One of these was reverence for old age and for parents. One of the inscriptions which the archæologists uncovered reads thus:

"The most beautiful thing to behold, the best thing to hear, is a child with a thankful breast, whose heart beats for his father."

The children of the wealthy classes went to school and they had to study hard. Discipline was severe and the rod was not spared. They were taught especially to be careful with their copy books, and among the discoveries have been some very interesting little volumes of papyri-hieroglyphics. Memorizing was a great feature of the education of the Egyptian schoolboy centuries ago and it is so to-day. When I was in Alexandria, I used to go frequently to the office of the American consul, and in an adjoining office I would frequently hear an Egyptian lad of ten or eleven years who was learning his lesson by rote. Several times when I looked in on him his head would be bent forward and his body swaying. The physical exercise seemed to help his memory.

There are some of the customs of the present day which carry us back to the centuries when the watering of the lands on which the life of Egypt depended was observed with almost as much scientific precision as to-day. One of these ceremonies is known as the khalig, or cutting of the dam. The festival marks the time when the Nile reaches such a height that the water can be let into the irrigation canal. In ancient times a horrible custom was enforced. It was believed by the superstitious inhabitants that the Nile would not rise sufficiently unless a young virgin were sacrificed to it. So the prettiest Arab girl was chosen and at the ceremony cutting the dam she was thrown into the water allowed to drown in sight of the spectators. No this old canal is filled in and no life is sacrificed but a mound is set up and cut away with elaborate ceremonies and a life-sized doll weighted with stones is cast into the river and sinks. There are booming cannon and many elaborate official ceremonies on this occasion of cutting the dam and it is very interesting to watch the enormous crowd that gathers and the exchange of Oriental greetings.

Other customs which I had a chance to observe are of more recent origin. One of these is the deposit of the sacred carpet to Mecca at the time of the pilgrimage. The Khedive and all the high Egyptian officials, the consular and diplomatic representatives of foreign governments, and some favored invited guests usually are present. The Mecca pilgrimage is the yearly reminder that Egypt, though under the protectorate of a Christian nation, is still a Mohammedan country. But there are many natives who are not Mohammedans. The Copts, who number about 1,000,000, are the original Egyptians who date back long before the Arab conquest. Though their faith has been much perverted, it still preserves Christian ideals.

It might be that if so many Christian creeds were not represented in Egypt, Mohammedanism would not be so strong, for those creeds often are a war among themselves. This has been the history for centuries. There is the Greek Church, the Armenian, the Catholic, the Coptic, Evangelical Protestantism of various denominations and there are also Jewish synagogues. The feuds of the Christian Church when Alexandria was the seat of authority, and the result of these divisions and the creeping in of human ambition, have been very vividly described by Charles Kingsley in his Hypatia. Alexandria to-day is what it was when Kingsley wrote of it, except that Mohammedanism is the dominant religious and political power and the Christian sects, while disunited, are not so quarrelsome among themselves as they were in the century of which Kingsley wrote. There is a very fine Greek church and also a spacious edifice of the Church of England. American missions are not represented by showy edifices but their influence is very marked.

A stranger is apt to be confused in Alexandria, and to think that the vast majority of the population must be Mussulman because all men wear the red fez. But, while Turks accept this headgear as the symbol of their faith, the fez also is worn by Syrians, Greeks, and Copts, and in fact by all the Orientals as well as by many of the Europeans residing or traveling in Egypt.

TWENTY-NINE YEARS IN LIBERIA

Mary Sharpe, one of the most experienced American missionaries in Africa, has spent twenty-nine years in Liberia with only one week of sickness during that time. She has had three short furloughs home.

THE GOSPEL AT THE SEASHORE

THE pioneer Christian worker at Coney Island was Rev. W. D. Hughes, who began work in a tent June 24, 1898. This work was continued during the winter in a hall called Hunt's Pavilion, at the west end of Surf Avenue. The following spring, money was provided for a permanent building, and in 1900 the Brooklyn City Mission and Tract Society co-operated with Mr. Hughes and the Rev. J. E. Ensign held vesper services on the beach daily.

In the summer of 1902, the Rev. Dr. E. D. Bailey and Mr. T. C. Roberts-Horsfield held five open air services on the beach, and reported an attendance of 1,800 with three conversions. The next City Mission worker to enter the field was Mr. John Wagner, who held open air meetings during the season of 1903.

It was in 1904 that the present order of things began. In that year, the Rev. Bradford Williams held Gospel services on the beach every afternoon with much success. The same year Major Fred Gardner and Mr. T. C. Roberts-Horsfield held meetings in the Dreamland Park Theatre, in connection with which they conducted services at West Fifth Street and Surf Avenue every Saturday afternoon and Sunday noon. After Mr. Williams severed his connection with the Society, the late Major Gardner and Mr. Horsfield had charge of the work, which grew to large proportions during the summer of 1905. In 1906 and 1907, Mr. Horsfield and the Rev. Robert Rein had charge of the meetings. The following statistics will show to what proportions the work had grown last year:

Meetings held, 102; attendance, 156,750; requests for prayer, 2,340; professed conversions, 453; positions found for men, 21; free beds furnished 211; free meals furnished, 385; men sent to open-air meetings. As the workers are arranging the seats, and the organ is being placed on the platform, the people gather around to see what is going on. A fifteen-minute song service attracts the attention of many more passers-by, and when the leader opens the meeting with prayer, the people are quiet and reverential. Following this, a number of short Gospel talks are given, interspersed with familiar Gospel hymns, and at the close an invitation to accept Christ as a personal Saviour is given, and at nearly if not quite every meeting is responded to by some who want to know their sins forgiven and possess this full and free salvation.

This work, so successfully carried on for the past six years under the auspices of the Brooklyn City Mission and Tract Society, is this year in charge of the Rev. E. D. Bailey, D.D., and Mr. T. C. Roberts-Horsfield. Meetings are held at the same place as in former years every clear day at 4.30 P.M.

"What did it cost?" is a question often asked regarding last year's work at Coney Island. Counting the number of people preached to, and the amount of money expended, it cost a trifle over one cent to give the Gospel to each individual. It is hoped to carry on a greater and more aggressive work this year. Three thousand dollars is needed for this summer's work. Contributions may be forwarded to the Society, or to H. E. Nitchie, Treasurer, Room 813, 215 Montague Street, Brooklyn, N. Y.

McKINLEY'S MEMORY HONORED

A NEWER and deeper interest in the American University at Washington has been recently awakened and is manifest especially in the great cities of the East.

Prof. Franklin Hamilton

For nearly a score of years there has been under consideration the idea of establishing at the national capital a national university designed to represent the highest form of Christian education, to the end that young men and women who have completed their academic studies and received their first degree may not be obliged to go abroad to pursue post-graduate courses. There are now two buildings standing as substantial evidence of the beginning of widely inclusive plans. Twenty-three buildings are contemplated.

The College of History completed ten years ago was erected at a cost of $176,000 and contains forty-two rooms. It is considered one of the handsomest buildings in Washington. Already gifts of thousands of volumes have been received toward the library, while the cabinets of the museum are being filled with rare minerals and curios. Various objects of interest have been contributed, including the desk used by Edwin M. Stanton during his term as Secretary of War, the dining table and chairs of Charles Sumner, the wardrobe and manuscript file of the historian Bancroft, an heroic bust on a pedestal of General John A. Logan, and a handsomely carved chair made from the beams of the historic City Road Chapel, London, where John Wesley preached. One of the treasures is a mammoth reflecting lens, one of the largest in the world, measuring five feet two inches in diameter, made by Dr. John Peate, to be eventually mounted and equipped for service in the prospective observatory.

The College of Government, built of marble and costing $250,000, is now finished as to the exterior, but the interior is yet incomplete. The equipment of this building will, with the College of History, furnish sufficient room and prepare the way to open the University. This building is a memorial to President McKinley, who manifested a deep interest in the early plans for the University, and was a trustee for two years prior to his death. He had expressed a willingness to serve as dean of the College of Government, and had promised to lay its cornerstone. His death threw this service into the hands of President Roosevelt, who is one of the trustees of the University.

The University will be neither narrow nor sectarian. It has been founded by those who believe reverently in God as Creator of all things and in his providence; by those who do not fear the results of scientific research in the study of nature or of man; by those who believe in the simple Gospel of the divine Master applied to all human need. Its Board of Trustees represents all denominations of the Protestant faith.

The new Chancellor, succeeding the late Bishop Hurst, the founder, and Bishop McCabe—the Rev. Dr. Franklin Hamilton, of Boston, Mass.—is the brother of Bishop John W. Hamilton, of California, and Dr. J. Benson Hamilton, of Walden University. He graduated from Boston Latin School in 1883, where he took the Old South Prize as essayist. He graduated from Harvard University in 1887. During his course at Harvard he won both the Bowdoin and Baylston Prizes. He served for a time as one of the professors of Greek and Latin in Grant University, Chattanooga, Tenn. He graduated from the Boston University School of Theology in 1892. He spent nearly three years in post-graduate study at Paris and Berlin. Dr. Hamilton speaks several modern languages. He received his doctorate in speculative philosophy at Boston University in 1899. He has filled several important pastoral charges and has written extensively on religious topics.

Values His Bible and Premiums

Dear Dr. Klopsch: I see so many names of old subscribers to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, the best paper in the world. I have taken it since the fall of 1880. Besides, I have over forty books as premiums, and some eight Bibles. It gets better all the time. The Red Letter India Paper Bible is the best I ever saw.

Our Letters on the Tramp Problem

ANYONE who reads the very remarkable collection of letters received in response to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S invitation to an open discussion of the Tramp Problem must be convinced of two things: that it is a vital problem and that it penetrates to every State. Writing from actual experience with the tramp, and with a full comprehension of the terrible fact that five hundred thousand men and lads are drifting about the country as vagrants at the present time, these correspondents have entered into the details of this question with hearts touched by sympathy for the unfortunates, and at the same time heedful of what is due to society for its protection from this great army of the idle, the pauper, and the criminal.

Among the many practical suggestions contained in these letters, we note specially those that advocate placing these wanderers on the land, on State or Federal tramp farms. Several believe that the solution is to be found in setting the tramps to the work of road-making at minimum wages. This would have the double advantage of not conflicting with the marketable products of regular labor and of greatly improving our public highways at little cost. Others again hold that the able-bodied tramps should be drafted into the army. Practically all agree that the physically fit should be compelled to work or go to jail. Some of our correspondents seem to regard the question as one to be dealt with by the States; others that it is a problem for the Federal authorities. Still others believe that the root of the trouble lies in our loose immigration system which makes this country the asylum for the criminal and unfit.

It might prove an excellent thing if some State were to put into practice, even in a single county, the road-making plan outlined so clearly by several of our correspondents. It would be beginning at the point of least expenditure. We commend these letters to the careful consideration of our State legislatures and indulge the hope that they may be productive of some practical effort looking toward the solution of this much-vexed problem.

The Motto Bill Signed

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT, on Monday, May 18, gave his executive approval and signature to the bill restoring the motto, "In God We Trust," to the national coinage, from which it was removed almost a year ago.

There will be no delay in restoring the motto. Even before the bill passed the Senate, the Director of the Mint, anticipating restoration, made preparations accordingly. On the new gold "eagle," the motto will occupy a space above the flying eagle, near the rim of the coin. On the ten-dollar piece, it will be to the left and in front of the eagle.

Art critics, medalists, sculptors and a few others may have some caustic comments to make on the new coin, which, from their point of view, may seem overcrowded with emblems, words and figures. There can be no objection to any readjustment in the interest of artistic improvement. But whatever else is removed or eliminated, the grand old motto must remain. May it never again be displaced.

A National "Eye-Opener"

NOW that the conference of State Governors at the White House is over, the results may be seen somewhat in the historical perspective. Of course, it must be remembered that it was a deliberative and not a law-making body. The conference enabled the Governors to get personally acquainted, exchange views, and hear the opinions of the experts whom the President had invited to meet with them. These experts were foresters of experience, mineralogists who spoke on the coming exhaustion of our coal and iron fields, men who were conversant with the present wasteful methods of farming in a large portion of our country, and men who are accustomed to wrestle with our transportation problem. Many of the facts presented may be regarded as "eye-openers" to the men who heard them and also to the country.

be heard in many of the gubernatorial messages read at the opening of the coming session of the State legislatures. Congress can do much, but in conserving the resources of some sections which are essential to the prosperity of all, the States can do more. In preserving our forests, the State legislatures must be depended upon. People in heavily wooded sections often say that there is wood enough, not realizing that the preservation of a certain amount of timber is necessary to preserve the rivers that run through far distant States, and in turn affect the price of transportation, and, as a result, the prices the people in the wooded districts have to pay for things not grown or made at home. As one speaker aptly put it: "First conserve the forests; for no forests, no long navigable rivers; no rivers, no cheap transportation."

We Americans have been told so often of the vastness of our country and of the richness of its soil that the idea had become almost universal that the population could go on increasing indefinitely and the country still prosper under our present methods. With immigrants coming to our shores by the million, we find that the end of available unoccupied land is in sight and that we must look carefully to the future unless we wish to find that our soil is exhausted and unable to meet the demands that will be put upon it. Taken all in all, the conference may be considered as one of the most momentous gatherings in our economic history, and one whose results will be seen in legislation in our States for years to come.

Science and the Book

IN late years science has been rapidly multiplying its evidence corroborative of the Bible. Foreign journals are calling attention to two remarkable instances of this character. The first is the striking discovery by that greatest living Egyptologist, Brugsch Bey, of a hieroglyphic record of the failure of the Nile to rise for seven consecutive years, and of a consequent disastrous famine. Of itself, this discovery might have been accepted as establishing the fact that, such a failure having actually occurred, the Biblical story of the famine in the days of Joseph was all the more probable. But the records themselves show that the date of the failure was 1700 B.C., corresponding, as the ablest chronologists believe, with the time of the famine described in Genesis 41.

This totally unforeseen confirmation of Scripture by science, however, is cast into the shade by a far more important one which Professor Randel Harris, an English scholar and investigator, has pointed out. It has reference to the census recorded by Luke, the taking of which caused the journey of Joseph and Mary to Bethlehem. Sceptics and unbelievers generally have long tried to discredit this account of the tax census as a fiction, and hence to stamp the whole story of the Divine birth at Bethlehem as unauthentic and a work of the imagination. Now, after nearly 2,000 years, the evidence of this census is coming to the light. It was one of many similar censuses which were ordered at stated intervals.

Thus as the evidence of science draws closer and closer to the Bible, proof of the strict accuracy of the sacred narrative accumulates. "The impregnable rock of Holy Scripture," as Gladstone once aptly called it, is proof against all the assaults of infidelity and will so remain.

Pensions After Seventy

IS it the duty of a government to provide for the support of all its citizens of good character and repute, after they have become superannuated? This is the huge problem with which Great Britain is now struggling. Stated briefly, Premier Asquith's plan, lately submitted, contemplates an appropriation of $30,000,000 for next year, to provide pensions to about half a million people over seventy years old, single pensioners to receive $1.25 per week and married couples $1.80. This national beneficence is designed only to extend to those whose income does not exceed $2.50 weekly. The plan differs materially from the "Old Age Pension" system of Germany, in which both employers and workers are assessed for the State-aided pension fund, whereas the British scheme would be maintained by the State exclusively, although it would be included in the tax budget and come out of the general pocket in any event. France and Belgium follow the German method and thus make the pension less a charity than an insurance fund. On several occasions, the subject of old age pensions has been discussed seriously in the United States, and the late Andrew F. Green, Controller of New York City, was a strong advocate of the German system as suited to American needs. Many people in Britain oppose Mr. Asquith's plan as favoring too much of Socialism. The Spectator has denounced it as a scheme that would destroy the spirit of thrift and provision for old age among the workers. Its progress will be watched here with unusual interest by all students of sociological and labor problems.

A Great Woman's Advice

MISS FLORENCE NIGHTINGALE, the famous war nurse, who was so signally honored by the city of London recently, is now very aged—far beyond the octogenarian mark—but she is still keenly alive to the world's progress, especially in respect to the enlarging scope of women's activities. She wrote these words of advice to the juniors of her sex and they will apply to women's work in all lands and under all conditions: "I would say to all young women who are called to any particular vocation, qualify yourselves for it as a man does for his work. Do not think you can understand it otherwise. If you are called to a man's work, do not exact a woman's privilege, the privilege of inaccuracy, of weakness." Miss Nightingale's advice deserves to be remembered. Probably no woman now living is better qualified than she to point out to her sex the value of thoroughness as an essential to success in any calling in life.

Picturing the Passion

SOME of our readers have written us asking whether the production of the Passion Play in living pictures as a public show is a proper spectacle. There is, to our mind, something unseemingly irreverent in the presentation of the Passion of Christ, either in living pictures or by actors. The average Christian will admit that no human presentation could do the subject justice. When it was proposed to introduce the Passion Play, on the Oberammergau model, from Switzerland into this country, good people everywhere protested and the project was dropped. The moving pictures of the Passion Play convey the same impression and make "the tragedy of tragedies" a mere piece of mimicry, with all the petty stage effects of an ordinary play. It is a desecration of the ideal and a travesty on the reality. Somehow, it revolts the true Christian to have any one personate divinity.

A Boy King in Parliament

THE king and crown prince of Portugal were assassinated and the boy Manuel became the king. On April 29 he opened the session of the Cortes in the Chamber of Deputies, this being the first meeting of the parliament since the inauguration of the dictatorship a year ago. He read his speech in clear tones, and his bearing created a favorable impression. In closing he said: "Honorable Peers of the Realm and Deputies of the Portuguese nation: The life of parliaments by their very nature consists in the clash of discussion of different opinions; for all that can divide men, from class distinctions to the shock of political creeds, finds expression and defense therein. The task of parliament is to combine all the forces to one end—the public service. The country can but gain by this generous strife to arrive at decisions which will promote the national well-being. If all things are subordinate to securing the immediate good of the country, parliament will have achieved a fair and lasting work, and it is for this result that the country and the head of the State look confidently to this high assembly. It is the traditional belief, a belief which incited the greatness of our ancestors and the spiritual firmness revealed in more critical times, that providence watches over the destiny of the country. May faith in the future of Portugal be realized more than ever in our patriotic hearts. The king and the Portuguese people embrace each other in his sublime sentiment."

A secular and sacred history it has often happened that a boy has become the sovereign ruler of a nation. Joah became king of Jerusalem when he was a boy eight years of age and had thirty-one years of a prosperous reign. The faith in providence expressed in King Manuel's address to the parliament, might be looked for in a boy who has such a noble mother and has had such careful home training. There was the hint of real royalty in the blood of the mother when she struck the murderer of her husband and son in the face with a bouquet of flowers which she held in her hand. The whole world joins in the hope of the young ruler, that God may give the Portuguese nation the largest measure of happiness and prosperity.

Isiah was eight years old when he began to reign. (II. Kings 22:1.)

A Angry Woman's Bell

Winston Churchill had a disconcerting experience at Dundee when he tried to address a dinner time meeting outside a big factory. He arrived at the appointed time to make his speech, but found his pitch occupied by suffragists. Miss Molony, an Irish woman, armed with a big bell, occupied the box of a wagonette, and she declared that the president of the Board of Trade should not address an open air meeting in Dundee until he had apologized for some remarks he made about political women in a recent speech. At last Mr. Churchill said: "Let her ring her bell if she likes. If she thinks that is a reasonable argument to put before the electors, she may use it. I don't care. I bid you good afternoon." He then drove off.—(Exchange).

The people of America scarcely realize what rapid strides are being made by the advocates of woman's suffrage. Already the countries of New Zealand, Australia, Finland, and Norway have adopted woman's suffrage and women are allowed to vote in the States of Wyoming, Utah, Colorado, and Idaho. The sentiment in favor of this movement has grown to such proportions in England that the House of Commons recently gave the unprecedented majority of 271 to 92 in favor of woman's suffrage. The advocates of the new movement, however, have shown in many instances very bad taste and worse temper, culminating in open riots that have given great trouble to the police authorities. We presume this woman, trying to ring Winston Churchill down, might have thought that she was conservative in her opposition to him; but such methods of promoting a measure are wrong and an injury, rather than a help, to the cause which is espoused. The victory of centuries has been achieved by the nations of to-day in the liberty of speech and press which has been secured. In her ill-mannered and mean-spirited conduct, this woman showed the absence of love in her heart.

It is better to dwell in a corner of the housetop, than with a brawling woman in a wide house. (Prov. 21: 9.)

can hardly understand how a man could live so long and be satisfied to have so small a world. He, no doubt, had enough to eat and to wear and a pleasant field of employment, and did not care for much beyond himself. There are so many people who have splendid opportunities of mental improvement, of benevolent activity and of religious service, who allow these opportunities to go by unimproved. They settle down into a very small sphere of life and influence. They are so dull of moral apprehension that they do not seem to see the opportunities which would so enlarge their life and usefulness. They do not lack eyes with which to see, but they lack the disposition to use them.

Therefore speak I to them in parables; because seeing they see not; and hearing they hear not, neither do they understand. (Matt. 13: 13.)

Rockefeller, Jr., on Tainted Money

Mr. John D. Rockefeller, Jr., in his address before his Bible class at the Fifth Avenue Baptist Church in New York City, took the 53d Psalm as the basis of his remarks, condemning in unmeasured terms the accumulation of wealth by fraud. Among other things, he said:

This rich man whom the Psalmist refers to, doesn't he exist at the present day? I believe he does. You all know him; you read about him in the newspapers every day. Maybe you and I have often envied him. We may have said: "How splendid it must be to have the wealth, the power which that man possesses—to be able to sway men!" Perhaps that man you envy may have been a liar in his earlier days. He may have destroyed men's characters and taken advantage of men weaker than himself in order to reach the position which you envy. Therefore you must ask yourselves the question, "Are we willing to pay the price that man paid in order to get where he is?"

"Ha!" you may reply, "but the world to-day overlooks these things. After all, even if this man's riches and power were thus obtained, it does not matter much in the struggle and fierce competition of the present day, provided he is willing to use his position and his wealth for the benefit of his fellow men. He is entitled to take advantage of any opportunity that presents itself provided he devotes what he gets to a good purpose." If that is your frame of mind, my friends, let us hold our opinion in abeyance until we can look at the other side of the picture. This man feels so strong in his ability to buy votes and to use his vast power in other ways to gain what he desires, that he fancies he can get along without any help—without even the help of God. Perhaps this man's mother prayed with him when he was a child, but that was so long ago that he has outgrown it. He has listened to big men who have persuaded him that there is no power of God, but the Psalm tells us that God will tear down that man. The grasp of God used in that manner must be a terrible thing, and that is what that man must expect. There will surely come a time when he will wish that he had been more intimate with his Maker, and had lived more in accordance with his laws.

Maybe you have passed his handsome private house and wondered whether you would ever be able to buy such a house for your wife and family. Envy him not, for God will surely pull him out of that house. We shall live to see him humbled and trodden in the dust. And now let us ask ourselves again: "Is it worth while? Can we envy such a man?"

The man to be envied, in my opinion, and the man who is happiest, is the man who puts his trust in the Lord, lives righteously, and is satisfied with much less material wealth. He is the kind of man you can trust; the man who always tells the truth, even though he loses by it materially; the kind of man to whom you feel that you can safely leave the care of your wife and children when you die. Yes, a man of such sterling character and unsullied reputation is, after all, the man to be envied. And if any of you still think that you would prefer to be like that other man and have what he has and are still willing to pay the price he paid for it, let me assure you that you are making a great mistake.

No more true or timely lesson could be taught young men, than the one Mr. Rockefeller used before his Bible class. As we grow in our material resources and as fortunes are piled into such colossal proportions, not always by fair means, we need more and more to be reminded that the only true wealth is that of mind, of heart and character.

As the partridge that gathereth young which she hath not brought forth, so is he that getteth riches, and not by right; in the midst of his days they shall leave him, and at his end he shall be a fool. (Jer. 17: 11, R.V.)

A Boy Artist's Triumph

For an artist of his age, George Davidson, only nineteen years old, of New York, has received unexampled recognition. Recently, at the annual exhibition of the National Academy of Design, a small landscape, entitled "Evening Shadows," was hung next to a large canvas by the eminent painter, John La Farge. The surprise was great when it was learned that the author of the former was a mere youth, hitherto unknown. Young Davidson is a native of Russia and was brought to this country when ten years old. After living for several years in Connecticut he went to New York, poor and without friends, and managed to secure a position in the shop of a crayon artist. There he swept floors, prepared easels, etc., and later drew backgrounds for crayon portraits. Every evening he went to his cheerless hall bedroom, and there worked hard late into the night, drawing and painting. Two years ago he was admitted to the night school at the National Academy of Design, and after that his progress was rapid. When he had produced his now widely known little sketch, he thought but poorly of it, and only on the advice of friends sent it to the exhibition. It was placed on its merits, for the hanging committee had no idea who Davidson was. While there are some immigrants who come to our shores who are undesirable citizens, there are many others of bright minds and pure hearts who make large contributions to our body politic. This son of a poor Russian peasant has in him those qualities which make Americans the sovereigns of a free republic. There is a kinship of genius and hard work which knows no nationality.

And hath made of one blood all nations of men for to dwell on all the face of the earth. (Acts 17: 26.)

Our Letters on the Tramp Problem

ANYONE who reads the very remarkable collection of letters received in response to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S invitation to an open discussion of the Tramp Problem must be convinced of two things: that it is a vital problem and that it penetrates to every State. Writing from actual experience with the tramp, and with a full comprehension of the terrible fact that five hundred thousand men and lads are drifting about the country as vagrants at the present time, these correspondents have entered into the details of this question with hearts touched by sympathy for the unfortunates, and at the same time heedful of what is due to society for its protection from this great army of the idle, the pauper, and the criminal.

Among the many practical suggestions contained in these letters, we note specially those that advocate placing these wanderers on the land, on State or Federal tramp farms. Several believe that the solution is to be found in setting the tramps to the work of road-making at minimum wages. This would have the double advantage of not conflicting with the marketable products of regular labor and of greatly improving our public highways at little cost. Others again hold that the able-bodied tramps should be drafted into the army. Practically all agree that the physically fit should be compelled to work or go to jail. Some of our correspondents seem to regard the question as one to be dealt with by the States; others that it is a problem for the Federal authorities. Still others believe that the root of the trouble lies in our loose immigration system which makes this country the asylum for the criminal and unfit.

It might prove an excellent thing if some State were to put into practice, even in a single county, the road-making plan outlined so clearly by several of our correspondents. It would be beginning at the point of least expenditure. We commend these letters to the careful consideration of our State legislatures and indulge the hope that they may be productive of some practical effort looking toward the solution of this much-vexed problem.

The Motto Bill Signed

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT, on Monday, May 18, gave his executive approval and signature to the bill restoring the motto, "In God We Trust," to the national coinage, from which it was removed almost a year ago.

There will be no delay in restoring the motto. Even before the bill passed the Senate, the Director of the Mint, anticipating restoration, made preparations accordingly. On the new gold "eagle," the motto will occupy a space above the flying eagle, near the rim of the coin. On the ten-dollar piece, it will be to the left and in front of the eagle.

Art critics, medalists, sculptors and a few others may have some caustic comments to make on the new coin, which, from their point of view, may seem overcrowded with emblems, words and figures. There can be no objection to any readjustment in the interest of artistic improvement. But whatever else is removed or eliminated, the grand old motto must remain. May it never again be displaced.

A National "Eye-Opener"

NOW that the conference of State Governors at the White House is over, the results may be seen somewhat in the historical perspective. Of course, it must be remembered that it was a deliberative and not a law-making body. The conference enabled the Governors to get personally acquainted, exchange views, and hear the opinions of the experts whom the President had invited to meet with them. These experts were foresters of experience, mineralogists who spoke on the coming exhaustion of our coal and iron fields, men who were conversant with the present wasteful methods of farming in a large portion of our country, and men who are accustomed to wrestle with our transportation problem. Many of the facts presented may be regarded as "eye-openers" to the men who heard them and also to the country.

be heard in many of the gubernatorial messages read at the opening of the coming session of the State legislatures. Congress can do much, but in conserving the resources of some sections which are essential to the prosperity of all, the States can do more. In preserving our forests, the State legislatures must be depended upon. People in heavily wooded sections often say that there is wood enough, not realizing that the preservation of a certain amount of timber is necessary to preserve the rivers that run through far distant States, and in turn affect the price of transportation, and, as a result, the prices the people in the wooded districts have to pay for things not grown or made at home. As one speaker aptly put it: "First conserve the forests; for no forests, no long navigable rivers; no rivers, no cheap transportation."

We Americans have been told so often of the vastness of our country and of the richness of its soil that the idea had become almost universal that the population could go on increasing indefinitely and the country still prosper under our present methods. With immigrants coming to our shores by the million, we find that the end of available unoccupied land is in sight and that we must look carefully to the future unless we wish to find that our soil is exhausted and unable to meet the demands that will be put upon it. Taken all in all, the conference may be considered as one of the most momentous gatherings in our economic history, and one whose results will be seen in legislation in our States for years to come.

IN late years science has been rapidly multiplying its evidence corroborative of the Bible. Foreign journals are calling attention to two remarkable instances of this character. The first is the striking discovery by that greatest living Egyptologist, Brugsch Bey, of a hieroglyphic record of the failure of the Nile to rise for seven consecutive years, and of a consequent disastrous famine. Of itself, this discovery might have been accepted as establishing the fact that, such a failure having actually occurred, the Biblical story of the famine in the days of Joseph was all the more probable. But the records themselves show that the date of the failure was 1700 B.C., corresponding, as the ablest chronologists believe, with the time of the famine described in Genesis 41.

This totally unforeseen confirmation of Scripture by science, however, is cast into the shade by a far more important one which Professor Randel Harris, an English scholar and investigator, has pointed out. It has reference to the census recorded by Luke, the taking of which caused the journey of Joseph and Mary to Bethlehem. Sceptics and unbelievers generally have long tried to discredit this account of the tax census as a fiction, and hence to stamp the whole story of the Divine birth at Bethlehem as unauthentic and a work of the imagination. Now, after nearly 2,000 years, the evidence of this census is coming to the light. It was one of many similar censuses which were ordered at stated intervals.

Thus as the evidence of science draws closer and closer to the Bible, proof of the strict accuracy of the sacred narrative accumulates. "The impregnable rock of Holy Scripture," as Gladstone once aptly called it, is proof against all the assaults of infidelity and will so remain.

Pensions After Seventy

IS it the duty of a government to provide for the support of all its citizens of good character and repute, after they have become superannuated? This is the huge problem with which Great Britain is now struggling. Stated briefly, Premier Asquith's plan, lately submitted, contemplates an appropriation of $30,000,000 for next year, to provide pensions to about half a million people over seventy years old, single pensioners to receive $1.25 per week and married couples $1.80. This national beneficence is designed only to extend to those whose income does not exceed $2.50 weekly. The plan differs materially from the "Old Age Pension" system of Germany, in which both employers and workers are assessed for the State-aided pension fund, whereas the British scheme would be maintained by the State exclusively, although it would be included in the tax budget and come out of the general pocket in any event. France and Belgium follow the German method and thus make the pension less a charity than an insurance fund. On several occasions, the subject of old age pensions has been discussed seriously in the United States, and the late Andrew Green, Controller of New York City, was a strong advocate of the German system as suited to American needs. Many people in Britain oppose Mr. Asquith's plan as favoring too much of Socialism. The Spectator has denounced it as a scheme that would destroy the spirit of thrift and provision for old age among the workers. Its progress will be watched here with unusual interest by all students of sociological and labor problems.

A Great Woman's Advice

MISS FLORENCE NIGHTINGALE, the famous war nurse, who was so signally honored by the city of London recently, is now very aged—far beyond the octogenarian mark—but she is still keenly alive to the world's progress, especially in respect to the enlarging scope of women's activities. She wrote these words of advice to the juniors of her sex and they will apply to women's work in all lands and under all conditions: "I would say to all young women who are called to any particular vocation, qualify yourselves for it as a man does for his work. Do not think you can understand it otherwise. If you are called to a man's work, do not exact a woman's privilege, the privilege of inaccuracy, of weakness." Miss Nightingale's advice deserves to be remembered. Probably no woman now living is better qualified than she to point out to her sex the value of thoroughness as an essential to success in any calling in life.

Picturing the Passion

SOME of our readers have written us asking whether the production of the Passion Play in living pictures as a public show is a proper spectacle. There is, to our mind, something unspeakably irreverent in the presentation of the Passion of Christ, either in living pictures or by actors. The average Christian will admit that no human presentation could do the subject justice. When it was proposed to introduce the Passion Play, on the Oberammergau model, from Switzerland into this country, good people everywhere protested and the project was dropped. The moving pictures of the Passion Play convey the same impression and make "the tragedy of tragedies" a mere piece of mimicry, with all the petty stage effects of an ordinary play. It is a desecration of the ideal and a travesty on the reality. Somehow, it revolts the true Christian to have any one personate divinity.

WHAT SHALL WE DO WITH THE TRAMP?

"Christian Herald" Readers Express Their Views as to the Solution of this Interesting Problem

THAT the Tramp Problem is one of universal interest is shown by the very large number of letters received in response to the invitation to our readers to express their views on this burning question. In the letters below, a wide variety of opinions are expressed. Some are startling in the novelty of their suggestions, and many show a comprehensive grasp of the question. We can give only a part of the voluminous correspondence in the present issue.

Two Classes of Tramps

There are two classes of tramps—the professional and the non-professional. The professional that seeks no employment is a nuisance and should be abated by drastic measures. To protect the non-professional or labor-seeker, let each and every man that has worked for an employer six months, not less than three, procure an employer's certificate stating said facts, take it to a justice of the peace of any township or to a burgess or mayor of any borough or city and procure a thirty-day permit or transport to place or places to which he desires to go. If any person or persons are found seeking alms from door to door without said transport certificate, then they should be arrested for professional tramping and sent to prison at hard labor.

Treat Them Like the Indians

Get all the tramps corralled, and then give them homestead claims in certain sections in the United States. A large building should be constructed by the government in some agricultural section. It should have an employment bureau, and such men as were not adapted to farm life could secure work at various trades. This is something similar to the methods we have employed in dealing with the Indian problem.

Draft Them Into the Army

My experience is that tramps will not work, unless under armed force, and that it would be a great blessing to the tramp and the entire country to draft them into the army. To give the tramp five years of hard military service and labor with the promise of five years more if the first five did not cure.

State Homes or Colonies

I do not think making soldiers of them would be a wise or safe plan, as we could not be sure of their loyalty. A better way would be to have a home in each State, with work, board and a fair wage, until other work could be found. If again found tramping let him be arrested and sent back to his State colony or home.

Foreign Immigration a Menace

Tramps, as a rule, are untrustworthy as helpers in any line of work. Should we be obliged to employ one, he would demand the highest wages and stay long enough to get money to go back to the saloon, and then beg a meal at another neighbor's door.

I think the foreign immigration is making trampism a menace to the nation. If the government is the ruling power, the government should be held responsible, and provide as a whole for them. Perhaps it wouldn't be quite right to round them up and use them as food for powder, but it would be justice to make them know that honest labor is honorable in all, and if they expect food, raiment and shelter, let them earn it.

Farm Work and Road Work

Enough country homes to accommodate all the tramps should be established in various places. Have these homes supervised by Christian people and have the tramps do all the farm work, and during their recreation period have them become familiar with the Bible, and where help is needed to work on the roads. Those that are faithful should receive a small sum of money after they have earned more than their board and clothes. In my solution of the tramp problem I voice the sentiment of five. We are very much concerned as to what will be done with the tramp.

Kindness the Solution

It is an unwelcome fact that the tramps are almost all of American birth. If you investigate their life history you will almost invariably find that their early environment was harsh and inhuman. Strangers to kindness or encouragement, pressed down the slopes of life with never a helping hand or kind word of encouragement to raise them to a higher life, they are not as a class void of sentiment. If we would maintain toward all our fellow beings a true, unselfish, sympathetic, uplifting, Christian spirit, endeavoring always to encourage the despondent by kind words and deeds, laying aside false pride, emulating the Master's life, always striving to eradicate evil environments, thereby elevating the standard of life, the hobo would gradually disappear.

Make Them Soldiers

Gather them in and put them to work in the different State industrial institutions. Use them like human beings and try to make them good, respectable men. Why shouldn't some of them be "food for powder" as well as our worthy young men? If only the worthy were sent to war, there would soon be no one left but hobos. We could spare a few thousand peddlers, too.

Treat Them With Kindness

Having lived in a railroad town on the Southern Pacific for twenty-two years, I have fed and met many tramps, but very few aged ones. Many boy tramps have come to my home. I have never turned them away, and have always saved old clothing for them. I suggest to you readers to always treat a boy tramp as you would wish your own boy treated, or your brother. I have noticed that even the Piute Indians are willing to share their meal with a tramp. I think tramps can be helped individually, and I know of one who became one of the best young men of our town.

Put Them on "Tramp Farms"

Why should not our government institute farms on which is a variety of work, and send the tramp there to raise crops of wheat, corn, grass, etc.? Then the tramp can have plenty of milk and butter and bread, with all the other good things a farm can produce.

MRS. E. S. TIMBERLAKE.

Dissolve the Trades Unions

Dissolve all unions, orders and societies that are leagued together for their own benefit, to the exclusion of all others. Call no man a tramp who will work, and is shut out because of the above and can not secure work during a season of depression, neither call him a "scab" who stands on his merit and secures work. Close all dram-shops and dens of vice; teach industry, sobriety and frugality; and, above all, the royal law and Gospel. Bancroft says, "A spiritual unity binds together every member of the human family." This will solve the tramp problem.

J. A. MOLTZ.

Give Them Town Employment

Each incorporated town should give employment to such as ask for it, in any work that would be most beneficial to that particular place. Do not make of it a prison, but a refuge. Do not make it too religious.

Julesburg, Colo.

Establish Tramp Industries

No doubt a multitude of our tramps, if properly dealt with, might become respectable, independent citizens. Of course many are simply worthless, and should be forced on the rock pile with bread-and-water diet, until they were glad of a chance to earn an honest living. It seems to me those who honestly desire to work might be easily picked from the worthless by the following plan: There could be established in each county an institution with various industrial and manufacturing occupations. This establishment should have at its head the most capable and conscientious manager obtainable. The main part of the wage could be in the form of board and lodging furnished by the institution. In connection with this an employment bureau could be conducted, so that more lucrative employment could be obtained for worthy men. The wages should not be high enough to rival ordinary work or cause the institution to become crowded. This place should not in any sense be a prison or reformatory, but should at all times be a refuge for those seeking employment.

A rock pile with bread and water and prison accommodations should be furnished those who persisted in "beating" their way.

Oceanside, Calif. F. H. FISHER.

Put Them at Agricultural Work

New Jersey could put about one of her tramps loading cars with rich muck near Newark and transport it to the poor sandy soil in the southern part of the State, where the other half could use it in cultivation of fruits, etc. Allow five acres to each man as his as soon as his wages enough to pay for it.

Gladstone, N. J. J. FLOMERFELT.

Liquor Makes the Tramp

If our Christian nation would stop the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors within her bounds, the would be a decrease of tramps.

Parkville, Mo. F. P. CHEDESTER.

A Saved Tramp's Testimony

I was a tramp, without hope, bitter and lost. On the night of October 9, 1898, I went into a mission in Washington, D. C., where I found Christ. He took out of me the love for tobacco and whisky. He saved me. The tramp is not a Christian; when he becomes a Christian he will find work. Let us have Gospel missions and give the tramp saved and he will become useful.

J. B. DREWETT.

Rosemary, N. C.

Government "Tramp Farms"

As a farmer, I will give my view of the tramp question. A tramp in the country is really only another name for a beggar, and is usually a man who prefers tramping to working. I would suggest that the United States government buy farms or tracts of land in each State, one or more in each State as seems necessary, to be used as farms where tramps can be employed and paid fair wages for their work, until employment can be found for them elsewhere. All able-bodied men found tramping or begging must be sent to these farms and there employed, and when they refuse to stay there until employment could be found for them elsewhere, but return to tramping, they should be considered as criminals and sent to prison.

Leonta, N. Y. PARKER KNAPP.

Let Government Provide Work

To labor is made a God-commanded duty of all men, hence no man who is able to work, and who has a reasonable opportunity of doing so, can ever have a moral right to live a life of idleness.

The duty of the government toward the tramp is the same as its duty toward all other unemployed citizens. It should provide them work on just and reasonable conditions. Such work should include the cultivation of the soil by suitable machinery, and under the direction of expert farmers.

A New Serial Written for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

Author of "Into Still Waters," etc.

DID you ever know any that was good? I mean that didn't beat their wives and bang 'em 'round? Did you, Bobby?" inquired Margaret.

Bobby laughed. He lifted his chin quizzically, and gazed down from the lofty superiority of his fourteen years. "Sure, an' ain't ye beginnin' sort o' early ter worry about husbands?" he asked. "But mebbe you've already—picked him out! eh?"

Margaret did not seem to hear. She was looking straight through a little open space in the boughs of the apple tree to the blue sky far beyond.

"Bobby," she began in a voice scarcely above a whisper, "if that man should be bad to my mother I think I'd—kill him."

Bobby roused himself. He suddenly remembered Joe Bagley and the kitten. "What man?" he asked.

"Dr. Spencer."

"Dr. Spencer!" gasped Bobby. "Why, Dr. Spencer wouldn't hurt a fly. He's the best bully!"

Margaret stirred restlessly. She turned a grave face on her companion.

"Bobby," she reproved gently, "I don't think I'd oughter hear them words if I ain't 'lowed to use 'em myself."

Bobby uptilted his nose.

"I've heard your ma say 'ain't wa'n't proper," he observed virtuously. "I shouldn't have mentioned it, only—well, seein' as how you're gettin' so awful particular—!" For the more telling effect he left the sentence unfinished.

Again Margaret did not seem to hear. Again her eyes had sought the patch of blue showing through the green leaves.

"Dr. Spencer may be nice now, but he ain't a husband—yet," she said. "There was Tim Sullivan and Patty's father and Mike Whalen," she enumerated aloud. "And they was all—Bobby, was your father a good husband?" she demanded, with a sudden turn that brought her eyes squarely round to his.

The boy was silent.

"Bobby, was he?"

Slowly the boy's eyes fell.

"Why, of course, sometimes dad would—" he began; but Margaret interrupted him.

"I knew it—I just knew it—I just knew there wasn't any," she moaned; "but I can't make mother see it—I just can't!"

This was but the first of many talks between Margaret and Bobby upon the same subject, and always Margaret was seeking for a possible averting of the catastrophe. To convince her mother of the awfulness of the fate awaiting her, and so to persuade her to abandon the idea of marriage, was out of the question, Margaret soon found. It was then, perhaps, that the idea of speaking to the doctor himself first came to her.

"If I could only get him to promise things!" she said to Bobby. "If I could only get him to promise!"

"Promise?"

"Yes; to be good and kind, you know," nodded Margaret, "and not like a husband."

Bobby laughed; then he frowned and was silent. Suddenly his face changed.

"I say, you might make him sign a contract," he hazarded.

"Contract?"

"Sure! One of them things that makes folks toe the mark whether they wants to or not. I'll draw it up for you—that's what they call it," he explained airily; and, as Margaret bubbled over with delight and thanks, he his readiness to undertake this little matter of drawing up a contract for Margaret, his first client.

It was some days, nevertheless, before the work was ready for the doctor's signature. The young lawyer, unfortunately, could not give all of his time to his own affairs; there were still the trivial duties of his office to perform. He found, too, that the big words which fell so glibly from the

"What does this mean?" asked Mrs. Kendall added: "Not at all. 'Tain't nothin'. Glad ter do it, I'm sure!"

For a month now Bobby had swept the floor and dusted the books in the law office of Burt & Burt, to say nothing of running errands and tending door. In days gone by, the law, as represented by the policeman on the corner, was something to be avoided; but to-day, as represented by a frock coat, a tall hat, and a vocabulary bristling with big words, it was something that was most alluring—so alluring, in fact, that Bobby had determined to adopt it as his own. He himself would be a lawyer—tall hat, frock coat, big words and all. Hence lips of the great Burt & Burt were anything but easily managed when he tried to put them upon paper himself. Bobby was ambitious and persistent, however, and where knowledge failed, imagination stepped boldly to the front. In the end it was with no little pride that he displayed the result of his labor to his client; then, with her gleeful words of approval still ringing in his ears, he slipped it into its envelope, sealed, stamped and posted it. Thus it happened that the next day a very much amazed physician received this in his mail:

"To whom it may concern:

"Whereas, I, the undersigned, being in my sane mind do intend to commit matrimony; I, the undersigned, do hereby solemnly declare and agree, to wit, not to beat my aforesaid wife. Not to bang her round. Not to falsely, wickedly and maliciously treat her. Not once. Moreover, I, the said undersigned, do solemnly swear all this to Margaret Kendall, the daughter and lawful protector of the said wife, to wit, Mrs. Kendall. And, whereas, if I, the aforesaid undersigned, do break and violate this my solemn oath concerning the said wife, I do hereby swear that she, to wit, Margaret Kendall, may bestow upon me such punishment as seems eminently proper to her at such time as she sees fit. Whereas and whereunto, I have, this day, set my hand and seal."

Here followed a space for the signature, and a somewhat thumbled, irregular daub of red sealing wax.

CHAPTER V

IT was a particularly warm July evening, but a faint breeze from the west stirred the leaves of the crimson rambler that climbed over the front veranda at Five Oaks, and brought the first relief from the scorching heat. The great stone lions loomed out of the shadows and caught the moonlight full on their shaggy heads. To the doctor, sitting alone on the veranda steps, they seemed almost alive, and he smiled at the thought that came to him.

"So you think you, too, are guarding her," he chuckled quickly. "Pray, are you also her 'lawful protector'?"

A light step sounded on the floor behind him, and he sprang to his feet.

"She's asleep," said Mrs. Kendall, softly. "She dropped asleep almost as soon as she had touched the pillow. Dear child!"

"Yes, children are apt—Amy, dearest!" broke off the doctor, sharply; "you are crying!"

"No, no, it is nothing," assured Mrs. Kendall, as the doctor led her to a chair. "It is always this way, only to-night it was a—little more heart-breaking than usual."

"Always this way! 'Heart-breaking! Why, Amy!"

Mrs. Kendall smiled, then raised her hand to brush away a tear.

"You don't understand," she murmured. "It's the bedtime prayer—Margaret's." Then, at the doctor's amazed frown, she added: "The dear child goes over her whole day, bit by bit, and asks forgiveness for countless misdemeanors, and it nearly breaks my heart, for it shows how many times I have said 'don't' to the poor little thing since morning. And as if that were not piteous enough, she must needs ask the dear Father to tell her how to handle her fork, and how to sit, walk and talk so's to please mother. Harry, what shall I do?"

"What you are doing," returned the doctor. "You are loving her, and surrounding her with everything good and beautiful."

"But I want to do right myself."

"And you are doing just right, dear."

"But the results—they are so irregular and uneven," sighed the mother,

SERVING CHRIST THROUGH LOVE

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts*

JESUS in this lesson puts the beginning and end of Christian living in four words: "Love me; serve me." Service is slavery if it does not begin in love, and love is a fruitless blossom if it does not grow into the service of humanity. Do you wish to join the church? The two vital questions are: Do you really love Jesus Christ? What definite service are you ready to perform in his name for his lambs or sheep?

"I go a fishing" (John 21:3). Some have suggested that Peter had relapsed again from his apostolic duties, because while waiting with six other apostles in Galilee for the risen Christ, who had promised to meet them there, he proposed that they should "go a fishing." It reminds us of the modern Pharisee that thought a boy who had shortly before joined the church was backsliding because he was sliding down hill. Fishing, whether as amusement at proper times or as honest toil, is more Christian than idleness. In this fishing Christ himself took a hand. Blessed is every amusement or toil in which we have the companionship and help of Christ.

One Way to Serve Christ

"Do you want a boy, sir?" The merchant addressed looked up from his desk and said, "What can you do?" "I will do anything that will give me an honest living." "Well, take these boots downstairs and black them." The boy was a minister's son, whose father, now dead, had entertained many of his fellow preachers, and he had taught this boy that blacking ministers' boots was washing the disciples' feet. The boots were soon brought back, handsomely polished. The merchant said, "Well, my lad, you have done that job very well indeed." "Yes, sir," said the boy modestly, "mother always told me to do well whatever I did." "Come here to-morrow," the merchant said, "and I will give you a trial." The boy kept to his rule to "do faithfully, as unto the Lord," whatever he did, and rose to be the president of a great banking institution. To serve masters or customers faithfully is one way to serve Christ.

The fishing incident was a fitting prelude to Peter's call to Christian work, reminding him in the empty nets after a night of toil of what he had so much needed to learn, "Without me ye can do nothing." When we have learned that and are willing to be but the obedient helpers of Christ, he fills our nets. Jesus fed the apostles, apparently not from their great catch, but from bread and fish he had provided, perhaps miraculously as in earlier cases. The breakfast over, he walks away with Peter to commission him to feed the children, the young people, and the old folks with spiritual bread. He must first store his own heart with love, and, out of that inner supply, "feed the flock of God." God forbid that any teacher should be forced to answer in the negative to Jesus' question: "Have ye any meat?" Rather may we come to feed our classes from nets full to overflowing.

We come now to the wonderful dialogue of Christ and Peter. There are three questions to call up the three denials.

"Simon, esteemest thou me more than these?" "Yea, Lord, thou knowest that I love thee." "Feed my lambs."

Love in Christian Work

"Simon, esteemest thou me?" "Yea, Lord, thou knowest that I love thee." "Tend my young sheep."

"Simon, lovest thou me?" "Lord, thou knowest all things; thou knowest that I love thee." "Feed my sheep."

Note that Christ, with all his tenderness, uses the lance of love in quickening Peter's conviction of sin. He calls him "Simon"—his old fisher name—for he has not yet proved himself Peter, the man of rock. He cuts deep again as he says, "More than these," reminding Peter of his vain boast that though all others should forsake Christ, his love would never fail. Deeper yet went the faithful lance when by repeating the question, "Lovest thou me?" three times, Christ recalled Peter's threefold denial. Let us not deal with repentant ones with such overgentleness that their conviction of sin shall be only half developed, and their repentance, therefore, only half in earnest. Note also that love, not learning, is the first condition of successful Christian work.

Thy love shall chant its own beatitudes
After its own life's working. A child's kiss Set on thy sighing lips shall make thee glad;
A poor man served by thee shall make thee rich;
A sick man helped by thee shall make thee strong.

MRS. BROWNING.

"Lovest thou me?" Hopu, a young Sandwich Islander, was brought to this country to be educated. At a gathering in the home where Hopu boarded, an infidel lawyer amused himself by asking Hopu puzzling questions. He was confused at first, but at last he turned to the lawyer and said: "I am

Trumbull writes of the child: "As soon as he is capable of learning that his voice can be heard by his loving father in another room, he is capable of learning that his voice is heard by a loving Father whom he has never seen, who is always within hearing, but never within sight; who is the loving Father of his father and mother, as well as of himself and of everybody else; who is able to do all things, and is sure to do all things well."

The Command's Wide Meaning

Feeding the lambs means more than church work for children. It means children's aid societies, orphanages, anti-cruelty societies, charity kindergartens, everything that safeguards the children. "Tend my young sheep." This is God's command to pastors, teachers and parents, to safeguard the young people. That this command of Christ needs to be reiterated is manifest especially in behalf of boys, when we recall that while in the primary departments of Sunday schools the proportion of boys to girls is as five to six, in the main school it is two to six.

Fishermen on the Sea of Galilee

a poor heathen boy, sir, and I can not help it if you are amused at my blunders and mistakes. But there will by and by be a big meeting, much bigger than this. We shall all be there and we shall all be asked one question: 'Do you love the Lord Jesus Christ?' Now, sir, I say 'Yes.' What will you say?" The whole company was silent and the lawyer was quite upset, but pretending to keep up his banter he asked Hopu to pray, which he did with impressive earnestness. The lawyer left the house soon after, but could not get away from the questions, "Do you love Christ? What will you say?" until he had answered them as Peter did. Let us not forget that Christianity is loving the living Christ, not an impersonal creed or church, or even the Book of books, which we may honor only in subordination to a higher personal love for him.

Feeding the Lambs

"Feed my lambs." If Jesus can call children "my lambs," they can surely be Christians. It is absurd to assume that they have no right in the church fold till they are grown to such strength that they scarcely need it; to suppose they must first be tested by exposure outside the fold to winds and wolves, and welcomed inside only when they have been driven to it torn and wounded with sin. Dr. Henry Clay colt"—Then the boy began to see the point, and paused and blushed and looked at his uncle in mute appeal for mercy. Nothing more was said, but he had learned something of a mother's duty to "colts."

The Great Commandment

"Feed my sheep." We are not to forget the older people, not even the oldest in our zeal for the young. The pastor and his helpers must be awake to the interest of all. A train was once wrecked at Slateford, Pa. The train had rushed to ruin, right in the face of signals of danger, showing that the engineer, who was crushed in the wreck must have been asleep or dead as he sat in his cab with the responsibility of the train upon him. Whether he was at fault or not can never be known, but there is no doubt that many on whose fidelity the eternal destiny of others hangs are in a guilty sleep when they should be heeding, and bidding others heed, the danger signals of a sinful life.

As in our country the crimes of murder, theft and perjury against the individual are reckoned less than the crimes of treason and rebellion against the State, so in God's government the first and great commandment is not, as many would seem to think, "Thou shalt not kill," but rather "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God." Disobedience to the first and great commandment is treason against God, while violation of the latter commandment is only petty crime beside it, because wronging God is worse than wronging man. God's own record of the capital crime of unsaved men is, "Sin, because they believe not on me."

Like any true father God says to each of his sons and daughters, "I want your obedience, but most of all I want your heart. It is no great happiness for Christ to enter the house of our obedience and yet not enter into the heart of our love, as when he was invited in the house of that other Simon, the proud Pharisee, whose conversation showed that in his heart the Son of Man had no place to lay his head. God cries to every one of us, "My son, my daughter, give me thine heart."

A Persistent Questioner

A little girl who had learned to love the Saviour was told that a certain man was an infidel. "What is an infidel?" she inquired; and when it was explained to her she seemed very much surprised. A few days after that this man was walking down the street, and the little girl came up to him and said: "Why don't you love Jesus?" He pushed her away, but she repeated the question again and again, and he saw that there were tears in her eyes. That question began to trouble him. He could not get rid of it day or night. It kept coming up to him from the sidewalk, from the letters on his desk, from the voices of his children at play, and the pillow kept whispering it to him at night: "Why don't you love Jesus?"

At last he got up and said: "I will go and get the Bible and find some place where Christ has contradicted himself, and that will be a good reason why I should not love him." So he took the Book and opened it at the Gospel of John, and there he found out reasons for loving the Son of God instead of hating him, and before the sun was up he had given his heart to God.

At Loss for Words

Dear Dr. Klopsch: "Five Hundred Fascinating Animal Stories" came this morning, and I am at a loss for words to express my appreciation of it. I think the subscribers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD owe you a debt of gratitude for making it possible for them to possess such books as you are giving as premiums for subscriptions to your excellent paper. I am a woman sixty-two years of age. I have been a "shut-in" for twenty-two years, but with such premiums as you give time passes easily in reading them.

Early Marriages and Poverty

By Margaret E. Sangster

I HAVE read with interest the recent communications in THE MAIL-BAG, and the opinions expressed on the editorial page of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, with reference to early marriage and poverty. Before going into the question let me speak of two or three instances known to myself or familiar to the public in general.

Years ago in Holland a young and gifted artist whose fame later became world-wide said to his young wife, "I am going across the Atlantic to see what I can do in America." They had almost no money and the man had yet to show the stuff that was in him. The young wife said, "By all means let us make the venture, but you shall not go alone. Where there's bread for one, there's bread for two." They crossed the ocean in a sailing vessel and the voyage lasted thirty days. They encountered rough weather and were in danger of shipwreck, but they reached the new land safely and set up their modest little home, the man painting his pictures there, the wife doing her own work, and the combination of genius, thrift and true love before many years wrought what might seem, to some of the opponents of early marriage almost a miracle. I have often been in that artist's studio, and many a time have I been a guest in the beautiful home where later a genuine and charming hospitality gathered visitors from Europe and America. There was little capital to begin with in this case beyond that of genius, capacity for hard work and a fund of common sense, united with a talent for good management—qualities altogether making successful the partnership of husband and wife.

Another true story occurs to my memory. The Civil War was just over. A young man who had fought on the confederate side and had ventured everything he had in the world for that lost cause, came north with his wife with just enough money to pay the rent of a very small apartment for a single month. He had no capital except that of a clever brain, a liberal education and a determination to win his way. Walking into the office of a great daily newspaper he asked the city editor for something to do. He was given an assignment, and set out to write the story of something that had happened the night before concerning which the town was in a state of effervescence. He wrote the story and it was accepted. He was then asked if he could write paragraphs. To the uninitiated it would seem that nothing is easier than the writing of brief paragraphs with pith and point and a dash of local color. In reality, few things are quite so difficult. My friend sat down at a desk and tried his hand at paragraphing. In two days he had an appointment on the staff of the paper with a small weekly salary, sufficient, however, to keep the wolf from the door and to provide shelter and food for his little home. I have known this man as one of the editors of a leading New York newspaper, as the author of many books; I have seen him surrounded by his children, who have forged ahead worthily; and I know how constant and steady was the progress of that household from its day of small things to its day of large estate.

We are told, and it is commonly believed, that many of the great fortunes of this lavish period were founded three generations ago by young men and women who had not dreamed of accumulating two thousand dollars before they were thirty, and who had dared to marry in the bloom and enthusiasm of their early youth. I am persuaded that legislation on a subject so vitally connected with the welfare of the race could not take a prohibitive form without leading to vice and degeneracy. I very much doubt whether the common sense of the people would ever sanction or tolerate legal enactments forbidding young men and women to marry after they had reached full maturity, whether they were rich or poor. Poverty and wealth are relative terms. A few years ago two young people, children of wealthy parents, were united in marriage. He may have been twenty-six, she was twenty-two. The young husband had a salary of eight thousand dollars a year, and the wife's father continued to her the personal allowance of her girlhood, while her mother insisted on buying her clothing. At the end of a twelve-month the extravagant young married pair had spent all their money, were deeply in debt, and with tears in their eyes lamented the fact that exists only in name. Furtive vices that eat like moths into the social fabric go hand in hand with distrust in God and contempt for the family tie. As some correspondents have pointed out, the saloon with its open doors, its brilliant lights, its air of good fellowship and its absorption of men's wages, is a foe to marriage and an explanation of crime, poverty and social degradation that can not be ignored. When the man's wages go into the till of the saloonkeeper, wife and children are apt to be hungry and naked, and the family goes swiftly down hill on a toboggan slide to misery and wretchedness. In one of William De Morgan's remarkable books, Alice for Short, there is given the history of a family that might almost be taken from the novel and printed as a tract. The husband starts out as a fashionable tailor with a fine shop, a large number of excellent customers and a sufficient capital of brains and money. He has a beautiful young wife whom he loves and who loves him. In their case, intemperance of both gives them the fatal downward push that culminates at last in life in a cellar, murder and suicide.

Can we with any show of reason venture the assertion that there shall be a fixed period for a thing so important as marriage in a world where circumstances and individuals are necessarily so dissimilar? The conditions, for instance, in a fishing hamlet, a mountain village, an inland town and a great metropolis are different. It costs more to live in some places than in others. Not so much danger inheres in too early marriage, in my judgment, as in the tendency to congestion in the cities. All over the land there are places where a good living might be made if people would but go to the farming districts where they are wanted, and stay away from the overpopulated districts that we call the slums.

There is no fixed period at which men and women arrive at mental or physical maturity. Some are ready for marriage at twenty-one—as ready then to undertake the serious work of life as others at thirty. The great achievements of this world have often been set to the account of men young in years, but mature in thought and purpose. A certain situation exists in provincial districts remote from the metropolis, where whole villages derive their income from a single industry, as, for instance, canning fruit, binding shoes, or stitching gloves. In a town where children have no time to play, where young people have no social life, girls no household training, boys no inducement to save anything, many indiscreet marriages take place and much consequent poverty results. The girl and the boy who have worked in the mill together marry either on their joint wages or on the wages of one. By the time that a babe is born, or when two or three children have followed each other into the world, the hearts of both husband and wife are discouraged, and the temptation comes to the man to find in drink relief from the upbraidings of his conscience and the fretfulness of his wife. In this case the destruction of the poor is their poverty. The remedy, however, is to be sought rather in better preliminary training for both than in prohibition of early marriage.

As one reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD very truly said, "We would have lacked many great leaders had marriage been forbidden to the poor." Abraham Lincoln, than whom we have had no greater example of goodness and grandeur in this country, was brought up in the atmosphere of the most austere poverty. Something must always be credited to ancestry, a good stock producing a good tree, and valor thriving amid hardships, to triumph in the end.

Communicating by Signs

LANGUAGE is not confined to spoken words. The cowboys in the West and the Indians who roam over the plains may not be able to talk to one another, but by means of a sign language which is picturesque and forcible they manage to make their wants known as easily as if they spoke a single familiar tongue. One understands what it is to be independent of speech when one sees how easily these rough riders and these children of the tent can make themselves understood.

Everything in this world is relative. The extravagance of the avenue mansion and that of the downtown tenement are about equal, and foolish management at one end of the scale is as disastrous as it is at the other.

Unfortunately, the tendency with us is to later and later marriage, to selfishness and luxury on the part of men and women who cling to their bachelor freedom and their spinster independence, and more and more become indifferent to love and home. I would not like to say that both in high and low there is a decided increase in the number of immoral connections loosely formed to the dishonor of women and the degeneracy of men, and yet no one can live at this time and be blind to the fact that much of the apparent celibacy of the day

A LOG COLLEGE IN THE MOUNTAINS

WITHERSPOON COLlege at the mouth of Squabble Creek, on the middle fork of the Kentucky River, in the Buckhorn Settlement, is drawing to the close of the fifth year of its work. During the first year of its existence I wrote to a friend of what we were trying to do, and she replied, "What!
you call it a College, and 'Witherspoon'?" It did seem presumptuous, but so we named it. It will certainly not be a college for some years yet, but we still entertain the hope we had in naming the infant, that it will grow and some time, when they are needed, have the men and equipment to give choice boys and girls, who could not get it elsewhere, the higher learning, right here among their own hills.

We have a few boys almost ready for college now, but there is not yet an apparent demand for anything more than a preparatory school with a normal department, and this we have established.

Five years ago the little strip of bottom land and foothill, where the five substantial log buildings belonging to the school, the three stores, more than a dozen pretty little residences, and the church, which make up the heart of the settlement, now stand, was partly a waste of old field and partly cornfield.
We speak comfortably of our little settlement as a town even as we do of the school as "the college," but we do not want a real town with its attendant evils, any more than we at present need a real college.

We feel sure it is providential that, for the lack of funds to enlarge the buildings, the growth of the school in numbers has been limited. We reached the limit of our capacity to accommodate boarding students almost immediately, and so our roll has stood at something over two hundred for the last three years. We did not have the dormitories or refectory at first. More than a hundred of the students come as day pupils from this district, sixty we accommodate by crowding in the dormitories, the others find places to board in the community.

We have been able to get on quite intimate terms with the students and have already a clientèle which, in the ordinary course of events, should supply us with students for many years.
We have boarders, both boys and girls, still with us who started with the opening of the first dormitory four years ago, and some at least of these expect to be back next year. Their younger brothers and sisters are already in, and they speak confidently of when the little ones at home will enter.

Every year we are turning them away for lack of room, and it is a sore trial. We crowd them more than is best, but what is one to do in a case like this? A girl comes a long, cold journey on a mule over mountains and creeks and is told, "There is no place;
we are already overcrowded." She says,
"I don't know what to do; I want to go to school and I haven't the money to go anywhere else; I know the Blank girls who are here, and I know they will take me in their room if you will let me stay." The Blank girls are consulted and are willing—I do not believe they will do well crowded, but—we take her in. This is only one of many such instances.

We would like to double our dormitories and accommodate about two-thirds as many more students, without crowding; opening up able reading and recitation rooms and adding at least two more member the faculty, who would be members of the ho (one for girls and one boys) and helpers in the influence.

The cooking and sewing classes for the girls and manual training for boys, which we have had in mind, still wait the stirring of the heart some one whose hand he a purse string.

We have, however, a more immediate than

HONORING A PATRIOT'S MEMORY

BOTH the National Government and the State of New York have joined in making the removal of the body of General George Clinton from its resting place in Washington to Kingston, N. Y., an impressive series of patriotic ceremonies.

It was arranged to have the body brought from Washington to Jersey City. Then it was to be placed on board the United States revenue cutter Mohawk, which would then sail for the Battery, at the lower end of Manhattan. There several battalions of regulars from Governor's Island, detachments of sailors from the Navy Yard in Brooklyn, and other military bodies, including the Old Guard and the Veteran Corps of Artillery, would form to receive it. The parade would then move to the famous Fraunce's Tavern, in which Washington bade adieu to his generals, where exercises of commemorative character would be held. Then, escorted by the troops, the line of march would be taken for the City Hall, and the body placed in the Governor's Room. The next morning it would be conveyed to the Hudson River and placed on board a United States torpedo boat destroyer and conveyed up the river, through the Highlands where Clinton fought so gallantly, and on to Kingston.

General George Clinton was one of the finest figures that surrounded Washington when the nation was in the making. He was born in the county of Ulster, New York, on July 17, 1739, and the name George was given him in honor of a distant relative, George Clinton, the old colonial Governor who was father of Sir Henry Clinton. The younger George came naturally by his inclination for a military and public career. One of his ancestors, William Clinton, had fought gallantly as a cavalier officer in the army of Charles the First of England. When the royal cause was lost he escaped first to Scotland

General George Clinton and later to Ireland. A son, James, married a daughter of one of Cromwell's officers, and a grandson, Charles, came to America and settled in Little Britain, N. Y. This Charles Clinton was a gentleman of education, a writer of verse, and a brave officer.

George was educated by his father and a learned clergyman of the Presbyterian Church who was a graduate of the University of Aberdeen. While busy with his books the French war broke out, and Clinton felt the martial blood of his forefathers stirring in his veins. Books were forgotten, he ran away from home and was soon serving as a volunteer on a ship sent to intercept French convoys. At nineteen he was back on shore, and joining his father and brother fought in the trenches before Frontenac.

When the golden lilies of France had given way to the red cross of St.
George, and the troops came back, Clinton returned to his books and began the study of law. At twenty he was clerk of the Court of Common Pleas. In 1765 he was Surrogate, and in 1768 he became a member of the Colonial Assembly, with which he remained until the opening of the Revolution, when he was sent as a delegate to the Continental Congress. He was called back to his military command and was assigned to the defense of the Hudson Highlands. He had to defend the passage of the Hudson against Burgoyne on the north and Sir Henry Clinton at the south. In 1777 he was made Governor. His defense of the Hudson forts against Sir Henry's overpowering numbers is one of the heroic chapters of the Revolution. Before the close of the war he fought two more campaigns at the North. He had the triumph of entering New York City by the side of Washington on "evacuation day." He was Governor for eighteen years, and when Jefferson was elected President Clinton became Vice-President and he was re-elected to serve with Presiden Madison. He was holding the Vice-Presidency when he died in Washington in April, 1812, and his body was buried in the Congressional burying ground. On his tombstone were the words: "While he lived, his virtue, wisdom, and valor were the pride, the ornament, and security of his country; and when he died, he left an illustrious example of a well-spent life, worthy of all imitation."

the only missionaries in this republic, and our literature partly supplies the lack of missionaries.
We have rejoiced in the great work wrought through this branch of our work. We have three native helpers, yet each has a district so large than once or twice a year. With a few more helpers at $10 a month and a woman helper for $60 a year, a still greater work could be done."

The Transformation of Margaret

desperately. "One minute she is the gentle, loving little girl I held in my arms five years ago; and the next she is—well, she isn't Margaret at all."

"N," smiled the doctor. "She isn't Margaret at all. She is Mag of the Alley, dependent on her wits and her fists for life itself. Don't worry, sweetheart. It will all come right in time; it can't help it—but it will take her time."

"She tries so hard—the little precious—and she does love me."

A curious smile curved the doctor's lips.

"She does," he said dryly.

"Why, Harry, what—?" Mrs. Kendall's eyes were questioning.

The doctor hesitated. Then very slowly he drew from his pocket a large, somewhat legal-looking document.

"I hardly know whether to share this with you or not," he began. "Still, it is so good to keep to myself, and it concerns you intimately; moreover, you may be able to assist me with some advice in the matter, or at least with some passable explanation." And he held out the paper.

Mrs. Kendall turned in her chair so that the light from the open hall-door would fall upon the round, cramped handwriting.

"To whom it may concern," she read aloud. "Whereas, I, the undersigned, being in my sane mind do intend to commit matrimony—"

"Why, Harry, what in the world is this?" she demanded.

"To—on—read," returned the doctor, with a nonchalant wave of his hand.

"I, the said undersigned, do hereby solemnly declare and agree, to wit, not to let my aforesaid wife. Not to bang her round. Not to falsely, wickedly and maliciously treat her. Not once. Moreover, I, the said undersigned, do solemnly swear all this to Margaret Kendall, the daughter and lawful protector of the said wife, to wit, Mrs. Kendall. Margaret!" breathed Mrs. Kendall.

"Harry, what in the world does this mean?" gasped Mrs. Kendall, half laughing, half crying, and wholly amazed.

"But that is exactly what I was going to ask you," parried the doctor.

"You don't mean that Margaret wrote—but she couldn't; besides, it isn't her writing."

"No; Margaret didn't write it. For the part I think I detect the earmarks of young McGinnis. At all events it came from him."

"Bobby?"

"Yes."

"But who—?" Mrs. Kendall stopped abruptly. A dawning comprehension came into her eyes. "You mean—Harry, she was at the bottom of it! I remember now. It was only a week or two ago that she used those same words to me. She insisted that you would beat me and—bang me around. Oh, Margaret, Margaret, my poor little girl!"

The doctor smiled. He shook his head gravely.

"Poor child! She hasn't seen much of conjugal felicity, has she?" he murmured; then, softly, "It is left for us, sweetheart, to teach her—that."

The color deepened in Mrs. Kendall's cheeks. Her eyes softened, then danced merrily.

"But you haven't signed—this, sir, yes!" she challenged laughingly, as she held out the paper.

"He caught both paper and hands in a warm clasp."

"But I will," he declared. "Wait and see!"

Not twenty hours later Bobby McGinnis halted at the great gate of the driveway at Five Oaks and gave a peculiar whistle. Almost instantly Margaret flew across the lawn to meet him.

"Oh, it's jest a little matter of business," greeted Bobby, with careless ease. "I've got that 'ere document here all signed. I reckoned the doctor wouldn't lose no time makin' sure ter do his part."

"Bobby, not the contract—so soon!" exclaimed Margaret.

"Sure! Why not? I told him ter please sign at once an' return. An' he did, 'course. I reckoned he meant business in this little matter, an' he reckoned I did, too. There wa'n't nothin' for him ter do but sign, 'course."

Margaret drew her brows together in a thoughtful frown.

"But he might have—refused," she suggested.

Bobby gave her a scornful glance.

"Refused—an' lost the chance of marryin' at all? Not much!" he asserted with emphasis.

"Well, anyhow, I'm glad he didn't," sighed Margaret, as she clutched the precious paper close to her heart. "I should 'a' hated to have refused outright to let him marry her when mother—Bobby, mother actually seems to want to have him!"

CHAPTER VI

MARGARET had been at home four weeks when the invitation for Patty, Arabella, Clarabella, and three of the Whalens to visit her, finally left her mother's hands. There had not been a day of all those four weeks that Margaret had not talked of the coming visit. At first, to be sure, she had not called it a visit; she had referred to it as the time "when Patty and the Whalens come here to live." Gradually, however, her mother had persuaded her to let them "try it and see how they like it"; and to this compromise Margaret finally gave a somewhat reluctant consent.

Mrs. Kendall herself was distinctly uneasy over the whole affair; and on one pretext and another had put off sending for the proposed guests until Margaret's importunities left her no choice in the matter. Not but that she was grateful to the two families that had been so good to Margaret in her hour of need, but she would have preferred to show that gratitude in some way not quite so intimate as taking them into her house and home for an indefinite period. Margaret, however, was still intent on "divvying up," and Mrs. Kendall could not look into her daughter's clear blue eyes, and explain why Patty, Arabella, Clarabella and the Whalens might not be the most desirable guests in the world.

It had been Margaret's intention to invite all of the Whalen family. She had hesitated a little, it is true, over Mike Whalen, the father.

"You see he drinks, and when he ain't asleep he's cross, mostly," she explained to her mother; "but we can't leave just him behind, so we'll have to ask him, 'course. Besides, if he's going to live here, why, he might as well come right now at the first."

"No; certainly we couldn't leave Mr. Whalen behind alone," Mrs. Kendall had returned with dry lips. "So suppose we don't take any of the Whalens this time—just devote ourselves to Patty and the twins."

To this, however, Margaret refused to give her consent. What! not take any of the Whalens—the Whalens who had been so good as to give them one whole corner of their kitchen, rent free? Certainly not! She agreed, however, after considerable discussion, to take only Tom, Mary and Peter of the Whalen family, leaving the rest of the children and Mrs. Whalen to keep old Mike Whalen company.

"For, after all," as she said to her mother, "if Tom and Mary and Peter like it here, the rest will. They always like what Tom does—he makes 'em."

It is the night when ALL the little ones are given what the French call "The Grand Bath"—a thorough cleansing from top to toe.

In this weekly function, Ivory Soap plays an important part. A white soap, it yields a snow-white lather—a lather that cleanses but does not harm.

Ivory Soap has another advantage over most bath soaps—it floats. If you happen to drop a cake of Ivory in the bath-tub, up, up it comes to the surface of the water.

There is no "free" (uncombined) alkali in Ivory Soap. That is why it will not injure the finest fabric or the most delicate skin.

Choosing a Life-Work*

NO incident in the life of Solomon better proved his title to the appellation of "the wise king" than when as a youthful ruler he humbled himself before the Lord "as a little child who knew not how to go out or to come in" and prayed for "an understanding heart."

Youth is a grand and solemn time. Poets have sung of it as the golden heyday of our lives, which we never recognize fully nor appreciate until it has passed away. It is the time of beginnings, of noble and uplifting impulses or the reverse. The youth stands at the crossways that lead to honor or to shame. He is drawn hither and thither by counter-currents, and his inclinations to good or evil are stirred within him as he endeavors to choose his life-work.

Unhappily, there are many who miss their vocation, and to whom life becomes a disappointment. It may be through unfortunate early environment or lack of home training; through persistent neglect of studies at school, or through evil companionships that have resulted in the early formation of bad habits; but whatever the cause, the result is a serious and frequently a lasting handicap in the race.

All must learn to work, either with the hands or the head or both together, to attain even moderate success in life. The youth who foolishly imagines that the world is to be to him a mere playground, and that work is an evil, is sincerely to be pitied. His awakening comes when he finds himself rejected through lack of training when others, who have stuck diligently to their tasks, are steadily forging ahead to places of trust and emolument. The one who, through carelessness or neglect, has made a bad beginning, drifts from place to place, a man without a vocation, and with all the brightest hopes and aspirations of life unrealized.

An ancient Oriental legend tells of an enchanted hill, at whose summit was concealed an object of inestimable value, which was to be awarded as a prize to whoever would ascend the hill without looking behind him. If he did look backward, he would be instantly turned into a stone. Many a noble youth, tempted by the priceless treasure, undertook the ascent of the hill, and their fate was indicated by the numerous stones that lay along its sides. The groves adjoining the hill were filled with birds of sweetest song, whose ravishing strains and alluring plumage fascinated the climbers until, unable to resist the temptation, they turned and were at once transformed. To every young man or woman life is such an enchanted hill, with its bewildering temptations and siren voices, to yield to which is to fall by the way, with life in its highest and best sense un-lived, and the desired career unattained.

Fixed religious principles are of the utmost value to those starting out in life. Thousands of authenticated instances might be cited where men and women who have won enviable fame have ascribed their success to their early pious training, their prayers and their continued observance of the duties and privileges of religion. On one occasion, a census was taken of the leading business men of a New England city, and it was discovered that sixty-one per cent. of the whole were church members and men of known Christian character, twenty-seven per cent. were church-goers and twelve per cent. non-religious.

Finally, in choosing a vocation, let it be one which will draw out the best that is in you. Don't be afraid of hard work. Tolstoi, probably the greatest living author, is one of the most assiduous workers, and frequently rewrites his manuscripts many times before he is satisfied with his efforts. Edison, who began life humbly, says his genius is the outcome of hard work, and he often spends eighteen hours of the twenty-four in his laboratory. Not ease, but effort, not facility, but difficulty, makes men. And if you are ever disposed to doubt the outcome of your humble beginnings, remember that the most wonderful and blessed career this world has ever seen was begun in a Bethlehem stable.

Soul-Training*

THERE are three kinds of education—that of the hand, or industrial; of the mind, or intellectual, and of the soul, or spiritual. In the passage in Ephesians, Paul takes the third for his theme. His faith in the power of prayer was one of the most prominent features of his spiritual character. He had been praying for the Christians of Ephesus, that each of them should know "what is the hope of his calling and what the riches of the glory of his inheritance in the saints." He also pleaded that they might be led to know the exceeding greatness of God's power "to us-ward who believe according to the working of his mighty power." A prayer so comprehensive and all-embracing, if answered, would surely fill the hearts and minds of the Ephesians with spiritual enlightenment and knowledge.

When the will of God becomes clear to the heart, a great transformation follows in the life. A new perspective is attained; a new intellectual and moral development is begun. Our worldly idols—our wealth, fame, possessions and ambitions—sink into their proper place and assume their true value in contrast with the inestimably precious things that go to make up the spiritual life and character. As we get the touch of Jesus in our lives, we look no more through the lenses of worldly vision, but with eyes that are spiritually opened.

This call to the soul, this spiritual awakening, may come at a time when the world is smiling upon us, when our relations are pleasant and our coffers full to opulence; or it may come in the hour of sorrow and want, when the light seems to have almost died out and we have lost the power to enjoy the world. It may come to us through the door of some special gift or talent which He seeks us to consecrate to his service. Howsoever it comes, it is the call to a new life and the beginning of our real spiritual education. All that may have preceded it is merely preliminary. Henceforward, up to the full measure of our abilities, we feel that we are bound to serve the Master.

But the new awakening should receive a broad interpretation. Paul was tentmaker as well as apostle. We may be professionals or artisans, but whatever our calling, it is to be carried on in the Christian spirit. Every study, every trade, every pursuit in life can thus be consecrated. And while we are living Christ daily in our lives, no matter what our work may be, we may make progress in the highest spiritual education also.

To be co-laborers with God we must strive to attain to the dignity of skilled workmen, since his work calls for the highest ability. This is the thing that Bishop Warren meant when he said: "A fully developed man must have every faculty trained, every power developed; be open to every influence of beauty, sublimity, power, music and love. He must stand in the universe, fronting any point and power thereof, and be at home—a king over all. He must be such a finished product that God can look at him and say: 'Behold a man made in my image—very good.'"

The Undertow

WHEN I was but a little lad
With tangled locks of tow,
I went one day with boys to play,
Along with Brother Joe;
As we drew nigh the river high
With constant ebb and flow,
We chanced to meet upon the street
A man we used to know.

"Well, boys," said he, "Where are you bound?
Your gait is not so slow,
In travels round I've never found Boys whom you don't outgrow."
"We're going to swim," we answered him,
With cheeks that were aglow;
He said in turn, "This lesson learn—
Beware of the undertow."

That phrase to us was not quite clear,
Its scope we did not know;
We scented danger, though a stranger,
In that word undertow.
And though these words of warning
Were uttered years ago,
At the dawning of life's morning,
Their force still seems to grow.

Remember, boys, when prompted
To do what's mean and low,
Though sorely tempted, none's exempted
From the undertow.
We all possess—our lives confess—
Both dove and raven show;
If you would strive the dove to thrive,
Beware of the undertow.

The undercurrents of our lives
Are very sure to show
As life's frail bark sails river dark
And stormy winds do blow;
Then be not slack to keep them back,
Let not their influence grow,
Enter with vim the social swim,
But—beware of the undertow!

Called Higher

Miss Ida May Settle died recently at her home in Lewistown, Pa., where she was born twenty-five years ago. Her parents were of the Presbyterian faith, and their family religious paper, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Under such influences she very early in life imbibed broad views of the Christian religion, and at the age of ten years,

Miss Ida May Settle

on May 21, 1903, united with the church of her choice, the Presbyterian, at Lewistown. At once she became deeply interested in church work, and like her Master, she delighted in going about doing good. She was in the highest sense a doer of the Word. In her daily ministrations she came in touch with many lives and by her noble, transparently beautiful life, purity of thought and speech, impressed and influenced many others, who have risen up and called her blessed. As the president of the Young Ladies' Missionary Society of the Presbyterian Church, superintendent of the Junior Christian Endeavor Society and teacher in the Sunday School, she was faithful and constant, actuated by the loftiest motives, which were promoted by righteous example. Her pastor, the Rev. William Leroy Mudge, said of her, "A noble Christian life has passed from earth to heaven while it was yet in its glorious noontide of beauty and brightness." Her associates in missionary work said: "We shall miss her bright face, cheery word, and helping hand. Words fail to express our sorrow and our loss. Yet we know she has passed into that more abundant life. We lovingly cherish her memory and will try to honor it by following her example in as much as she followed her Lord and Master."

Mrs. Sarah C. Scott, of Van Nest Park, New York City, who lately passed from this life, was from early age a member of the Presbyterian Church and a woman of brave heart and sterling character.

Lightning Freezer

Home-made ice cream is good for little folks. When you make it yourself, you know that it is clean and pure and wholesome. When you buy ice cream, you never know what it contains, how it is made, or the possible danger lurking in it.

For quick, easy, economical ice cream making use the Lightning Freezer. A few minutes' preparation, a little gentle turning, a few minutes more for ripening, and the dessert is ready.

It is the famous Wheel-dasher and Automatic Twin Scrapers of the Lightning Freezer which make it possible to make any frozen dessert in the shortest time with the least trouble and expense. The durable pail, held together by electric-welded wire hoops that can't fall off, and the can with a drawn steel bottom insure long life to the Lightning Freezer.

Write for "Frozen Sweets," a book of colored photographs illustrating progressively how simple and easy the Lightning Freezer makes ice cream; also contains recipes for frozen desserts by Mrs. S. T. Rorer.

Insist on having the Lightning Freezer. Every dealer can supply it.

Free Sample of Amateite

It is so difficult to convince the average farmer that it is really possible to make a roofing which does not have to be painted or repainted, that the Barrett Manufacturing Company takes elaborate pains to supply every inquirer with a Free Sample of Amateite, in order to show what the famous mineral surface is like.

Its real mineral surface is firmly embedded into the top surface of the roofing and is, of course, practically indestructible by wind or weather, and can be exposed to the elements without fear of damage. Paint or coating is not needed for Amateite as the manufacturers do not manufacture anything in the way of paint for use upon it. An Amateite roof, once laid in position upon a house or barn, will stay there indefinitely without further care or attention of any kind. This is a vast improvement over the roofings which require a new coat of paint every two or three years; and if Amateite cost more than the other roofings it would still be worth the while for this reason alone. Amateite, however, does not, in fact, cost as much as other roofings, and farmers who are preparing to roof any of their buildings should investigate it.

The manufacturers are always ready to send a free sample on request. Address the Barrett Manufacturing Company, New York, Chicago, Philadelphia, Boston, St. Louis, Cleveland, Allegheny, Cincinnati, Kansas City, Minneapolis, New Orleans.

Thought of Mont-Lawn While Dying

A Beautiful Story of the Love of Two Children for the Poor Tenement Waifs

LESS than a year ago we lost two beautiful, tender-hearted little children, Alice and Dorothy. Ever since they could understand they were intensely interested in your Children's Home at Mont-Lawn. I had told them and read to them from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of the little children who are taken there each summer. All through the winter before, they had saved their money, asking their papa for the pennies for their cup, instead of getting them candy.

It was their most eager wish that last summer they would have their three dollars by the opening of the Home. Never a day passed that they did not ask me to tell them about the "little Mont-Lawn girls." But the number of pennies grew too slowly, so the little hands gladly earned ten pennies each week, wiping dishes every day. They were then only four and a half and five and a half years old.

But before the summer had come, and before their plan was complete, the oldest little one was stricken with that terrible disease, scarlet fever, and in less than a week the beautiful little spirit that was so eager to think of and do for others, had gone from us. In the very last hours of her life, when the little hands were too weak to hold them and it was pain to be lifted from the pillow, she was faithful to her promise and would be lifted and take her medicine for the "white pennies" (nickels and dimes) that her papa promised her. She was dying then, yet she could still think of the little Mont-Lawn children.

Six weeks later, the second little one was taken from us by the same dread fever, leaving us broken hearted and our home emptied of so much that was lovely and pure.

It is our purpose now, each year, to send each June and July (the months in which they left us), the amount they were so anxious to send last spring ($3), so that each month some little child may have the benefit of the ten days at the Home. And, as soon as we feel able, we will send, in the name of our little ones, each year $21 for the season's endowment.

Tired of Sin's Bondage

AN interesting story of a conversion is told in connection with a recent revival conducted by Evangelist Biederwolf in a certain Eastern city. In that place there was living a man who at one time had been one of the most prominent and respected physicians in the community, but who through drink had lost his practice and his money, had sunk to the level of a common saloon loafer, and was living in drunkenness and sin. One day during the Biederwolf meetings, a Christian man who knew of his life, meeting him on the street, handed him a ticket for a reserved seat in one of the evening services (the crowds being so large that such tickets were necessary). He put the ticket in his pocket, and that evening went off to a card game in a saloon. But something kept urging him to go to the revival, and at last he arose from the table, and started for the place of meeting. When he arrived, he found the street outside filled with people, vainly waiting for admission into the crowded building. The drunkard edged his way to the door, and taking his red ticket from his pocket, he pressed it flat against the plate glass, and when the ushers inside saw it they decided to make room for one more, and pulled him inside. As they did so, he thought to himself, "What if this were heaven, and I had had no ticket!" The whole thing put him in such a serious frame of mind that the appeal of the sermon went straight to his heart, and when the invitation was given he pressed forward with the others to kneel in penitence at the altar. When the evangelist knelt beside him and asked, "Will you surrender yourself completely to Christ to-night?" he replied with great earnestness, "Yes, I'm tired of sin, and I want to change my life." He found forgiveness and peace that night, and the next day he went out a sober man, to win back his old place in the community. It was hard, but he is to-day making a winning fight of it, and with a firm hold on God is living in a way that is rapidly gaining him the honor and respect of men. But he often says, "What if I had been too late that night!"

has no sorrow that Heaven can not cure." I could ask no higher privilege or honor for them than that they should follow the example of the one who has gone, as he followed Christ; and we could wish no sweeter solace in such an hour as this, than the consolations of the Holy Spirit our brother recommended to so many thousands of others in the seasons of sorrow:

Other refuge have I none,
Hangs my helpless soul on thee;
Leave, ah, leave me not alone,
Still support and comfort me.
All my trust on thee is stayed,
All my help from thee I bring;
Cover my defenseless head
With the shadow of thy wing.

To those members of the staff who worked with him so many years, let me say I know how sweet was your comradeship together and how deep your loss is now. You will continue the great work you have had together, with a new vigor and brighter hope, from your memories and associations with your brother who has stepped out of the ranks and has gone to his coronation. May the voice and teachings of this man and his unselfish life inspire all his friends, near and far, with a firmer faith in God's revealed will, an intenser love for Christ, a greater zeal in spreading his good news and a brighter hope of immortality, through Jesus Christ our Lord.

We will say to our brother, farewell!

It is fitting that he should sleep so sweetly amongst the flowers, which are the most exquisite materialization of God's love for us, and the symbols of our love for our dead and also of that blessed realm into which his spirit has gone, where flowers never fade and where summer never ends. In behalf of his family, his fellow toilers and the vast multitudes who will miss his ministry of enlightenment and love, I place three flowers on his coffin—a violet which speaks of modesty, a red rose which tells of love, and a white lily, the expression of purity, as symbols of his character and life and as memorials of our love. Farewell, my brother, farewell until we meet you in the morning.

Nearer and Dearer

NEARER and dearer than ever before,
And just because sorrow has knocked at my door;
Just because teardrops are dimming my sight,
I come to thee, Jesus, and look for the light.
Nearer and dearer! The dark and the storm
Make me cling all the closer, heart bleeding and torn;
There at thy side I'll find balm for my loss,
For thou knowest sorrow, O Christ, on the cross.

WORKS ALL DAY

And Studies at Night on Grape-Nuts Food.

Some of the world's great men have worked during the day and studied evenings to fit themselves for greater things. But it requires a good constitution generally to do this.

A Ga. man was able to keep it up with ease after he had learned the sustaining power of Grape-Nuts, although he had failed in health before he changed his food supply. He says:

"Three years ago I had a severe attack of stomach trouble which left me unable to eat anything but bread and water.
"The nervous strain at my office from 6 A.M. to 6 P.M. and improper food caused my health to fail rapidly. Cereals and so-called 'Foods' were tried without benefit until I saw Grape-Nuts mentioned in the paper.

"In hopeless desperation I tried this food and at once gained strength, flesh and appetite. I am now able to work all day at the office and study at night without the nervous exhaustion that was usual before I tried Grape-Nuts.

"It leaves me strengthened, refreshed, satisfied; nerves quieted and toned-up, brain-waste restored and intellect brightened. I would have been a living skeleton, or more likely a dead one by this time, if it had not been for Grape-Nuts." "There's a Reason."

What Shall We Do With the Tramp?

British use many of their aged men to take care of the flower beds in the public parks. If these men could be employed in this way we could have flowers about our municipal buildings, public schools, poor-houses, asylums, prisons, and soldiers' homes. We must train the children in the way they should go. The public school children should be taught to sing the little hymn:

Idle boys and girls are found
Standing on the devil's ground;
He will find them work to do,
He will pay their wages, too.

If we stop raising tramps we shall have none. Stop the cause and effects will cease. ELLEN SCHOFIELD.
Bloomfield, N. J.

Give Work—Not Alms

Let everybody and every manufacturing plant in this country give every tramp that comes in reach of them, or in reach of their place of business, some kind of employment, instead of giving them alms, or in case they do not give the tramp some work, inform him where he would likely get work until he could find a permanent job. In other words, make him earn what he gets and the problem is solved.

Troy, S. C.

C. J. BRITT.

Deport the Foreign-born Tramps

My opinion is that those who have been proven criminal, if foreign born, should be sent back where they came from. This country should never become the asylum for the criminal classes of other lands. If it does our republic will soon cease to be worthy of its great name.

Let us say a word concerning those against whom there is nothing but indolence, an indisposition to labor. This is bad enough, but not as bad as to be morally and spiritually depraved. Here is a work for the church, for the Y. M. C. A., and other numerous religious agencies. Let our most prominent evangelists bend their energies to do for this class of men what they have been doing for those in higher walks of life, and the tramp will become a useful, law-abiding citizen, I verily believe.

Let us turn and read Ex. 22: 21: "Thou shalt neither vex a stranger, nor oppress him, for ye [we] were strangers in the land of Egypt."

Grapeville, N. Y. S. U. EDWARDS.

Don't Shelter or Feed Them

Recognize no one as a tramp and you have no tramps. Turn them over to the township trustees or municipal authorities. If they are hungry, let them be fed from public charity; if away from home, let them be sent home. If they do not claim a home or place of residence, make them choose one, or be arrested as vagrants and dealt with accordingly.

INTERESTED READER.

Sunbury, O.

Use Them as Road-Makers

Bad roads all over the country require a remedy. My plan would be to combine the two and remedy both. Have good roads and banish tramps.

I would make it a crime for an able-bodied man to beg. The State should put tramps to work improving the roads, should board them and compel them to work until they find self-supporting labor. Those tramps who are not able for road work should be made to work at something else for their board until they find work for themselves.

Why Not Imitate New Zealand?

New Zealand has solved the tramp and unemployed problems. She is making rapid progress toward the solution of the "millionaire problem" which is more difficult than the others.

Dr. Taylor, editor of The Medical World, Philadelphia, has written a little book called Politics in New Zealand. It tells how the tramp problem was solved by the New Zealanders. The issues of Everybody's Magazine for November and December, 1907, also explain the matter. Why not imitate New Zealand?

How a Texas Town Treats Tramps

The following method of dealing with tramps has worked well in Georgetown, Texas: The King's Daughters have a fund given by the citizens to assist the needy. Transient individuals applying for help are referred to the Relief Committee of the King's Daughters. If in doubt as to the wisdom of rendering assistance when called upon, the King's Daughters refer the applicant to an Advisory Committee of five gentlemen composed of the judge and sheriff of the county, the mayor and marshal, and another citizen, who acts as chairman. This committee makes a careful investigation, and if the applicant is worthy, they so recommend to the King's Daughters; if an impostor or professional "dead-beat" he is put upon the streets or country roads, after proper legal process. This method has very nearly relieved our city of the professional tramp nuisance.

J. E. COOPER.

Put Them at Public Road Work

Employ them on our public roads to improve them. It would be a good investment. A man failing to find work in his neighborhood could easily find out through the telephone where they needed men.

M. P. JONES.

Huntsville, Mo.

State Farms or Factories

I believe the best method for caring for the tramp is for each State to establish a farm or factory and require every man proved to be a vagrant to work for the government, to be paid a reasonable amount and held until he could be placed with some individual who might desire help. The State would act as an employment bureau and after a while those that desired help would secure it through the medium of the State working system.

Fort Banks, Mass.

J. M. C.

Put All the Idle to Work

If people would make it a rule never to give a tramp anything until he has earned it sawing wood, or in some other way, most of them would quit that kind of a life as soon as possible. If the poor could be gotten out of the crowded cities and assisted to own a little home and garden, I think that very few of them would become tramps. Let every boy have a calf, chickens, apple tree—anything that will make him feel that there is something at home that needs him and will be a profit to him.

THE FIRST TASTE

Learned to Drink Coffee When a Baby

If parents realized the fact that coffee contains a drug—caffeine—which is especially harmful to children, they would doubtless hesitate before giving the babies coffee to drink.

"When I was a child in my mother's arm and first began to nibble things at the table, mother used to give me sips of coffee. A my parents used coffee exclusively at meal I never knew there was anything to drink but coffee and water.

"And so I contracted the coffee habit early. I remember when quite young the continual use of coffee so affected my parents that they tried roasting wheat and barley then ground it in the coffee-mill as a substitute for coffee.

"But it did not taste right and then went back to coffee again. That was long before Postum was ever heard of. I continued to use coffee until I was 27, and when I got into office work I began to have nervous spells. Especially after breakfast I was so nervous could scarcely attend to my correspondence. "At night, after having coffee for supper, could hardly sleep, and on rising in the morning would feel weak and nervous.

"A friend persuaded me to try Postum. My wife and I did not like it at first, but later when boiled good and strong, it was fine. Now we would not give up Postum for the best coffee we ever tasted.

"I can now get good sleep, am free from nervousness and headaches. I recommend Postum to all coffee drinkers."

Do You Hear Well?

The Stolz Electrophone—A New, Scientific and Practical Invention for Those Who Are Deaf or Partially Deaf—May Now Be Tested in Your Own Home

Deaf or partially deaf people may now make a month's trial of the Stolz Electrophone on payment of a small deposit. This is unusually important news for the deaf, for by this plan the final selection of the one completely satisfactory instrument may now be made easy and inexpensive for everyone.

This new invention, U. S. Patents Nos. 858, 986 and 853,438, renders unnecessary such clumsy, unsightly and frequently harmful devices as trumpets, horns, tubes, ear drums, fans, etc. It is a tiny electric telephone that fits on the ear, and which, the instant it is applied, magnifies the sound waves in such manner as to cause an astonishing increase in the clearness of all sounds. It overcomes the buzzing and roaring ear noises, and also so constantly and electrically exercises the vital parts of the ear that, usually, the natural unaided hearing itself is gradually restored.

A Business Man's Opinion
STOLZ ELECTROPHONE CO., Chicago.—I am pleased to say that the Electrophone is very satisfactory. Being small in size and great in hearing qualities makes it PREFERABLE TO ANY. THE HOLY SPIRIT GIVEN

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

How far the hundred and twenty disciples—who continued steadfastly in prayer in the upper room, where the eleven abode, with the women, and Mary the mother of Jesus, and his brethren, and who were all “continually in the temple praising and blessing God,” as well as in the upper room in prayer—how far they understood the purpose of God we know not. During the forty days since his resurrection the Lord had been appearing unto them, and speaking of the things concerning the kingdom of God” (Acts 1:3), but it would seem that his purpose for the Church was revealed to Paul (Gal. 1:11,12; Rom. 16:25,26; I Cor. 2:7; Eph. 3:1-11; Col. 1:26,27), and it was this for which the Jews at Jerusalem were so infuriated against him. They could not brook that in Christ Jesus there should be “neither Jew nor Gentile,” and that the Church of Christ should be the chosen instrument of blessing, not to the world as such, but to “every one that believeth.”

The hundred and twenty expectant worshippers had left all for Christ; they were the despised followers of One who had been executed with the utmost shame and indignity; the twelve, who were the leaders among them, had grievously failed in their loyalty to their Master; to a man they had forsaken him. And this low estate was the preparation for them to be filled with the indwelling God: “the promise of the Father,” and also of the Son, who, when he spoke of the coming Comforter, said, “He dwelleth with you, and shall be in you” (John 14:17). They were ashamed and broken hearts, but also very glad hearts which waited for the Holy Spirit. Something had oppressed the hundred and twenty to pull together that day—not some in the upper room and some in the temple. “And suddenly there came from heaven a sound as of a rushing mighty wind,” coming perpendicularly, and it filled—not them in the first place—but all the house where they were, not kneeling, but sitting. Then there appeared unto them tongues, distributing themselves (R. V., margin, comp. I Cor. 12:4-11) like as of fire (Shekinah glory?), and it sat upon each of them. “And they were all filled with the Holy Spirit and began to speak with other tongues” (Acts 2:1-4).

“And when this was noised abroad,” or, R. V., “this sound was heard,” “the multitude came together.” Jerusalem was very full of Jews, a large number of whom were colonists, whose commercial enterprises had taken them to other countries, the languages of which had naturally become their own. They were confounded; something had happened which was as wonderful as the sudden judgment with which the presumptuous Babel builders had been visited over two thousand years before. In all the ages since, differences of language had separated and hindered the intercourse of man with man. And now they hear “every man his own” language spoken fluently by illiterate men of strong Galilean accent!

The confusion of tongues at Babel interrupted intercourse which brought no glory to God, but was abominable in his sight. But now there was unity, one theme, whatever the language might be: it was “the wonderful works of God.” Could, then, those thus blest, those witnesses that for them, at least, and for that occasion, the curse had been removed—could they be sinners for following Jesus of Nazareth?

There were great searchings of heart, no doubt. They were all amazed, and all perplexed, but some, as on every public occasion of great solemnity, mocked at the whole thing. It is very awful, but it is true, that Satan is never at a fault to find some who are his willing slaves to mock the God who made them.

MISSION WORKERS IN CONVENTION

THE National Federation of Gospel Missions closed its Annual Convention in New York, Sunday, May 17. A four days' session was held from May 14 to May 17, in the chapel of the Christian and Missionary Alliance, Forty-fourth Street and Eighth Avenue, President C. H. Madison presiding. Mission workers were present from thirty States. A large amount of work was done in perfecting the organization. Reports from superintendents of missions were read. There were no profound theological problems to discuss and no questions of creed, but everything harmoniously combined to energize the workers to serve the Master more faithfully than ever in the saving of men and women. About twenty new missions joined the Federation.

Rev. C. H. Madison was unanimously re-elected president. Oliver C. Elliott, superintendent of the Boston Industrial Home, T. L. Fretz of the Philadelphia Rescue Home, L. Woodruff, of Binghamton, N. Y., and Francis K. Ward, Sunshine Mission, Cedar Rapids, Ia., were elected vice-presidents. Mrs. D. H. Wright, of Poughkeepsie, was elected secretary.

On Sunday morning, May 17, the mission workers were addressed by Hon. John G. Woolley, of Chicago, whose masterful words were an inspiration to all. At the four o'clock meeting in the afternoon, the superintendents gave their experiences in short talks to a large audience. In the evening at 7.30 Mr. Woolley made the closing address in the Bedford Street Methodist Church to a large audience.

Mr. Madison then led a testimony meeting, and short addresses were given. The close of the meeting was very touching. Many came forward and said they would be glad to wait all night to hear the singing and speaking. Many seekers for salvation were at the altar during the Sunday services.

Contributions to aid the work of the Federation may be forwarded to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and acknowledgment will be made in this paper. Christian workers wishing to join the Federation should address the president, Rev. C. H. Madison, Poughkeepsie, N. Y.

Our Tears

GOD uses tears to wash our eyes.
That we may see beyond the skies
The land where tears are wiped away,
So murmur not of tears to-day.

The clouds may cast a moment's gloom,
But showers make the deserts bloom;
And oft a pathway bleak and cold
Is found to lead to mines of gold.

The dewdrop from the daisy's eye
Mounts on a sunbeam to the sky;
Our tears mount up on beams of love
And turn to gems in heaven above.

Then if thy Lord apportion thee
Some tears, be patient; thou shalt see
In each a rainbow, telling thee
Of when and where no tears shall be.

A BOY'S HOLIDAYS

The ardent controversy which has been waging in England and America concerning the best way to dispose of school boys in the long summer vacation has prompted the Grand Trunk Railway System to issue a special publication giving suggestions and practical hints to parents, as to what to do with the public and preparatory school boy during the months of July and August. The vacation camp is one of the solutions and the publication entitled, “What shall a Boy do with his Vacation?” thoroughly covers the ground and solves the problem of the best way for a schoolboy to enjoy his holidays.

A copy may be obtained for the asking by applying to G. W. Vaux, 917 Merchants Loan and Trust Building, Chicago, Ill.

This Is a Personal Message to You

What I Am Planning to Do

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Family now numbers about 215,000 members. We would like to increase this membership to 300,000 and to do it at once, and we earnestly request you to help us.

To many, such an undertaking, right in the middle of Summer, would appear utterly impracticable; but we have the faith to believe that it can and will be accomplished.

One of the reasons I have for trying to raise the circulation to that figure is that in the coming fall THE CHRISTIAN HERALD completes the thirtieth year of its existence, and I would like to commence its fourth decade with 10,000 members for every year of its life, and then keep on increasing every following year at the same rate.

How You Will Benefit By It

Another reason is that the larger the circulation, the better the paper which we can produce for the price. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is a splendid paper as it is, but we can make it still better, and we want to do so. We have just installed new and expensive machinery, in order that we might enhance the general appearance of the paper, and within a few weeks notable improvements in this direction will develop; and when all the plans we have in view are finally carried out, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will be, in every sense of the term, the brightest and best family week- ly in the world. But in making these improvements we shall not change the character of the paper. It is our intention to raise the standard all around—paper, type, illustrations, contents, quantity and quality; yet it will be the same CHRISTIAN HERALD that has cheered, edified and comforted countless thousands, and which as heretofore will continue the ministrations that have made it a household word the world over and a blessing to millions at home and abroad.

Let Us Go Forward

Then, again, I want THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to attain a loftier place among papers of gigantic circulation. I have always contended and still contend that in a Christian community a monopoly of large circulations should not be accorded to the secular press, and I see no valid reason why a clean, beautifully illustrated, ably edited and superbly printed weekly like THE CHRISTIAN HERALD should not rank with secular publications in maintaining an exceptionally large circulation. 300,000 would place us very high in the scale and greatly contribute to a larger measure of usefulness.

We realize that in order to make this effort entirely successful we must, as heretofore on similar occasions, be willing to make such a financial sacrifice as would make a subscription proposition very attractive even to those who do not now take, or perhaps do not even know, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

A Great Financial Sacrifice

Our regular subscription rate for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is $1.50 for a year. That would make an eight months' subscription $1. Now, in order to introduce THE CHRISTIAN HERALD into tens of thousands of new homes between this and July 1st, we have determined to make a reduction of one-half on every eight months' subscription sent us, provided, of course, that the subscription sent in under this offer at 50 cents for eight months is a new subscription and is not intended to take the place of any subscription now on our books. So eager are we to build up THE CHRISTIAN HERALD circulation to 300,000 that we would make even a larger sacrifice, but we simply cannot afford to do so. It goes without saying that this figure is far below the manufacturing expense and that it entails a very large financial sacrifice on our part.

A Reward For Every Subscription

While thus making it very attractive for new subscribers to join the great CHRISTIAN HER-

UPBUILDING THE GREAT NORTHWEST

THE great Northwest is developing a stock of men superior to that found in any other part of this country or England or the British colonies." So spoke James J. Hill, one of the pioneers of our vast inland empire of Montana, Idaho, Washington, and Oregon. "So fertile are the arable regions of these Northwestern States," he added, "that they can support a population of at least fifty millions. The day will come when the State of Washington will be more thickly settled than Pennsylvania."

These States in many ways possess more wonderful possibilities of development than any other group of States in our country. In Spokane, Seattle, Tacoma and Portland, I saw exhibits in which were revealed the marvelous resources with which this region is endowed, showing how the desert places are being reclaimed through irrigation; saw photographs of mountains that no longer exist because the railroads dumped them into the valleys; saw maps of vast stretches of country dotted with towns where only fifteen years ago there was not a single human habitation. I spent forty days looking at the Northwest and listening to the extraordinary stories of the people who are upbuilding that mighty empire.

So fertile is the land in many of the arable parts of this region that farmers have sold a single wheat crop for as much as $35,000—from that down to $5,000—for the large farms. I saw photographs of checks that had been given to farmers for single wheat crops for $35,000 and for $24,000 and for lesser amounts. It is such things as these that the Northwesterner is most proud of. The Progressive League caused copies of the photographs of those checks to be published broadcast for the information of prospective settlers, feeling that they were substantial proof of the wonderful fertility of Mother Earth in the Northwest.

At Zillah, Wash., lives a retired clergyman—the Rev. F. Walden. He is one of the upbuilders of the Northwest in the most practical sense. He came to Zillah a little over ten years ago, bought a few acres of land for a song and planted apple trees. He was in search of health and wished to do something practical while saving his own life, so he chose the outdoor work of fostering the growth of a big apple orchard. After seven years of delightful, health-restoring life in his orchard, he thought he could sell out for a good profit. He asked $10,000 for his place. But that season not a buyer appeared. The fruit on his trees that season yielded the sum of $12,500. It is needless to add that the Rev. Mr. Walden at once withdrew his orchard from the market. He has since made from $12,000 to $20,000 a year from his trees. The surprising thing is that it now requires only two months of his time to harvest and market his apples, thus permitting him to spend the remaining ten months in Seattle, in close touch with the people among whom he is doing Christian work. What he most values in his experience in the Northwest is the fact that there he not only found health, but learned the joy of living close to the soil and getting a living from that soil.

One acre of ground in the Northwest yields a good living—as is shown by any number of individual experiences. For example, at Clarkston, Wash., I heard of a man who, with his wife and family, owns just one acre of irrigated ground. On that acre is a comfortable house, a flower garden, a poultry yard, a fruit orchard, and a garden growing twenty different varieties of vegetables. They call it their "ranch." People of Clarkston told me that that "ranchman's" children are taught to say in their nightly prayer, this: "We thank thee for this acre which thou hast given us."

Following the tracks laid by the Great Northern Railroad through Montana, Idaho, and Washington, came settlers—the sturdiest men from our own Northern States and from northern Europe—who quickly founded hamlets, villages, towns, and cities. These settlers not only tilled the soil and developed the mines; they also built mills and factories. They were, in short, both missionaries and civilizers in this wilderness which Lewis and Clark had penetrated long before, and which remained virgin wilderness still until James J. Hill, forging through the country on foot, on horseback and by dog sled, blazed the way for the railroad.

No sooner was a depot built at any spot in the wilderness than the settlers who flocked there raised a churchspire skyward and at the same time put up a schoolhouse. On millions of acres wild before, big crops were now harvested. Wherever the shriek of the locomotive whistle was heard, there was progress in its most practical aspects.

After the railroad was completed, Mr. Hill traveled back and forth, talking to the settlers, teaching them to make the most of their opportunities. He distributed among them five thousand head of blooded stock at his own expense. He built churches and schools for them. He introduced steam and electricity on the farms and induced the farmers to connect their farms by telephone. He persuaded them to get together in societies for their common welfare in culture and self-help while helping one another. He taught them how to live the life of farmers in the Northwest without the social isolation and loneliness of farm life in the East. How to live in communities, while still tilling the soil on their farms stretching for miles around.

Agents were sent to Norway, Sweden, Denmark, and Finland to induce immigrants to come to the Northwest. Those immigrants from the hardy Northland proved themselves excellent settlers. They were given land, helped to build homes, taught self respect. At least fifty churches and at least one hundred schools along the line of his railroad have received donations from the same source.

All the people in the various communities in the Northwest work together for the growth of the whole. Nowhere else in this land is there such admirable public spirit. It is a kind of public spirit that makes the Northwesterner entitled to be called a new kind of citizen, the most desirable kind. It is not the public spirit of the mere "land-boomer"; it is genuinely the spirit of mutual helpfulness. Everybody helps everybody else in the Northwest. This spirit is one of the greatest assets of the Northwestern States. By its exercise the people out there have become broader than those in other sections—better neighbors, better citizens, better associates—because their development is more normal, less selfish, more soulful and less strictly commercial than in communities where competition makes life a harder struggle.

In every town in the Northwest, without exception, there is a church and a schoolhouse, as I have intimated, both standing on the highest available points, and in every third or fourth town is either a Carnegie Library or a local library of some sort. Yet the brawny sons and daughters of the soil seldom go into the towns to stay there and work. They do not flock to the town to become clerks and stenographers and typewriters. They attend the nearest college, and when graduated, they go back to the farm to till the soil—which they find far more profitable as well as more healthful than the work of keeping books or of clicking a writing machine.

Meantime, what the Northwest needs is men—more men, more people, families, workers. Everywhere I went I heard the call for men—saw endless advertisements asking for men—encountered no end of signs inviting men to work. The people of the Northwest do not fear competition; they invite new men to come out there in the belief that every new comer of a good class adds to the total wealth and benefits the whole region. To get these men the railroads make specially low colonist rates, and highest wages are offered by a hundred different employment agencies, steady work being assured.

There is room and plenty of work out there for all the unemployed now in New York. Men are wanted there not only to work for others but to work for themselves; to "take up" the innumerable forty and fifty-acre farms into which the great tracts owned by the early pioneers have been cut up. Men are needed to raise vegetables and fruit and poultry and dairy produce, to feed the great mining and manufacturing communities. Most of the land still undeveloped merely awaits the hands that will run the irrigation ditch and plow the sod.

One day last fall I saw two thousand immigrants streets and united in tidying up the thoroughfares. Rich and poor joined in this remarkable voluntary service of cleaning yards and streets for the general benefit. All day long I saw people, well-to-do people, scouring their house fronts; and at night, when all the refuse had been gathered in thousands of piles, it was consumed in many bonfires.

Spokane was founded by a horse thief; yet to-day no city is freer from gambling and every form of vice. Ten years ago it was only a frontier town.

To-day it is a metropolis with the handsomest churches, the finest hotels, the best schools in the West. Representatives of Spokane said to me: "We believe that the foundation of all progress in a city is knowledge. So we spend our fortunes on schools. Ours is a city neither of wealth nor of poverty. It is a city of homes. We believe pauperism to be a disgrace and regard it as a necessary evil in a large community. We have no paupers here. Everybody works. Our motto is: 'Thrift is next to godliness.'"

Seattle, too, built up in three times seven hills, is a city of which the East might well take lessons in government and in civic pride. "We know that the tide of immigration is moving our way," they told me, "and we are ready. We have enough hotels to accommodate half a hundred Y. M. C. A. conventions at once, and enough churches to accommodate twice our present population."

Tacoma, likewise an amazing city, is a city of homes, "the bedroom of Seattle," it has been called. It has doubled its population in five years. Portland, the fourth great city of the Northwest, is the oldest and most conservative. Its people represent the culture and refinement of the Northwest; their homes are the most beautiful to be found northward of St. Paul.

They are a people of wealth without any of the ostentation of wealth to be seen in older States. People in Portland never gamble; they never display an emblem of chance. In Seattle you will see men wearing Klondike nuggets as watch charms; but in Portland men ignore all such symbols of mere luck. Portland people never speculate; what they get they get by earning.

And this wholesome, manly spirit is the spirit of the majority of those who are to-day engaged in upbuilding the rich and great Northwest inland empire.

Settlers and Stock Moving from Indiana to the Northwest of many nationalities leave on special trains of the Great Northern and the Northern Pacific, from Chicago. But, spread over that vast territory, two thousand were only a handful; the Northwest could absorb 200,000 men now.

A word about the wondrous cities. The industrial capital of the great inland empire is Spokane. This is probably the cleanest city in the Union. While I was there, the citizens had what was called "Cleaning Up Day." Men, women and children came into the

THE DEATH OF A RANEE

DR. ALICE CONDUCT, American medical missionary in India, sends this touching story of the death of a native princess of India:

"All winter the days have been too short to accomplish all that we wanted to do with the X-ray machine which was given to my work by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers. Crowds have pressed upon us, till we realized as never before what it means to fulfil our Saviour's command, 'Heal the sick,' but suddenly a call came from Central India, 'Come; bring static;

save life of a Ranee.' This meant that a princess lay dangerously ill, and when it was told the prince that a wonderful static electric machine that does wonders was in North India, he sent at once in the hope of bringing life again to the dying princess.

"We left the crowds of needy patients in Ludhiana, to come to the rescue of the princess. But the summons had reached us too late. Although we gave some relief, the life powers were at such low ebb that the beautiful princess continued steadily to sink. In the midst of a crowd of her devoted subjects, she was taken at midnight to the banks of the "sacred" Ganges River, that flowed on its dark way a mile distant. Here in the open midnight air the dying princess breathed her last. The distracted prince carried his loved one in his arms, out into that river of death, till the waters nearly covered them both. They believed that if only the dying one is covered by those waters, the soul, as it leaves the poor body, will be sure to go to heaven!

"It was the most awful realization of what Hinduism really is! The hurried midnight call to leave the luxurious surroundings, to go out into the darkness; the wailing of the friends; the weird priests in flowing disheveled hair, their spectral figures in bare feet and thin garments that waved in the chill night wind as they chanted in low, solemn measures—all made a scene never to be forgotten. Had the loved princess rallied, she must never again return to her family and home, but become one of the temple-dwellers. But death marked her for his own. She passed away in heathen darkness."

METHODISTS MEET IN BALTIMORE

THE GREAT QUADRENNIAL CONFERENCE OF 1908 DESCRIBED BY AN EYE-WITNESS

Bishop Edwin H. Hughes

Bishop Wilson S. Lewis

Bishop J. L. Nuelsen

Bishop W. F. Anderson

ONE hundred years ago, in 1808, when the first delegated Conference of the Methodist Church assembled in Baltimore, there were about sixty delegates present out of a total of eighty preachers, representing thirteen States of the Union. In the present Conference at the Lyric Hill there are assembled, and voting for eight bishops, seven hundred and eighty-seven delegates from all over the world.

In 1808 matters relating solely to the United States of America were discussed. The keynote of the present Conference is "The World for Christ," and the proceedings concern themselves with missionary operations in almost every quarter of the globe. Bishops from China, Japan, India, Africa, the Philippines, and Europe reported their work, and measures looking to its larger and fuller extension were considered by large committees.

The voting for bishops presented great psychological features, not merely of combinations for the different candidates, but of the changes of mind consequent upon the circulation of different reports as to their fitness for the post. Men who were much talked of before Conference were now scarcely considered, the largest figures having dwindled down. Objections which, to an outsider, might appear trivial, weighed much in causing the collapse of several episcopal booms. While friends of these candidates personally deplore the results, they cannot but recognize the spirit which insists upon the realization of a very high ideal for the episcopal office, and the arrest in the figures of those who were reaching the goal, shows the disposition to elect pastors rather than officials.

Burning questions of the Methodist Church, which were discussed in the large committees, included the repeal of the famous Clause 248 of the Discipline, which is an Index Expurgatorius of worldly amusements. Every one admits it should never have been inserted in the Discipline, yet they fear to repeal it, lest such repeal should be misconstrued into the church's sanction of theatrical performances, dances and other things on which the Methodists, from the beginning, have ever frowned. This would not be the case, as a repeal of the clause would simply change the prohibition from the form of rule to that of principle, and restore again the one prohibition of the wise John Wesley, who describes as "not for the glory of God, the singing those songs, and taking those diversions, which can not be used in the name of the Lord Jesus." Whether the Conference will have the courage of its undoubted convictions is a matter for the future. The return to a time limit in the itinerancy is another burning subject.

Fraternal delegations from all the Methodist and affiliated churches, with Presbyterians and others, have made their addresses to show how the church of Christ is coming into essential unity. Years ago they would have met upon the platform merely for discussion. A few years earlier, they would have met at the inquisition or the stake for torture and for burning. Now, the Baxterian formula, "In things essential, unity; in things doubtful, liberty; in all things, charity," is the keynote of this, as of all other large ecclesiastical gatherings.

The Conference was received and addressed by President Roosevelt at Washington, and one evening listened to a masterly sermon, called a lecture, by Hon. William Jennings Bryan, his subject being "The Prince of Peace." This lecture was one of a series of four and was noteworthy for the amount of religious instruction it contained.

Eight bishops were elected by the Conference, viz.: Rev. W. F. Anderson, of New York; Rev. W. A. Quayle, of Chicago; Rev. C. W. Smith, of Pittsburgh; Rev. J. L. Nuelsen, of Berea, Ohio; Rev. Dr. Wilson S. Lewis, president of Morningside College, Sioux City, Iowa; Rev. Dr. Edwin H. Hughes, president of De Pauw University, Greencastle, Ind.; Rev. Robert McIntyre, of Los Angeles, Cal., and Rev. Frank M. Bristol, of Washington, D. C.

Bishop Anderson is skilful in administration. He has been a success in his own (New York) Conference, and is known in the church as Secretary of the Board of Education.

Bishop Nuelsen is a fine scholar, a native of Switzerland, and was elected primarily by the German delegates. He will probably administer the German Conferences in this country and Europe. His election is a great step in the direction of bishops for different races.

Bishop Quayle is a unique personality. His father and mother were natives of the Isle of Man, and he was born just after their arrival in this country. He was, at a very early age, the president of Baker University, Baldwin, Kan., where he was very popular. He became later pastor of Independence Avenue Church, Kansas City, in 1895, where he soon raised $37,000 of their debt. He went thence to Indianapolis; returned to Grand Avenue, Kansas City, and removed from there to St. James's Church, Chicago. He is poetical, a great rhetorician, is in constant demand as a lecturer, has a fine physique and constitution, is indefatigable in his labors. He is the author of many books and is intensely dramatic in his delivery.

Bishop Charles Wesley Smith, of Pittsburg, is sixty-eight years old, and was elected because he is a skilled ecclesiastical lawyer and is needed on the episcopal board. He was editor of the Pittsburg Christian Advocate; is lively, alert, and has more activity than many a younger man.

Bishop Edwin Hughes is the son of a Methodist preacher. He has been a successful pastor and has for some years been at the head of De Pauw University, Greencastle, Ind.

Bishop McIntyre has a world-wide reputation as a fine orator. He has no superiors and few equals as a word painter; his imagination soars into the empyrean, and he with the poet's eye sees things invisible to common men. He has risen from the ranks, won his first reputation in Illinois, increased it at Trinity Church, Denver, and later in Chicago, and it has reached its climax in Los Angeles, where crowds have always attended on his ministry.

Bishop Bristol has been for eleven years pastor of the Metropolitan Church, Washington. He was a great friend of President McKinley. He has attended six General Conferences and for twenty years has been a marked man for the episcopacy. He is greatly beloved in the Baltimore Conference and also in Chicago, where he was not only a preacher, but a great man of affairs. He was there the close friend of the poet Eugene Field, and has everywhere "won golden opinions from all sorts of people," which in his larger sphere he will increase and widen as the years go by.

THE FRIEND OF GOD

TEXT—James 2:23

"Abraham believed God, and it was imputed unto him for righteousness: and he was called the Friend of God"

THE Bible is chiefly biography. History is little more than biography. It was Carlyle who said, "History is the essence of innumerable biographies"; and Emerson, "There is properly no history, only biography"; and Landor, "Of all studies, the most delightful is biography." It may be safely added that none surpasses in interest, or practical instruction, that of the Bible.

When one looks into the gray dawn of history, the first bright gleam that lights the eastern horizon is that of Abraham, the Hebrew, which by contrast dims the light of Adam, Abel, Enoch, and Noah. Nor does he light his own surroundings only, but his ray falls forward, lighting the pathway for the Christian nations of the earth to tread. We begin the mighty roll of God's great heroes with one whose name to-day is written all over the land through which he wandered, and wherever he pitched his tent. Dr. Newman says, "Abraham was a hero in every sense of the word; not only a moral hero, but a martial hero." He is the leader in the first war mentioned in the Bible, and returns from it a conquering chief.

The Call of Abraham

Amidst the scenes and practices of idolatry, Abraham was born and brought to manhood in Ur of Chaldaea, in that portion of Mesopotamia which extends along the banks of the Tigris and Euphrates from Babylon to the Persian Gulf. From these early postdiluvian fertile plains, it pleased God to make choice of a family to fulfil the high office of preserving pure and undefiled the true knowledge and worship of himself. To this family should be committed pre-eminently the religious education of the world.

Abraham is chosen of God to be the "Father of the Faithful"; thus the choice of Abraham was simply the choice of God. To him first came the call which has ever since been whispered in the ears or thundered in the consciences of the multitudes, "Follow me." To him it came in these words, "Get thee out of thy country and from thy kindred and from thy father's house, unto a land that I will show unto thee." "So Abraham departed," leaving the quietness of Ur of Chaldaea, starting upon a journey to an unknown country, but not led by an unknown hand. As long as the bird lingers by the nest, it does not know the luxury of flight. As long as the trembling boy holds to the bank, or toes the bottom, he will not have the ecstasy of battling with the ocean wave. As long as men cling to the material they can not appreciate the reality of the promises of God. Abram could never become Abraham, "the Father of the Faithful," the mighty exemplar of faith, if he had always lived in Ur. No, he must quit his happy home, and journey forth into an untried land, that faith may rise up to all its glorious proportions in his soul. The Lord made him a very gracious promise, that he would make of him a very great nation, and that he should be a blessing to all the families of earth, and that he would protect him from those that would curse him.

The family that goes out from Mesopotamia is Abram, Terah his father, Lot his nephew, and their wives, and now would be doubtless called an Arab tribe. Six hundred miles to the northwest journeyed the little company to Haran, where Terah died. Abram now becomes leader and chief of the tribe. This is one of the great moments of history, when a single man with a childless wife sets out together upon a strange quest; but with the promise renewed, he resumes the interrupted journey for the country which had been selected for them, and, as we have been told, "passed through the land of Canaan" to that beautiful vale between Ebal and Gerizim, where Shechem was afterwards built. And here at least was erected the first altar to Almighty God of which there is any record since the days of Noah. Here was the first instance of his formal worship since the Flood, never again to be interrupted. The idolatry of Chaldaea threatened to engulf the world; the altar of Canaan is the earnest of its redemption. An altar to the only true God is established.

Abram does not attempt to secure lands, and although he might have possessed the garden spot of the fertile, productive plain, he only asked for enough for a burying ground for his family. He does not seek emulation. He might have become king of the land, for the people were awed by his presence, and received him kindly as a prince of God. He led a migratory life, seeking pasture for his numerous flocks and herds. Soon a famine comes upon the "land of promise." It is a very great calamity that has befallen Abram, who has no family or home to draw upon. Weighed with the responsibility of vast flocks and herds, the question of subsistence becomes a perplexing one.

An Asylum in Egypt

The storm does not denote the displeasure of the Divine One. Neither does sickness always denote punishment from the hand of the Father, but rather a reward for the past and a preparation for the future. Man's burdens are not beyond that which he can bear.

Egypt, the land of the pyramids, of the Sphinx, and of mighty dynasties, is notable as one of the world's granaries for the hungry, and an asylum for the oppressed. Jacob sought it for corn, Joseph found it while a slave, and the angel appeared to Joseph in a dream and told him to "arise, and take the young child and his mother, and flee into Egypt." But Abram seemed to rely upon his own judgment, seeking only temporal benefits, when he goes into the valley of the Nile, and the court of Pharaoh. Trouble does not come single-handed. Evidently awed by the magnificence and splendor of the court, his faith gives way, and he resorts to deception to save his life. He said to his wife, "When the Egyptians shall see thee, they shall say, This is his wife; and they will kill me, but they will save thee alive. Say thou art my sister, that it may be well with me for thy sake." There was a half grain of truth in the statement, but the intent was deception, and, as a result, a plague came upon Pharaoh and his house, because of Sarai and Abram. When the pagan monarch learned the cause for the great punishment, he rebuked Abram, and under an Egyptian guard escorted him to the frontier of the country, allowing him to take with him his flocks, herds, silver and gold, no small amount of which had been bestowed upon him because of his sister. How humiliating it must have been for a rich chieftain to be expelled from the kingdom because of the want of truth!

Journeying to Canaan

God does not honor him with an interview, or even speak to him through an angel or a dream, but causes him to be thrust out of the country. How often it requires a heavy blow before our consciences are awakened and our hearts humbled! The change from the luxuries and splendor of the Egyptian court to the wild country of Canaan must have been a very great one. But how much sweeter to Sarai was the simple pastoral life she led under the spreading oak, than the false and perilous one she lived in the gorgeous palace of the Egyptian monarch!

This is very marvelous! Judging as men, we might have thought that Abram would never recover from that sad mistake, that disastrous failure and sin. Surely he will reap as he has sown! He may never see his faithful wife again, but bear forever on his conscience the brand of cowardice, treachery! Or if she is given to him again, he will never extricate himself from the meshes into which he has thrown himself! Irritated and deceived, Pharaoh will surely find some method of avenging the wrong with which the foreigner has repaid his generous hospitality.

But no; contrary to all human anticipation, Jehovah appears on the behalf of his most unworthy servant. In after years, the Psalmist uses the very words which he uttered in the heart of the king, "Touch not mine anointed, and do my prophets no harm." What a marvel of tenderness! God does not cast us away for one sin. "He hath not dealt with us after our sins, nor rewarded us according to our iniquities; for as the heaven is high above the earth, so great is his mercy toward them that fear him." Notwithstanding repeated falls and shortcomings, he lovingly pursues his divine purpose with the soul in which the "root of matter" is found, until he sets it free from its clinging evils, and lifts it into the life of faith, and power, and familiar friendship with himself. "Rejoice not against me, O mine enemy; when I fall, I shall rise; when I sit in darkness, then the Lord shall be a light unto me."

When they have returned to the valleys around Bethel, which had been quite adequate for their needs when they first came to Canaan, they are now found to be altogether insufficient; their herds have so increased that the land will not support them, and there is always wrangling for the first use of the wells and the first crop of pasture between the herdsmen of Lot's cattle and the herdsmen of Abram's cattle. These troubles were complained of by the herdsmen to their respective masters.

Abram saw at once that this state of affairs must not continue. He asks Lot to come and stand with him on the heights of Bethel. There the "land of promise" is spread out before them like a map. Abram said to Lot, "Let there be no strife, I pray thee, between me and thee, and between thy herdsmen and my herdsmen; for we be brethren. Is not the whole land before thee? Separate thyself from me. If thou wilt take the left hand, then I will go to the right; or if thou depart to the right hand, then I will go to the left. And Lot lifted up his eyes and beheld all the plain of Jordan, that it was well watered everywhere." With characteristic selfishness he made choice of it, of course, and thereafter dwelt in the cities of the plain and pitched his tent toward Sodom. It is a great question in these modern times to know how much we are to yield to our brethren for the sake of peace.

Abram's Sacrifice

Abram remained in the land of Canaan, and the Lord said unto him, "Lift thine eyes, and look from the place where thou art northward, and southward, and eastward, and westward, for all the land which thou seest, to thee will I give it, and to thy seed forever. And I will make thy seed as the dust of the earth; so if any man can number the dust of the earth, then shall thy seed also be numbered. Arise, walk through the land in the length of it, and in the breadth of it; for I will give it unto thee."

We now come to a point in Abram's life when the light begins to brighten very perceptibly, fleeing the divine glory. He is eighty or ninety years old. It is night time and beneath the unclouded firmament, studded thickly with the stars, Abram stands looking eastward, while God is talking with him. That starry sky, always an object of much reverence to Eastern nations, the sky on which he has so often gazed in wonder and awe, has now a new meaning and interest to him; for a voice saying to the childless old man, "Like those stars for multitude, so shall thy seed be." Standing on the Judean hills alone with God and the night, he listened and believed, and it was counted unto him for righteousness. But the sublime scene is not yet ended. He was told to prepare a sacrifice—for an agreement was to be entered into between God and man—and to divide the bodies set apart for the august ceremony into two parts, and place them opposite rows, so as to leave space for the two contracting parties to pass between. Filled with mysterious wonder, Abram laid the bleeding fragments in their places, and waited the next step in the fearful drama. Attracted by the smell of flesh, birds of prey, always omens of evil, began to darken the heavens, and swoop with shadowy wings and hoarse cries down on the carcasses. Driving these away, Abram still waited; while the sun rolled down the western sky, and at last sank beneath the horizon.

Then suddenly the bright heavens were extinguished, the stars no longer shone above him and "horror of great darkness fell upon him." The sacrificial fragments disappeared, and all was gloom. The next moment a smoky furnace blazed up in the blackness, then a burning lamp, self-moving, passed slowly and majestically along the lane, "between the pieces," accompanied by a voice from heaven, ratifying the compact made between Jehovah and the man. From this august vision Abram must have awakened to a new life.

The child Ishmael was born, and grew up in the patriarch's house, the acknowledged heir of the camp, and yet showing symptoms of the wild nature spoken of by the angel. Not a little perplexed must Abram have been with those strange manifestations. And he goes to God and requires some sign from him "whereby," said he, "I may know that I shall inherit it"—that is, Canaan—"and that my seed shall be in number as the stars of heaven." They followed the completing of the everlasting covenant

THE LARGEST Y. W. C. A. BUILDING

One of the Pretty Parlors in the Boarding Hall

A Class at Work in the Scientific Kitchen

CLEVELAND, Ohio, now has the largest Young Women's Christian Association building in the United States, with the possible exception of the one in Philadelphia, which is about the same size. This new building in Cleveland is eight stories high, and was built at a cost of a half million dollars. Its equipment is superb and its activities already most notable.

A feature which has been emphasized in the new building is the boarding-home for young women, who either have no other home, or whose homes are in outlying towns. Some two hundred and thirty young ladies already call the new Y. W. C. A. building "home." Five floors are given up to individual rooms, parlors, dining room, library, and chapel. The dining room is on the top floor. It has windows on three sides, the north ones overlooking Lake Erie.

Scientific kitchens and a domestic chemistry room are of special interest. In the latter, a unique ventilating system with a hood at each desk serves to draw off all disagreeable odors. In the kitchens, the tables have tops of white Carrara glass and are arranged around the desk of the teacher. Along the back of each table runs a gas grill. There are gas ranges and an electric oven. The walls are kitchen is equipped with a refrigerator. The refrigerators are cooled by a plant in the basement which is equipped with an ice machine. In the basement also are shower and medical baths, including electric light baths, the needle baths, spray baths, Russian and Turkish steam baths. There are also massage and rest rooms. A graduate nurse gives free attention and advice. In another part of the building is the gymnasium with its modern equipment.

More than fifteen hundred young women have registered in the educational classes since the opening of the new building. Both afternoon and evening classes are conducted in dressmaking, costume designing, millinery, needlework, domestic science, bookkeeping, and stenography. Best of all, in every department of the new Cleveland Y. W. C. A. building there is already an atmosphere of love and care, and much attention is given to religious teaching.

The Cleveland Young Women's Christian Association has about three thousand members. Under its auspices, besides the work in its main building, are homes for the aged, a rest cottage, and a retreat for unfortunates. The holding of religious services in factories is another feature of the Association's work.

All the Lord appeared unto him and said, "Walk before me, and be thou perfect," and according to the frequent custom of the times, when covenants were made between individual men, Abram was given a new name, and God talked with him, saying, "As for me, behold, my covenant is with thee, and thou shalt be a father of many nations. Neither shall thy name be any more Abram, for father of many nations have I made thee. As for Sarai, thy wife, thou shalt not call her name Sarai, but Sarah, and I will establish my covenant between me and thee, and thy seed after thee in their generations, to an everlasting covenant, to be a God unto thee, and to thy seed after thee. This is my covenant between me and you and thy seed after thee; every man child of you shall be circumcised, and it shall be a token of the covenant betwixt me and you." And Abram took his son Ishmael and all that were born in his house and that were bought with his money, every male among the men of Abraham's house, and circumcised the flesh of their foreskin in the selfsame day, as God had said; and Abraham was ninety and nine years old when he was circumcised."

In the completing this compact according to the divine direction we see the last rite performed which completes the church. There are three distinct steps taken by every one who properly enters the church, viz.: to make a choice, to establish the act of worship, and the sealing of the covenant relation between the individual and God. We have seen how Abraham made the free choice of the faith and worship and service of the true God when he left his Chaldean home for the "land of promise"; then when he reached the plain he established the altar, and now he has sealed the covenant relation, established the complete relation, and the church of God is founded! Henceforth the Lord is to have a people upon the earth, and it is launched on its great mission of turning the world to God!

Abraham and Sarah are now well stricken in years, the noon of their pilgrimage is past and they are going down the western slope of life, and it seems that Sarah must go down to the grave childless. Abraham was sitting "in the tent door in the last of the day" when Jehovah once more appeared in a visible form to him. This time it was, as it seemed, three ordinary wayfarers whom the patriarch hastened to welcome to the rest and refreshment of his abode. But the heavenly guests were the Lord himself and two angels, who were two ministers of his love, and at the same time of his avenging justice. The object of their visit was twofold, the one bearing reference to Sarah, the other to Abraham. If Sarah was to become the mother of the promised seed, she also must learn to believe.

The second object of their visit was made known to Abraham. It was that Sodom's wickedness had waxed great in the ear of the Lord and that the city was to be destroyed. Now it was Jehovah himself who opened to the patriarch the second purpose of their coming. Their two reasons for telling him of the impending doom of the cities were first, because Abraham was the heir to the promise, and second, because he would command his children and his household after him, and they would keep the way of Jehovah, to do justice and judgment. From the latter words we gather that the doom of Sodom was communicated to Abraham that it might serve as a warning to the children of Israel.

But now the faith of Abraham was to be subjected to the severest test ever applied to man. The promised son, Isaac, has been borne by Sarah, and now is in the flower of his youth, at the age of twenty years, when "God did tempt Abraham, and said to him, Take now thy son, thy only son Isaac, whom thou lovest, and get thee into the land of Moriah, and offer him there for a burnt offering upon one of the mountains which I will tell thee of." Think of a father receiving such a command: "thy son, thine only son." His humble obedience shows his great faith. He makes ready for the journey. The days spent upon the journey must have been days of great anxiety, but with true courage he approaches the appointed mountain, and prepares the altar. Who could have withstood the pathetic appeal of the beloved son he is about to slay—"Behold the fire and the wood, but where is the lamb for the burnt offering?"

All that can be imagined is summed up in the single sentence: "And he took the fire in his hand, and a knife." A knife! As he grasped it, a pang keener than a glittering blade could inflict passed through his own heart. The victim is bound. Isaac, with his fair young face turned full on his father, and his eyes looking tenderly into his, even in that awful moment, waits the final stroke. The hand is drawn back, the blade quivers and gleams a moment on high, ere it descends into the throbbing bosom, when suddenly a voice breaks the awful silence: "Lay not thine hand upon the lad," and arrests the fatal stroke. The knife fell from the nervous hand, the mighty strain relaxed, and his whole being melted into love and filial reverence. Ah, did not tears rain from those tender eyes, as his trembling hand undid the cruel thongs, and one long embrace attested his joy at receiving his boy back from the very grave?

Great trials do not come single-handed and alone. Only a few years pass until the first death occurs in the immediate family of the old patriarch; it is the death of his beloved wife, Sarah. One of the most pathetic sights we ever see in this sad world, is the parting of those who have long been companions. Abraham and Sarah had lived together for more than eighty years. And during that time the noble woman whom he called from the first, "My Princess," had had no rival in the affections of her lord. Her kingdom was his heart. She was its queen.

We now come to the close of this eventful life. His character is well rounded out. He has a finished life. It has had a beautiful beginning, a remarkable development, and a serene maturity. When death begins to steal over him, Ishmael is sent for, although more than seventy years have passed since he was expelled from his father's home. There had continued a feud between him and Isaac, yet with all possible haste he makes the long journey over the plains to the tent of the old father. Isaac stands in the door and discerns far down the valley that Ishmael is coming. He hastens to tell the old patriarch that his long absent son has returned; then hurries out again to greet him on the border of the camp.

When Ishmael came into his presence, the old patriarch brightened up and called him, "My boy! My boy!" as he did eighty years ago in his childhood. And now the swarthy son of the desert and the gentle child of the plain stand beside the bed, and both gaze upon the face of their father as the light flickers toward extinction. At length the end comes. The long, long pilgrimage is over.

Whoever else may miss heaven, we know that Abraham is there. The rich man in hell saw him afar off, and Lazarus in his bosom, and Jesus Christ said, "I say unto you, that many shall come from the east and the west and sit down with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob in the kingdom of heaven." May we all reach that blissful shore, take our seats by his side, lean upon his bosom, and share his crown!

The March of Temperance

PROHIBITION has triumphed in North Carolina. After a most picturesque and exciting campaign the State went "dry" on May 26 by a majority of something like 30,000, according to conservative estimates made the day after election. There were some peculiar out-croppings among the results which showed clearly the effect of the tremendous fight waged by the combined liquor interests to keep down the majority. Some counties voted "wet" in the rural districts and "dry" in the cities. Raleigh Township went "wet," although last December, in a local option election, Raleigh had given Prohibition 600 majority. On the other hand Salisbury and Winton, both usually "wet" towns, went "dry." Greensboro and High Point, two large towns, gave large majorities for Prohibition, while Wilmington, the largest city in the State, went "wet."

This election ratifies the bill lately passed by the State Legislature forbidding the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors in North Carolina. The new law will become operative on January 1 next.

Coming so closely on the heels of the notable Prohibition victories in other States, the result in North Carolina must be regarded as more than simply a triumph of law and order. In the long struggle between the forces of sin and righteousness, there has been an educational movement at work which has gradually been enlightening the people as to the source of most of their heaviest burdens. It has taken years to open their eyes to the truth that an untrammelled saloon means poor schools, high taxes and full criminal calendars; but they have been opened at last, and opened pretty wide, too, if we may judge by the tone of some of the speeches in the closing days of the campaign. Here, for instance, is an indication from the oratory in Wilkes County, of what was said in other sections. An ex-Sheriff, now a County Commissioner, was the speaker and the occasion was a meeting in Union Township, a great distilling section. He said:

There are men around me here who years ago, along with me, helped in the liquor business in this place. You, and you, and you (pointing men out in the crowd) used to work along with me here for Mr. W., who is also sitting here, for a little rations and the balance in liquor on a Saturday night. You know how everybody was poor and uneducated around us—not a schoolhouse with a whole window pane in it. There was not a painted house from here to Wilkesboro, except the house of Mr. W. He made plenty of money, but all his neighbors got poorer and poorer, and raised their boys up to be whisky men, and everybody had their minds on this business. Mr. W. has had lots of trouble, and his money has given him no pleasure. In 1903 the Watts Law was passed.

At first it was hard to enforce, but somehow people soon saw they had to stop this business, so they began to turn their attention to something else. Then the Ward Law completed the job. Now we are painting our houses, fixing up our farms, beginning to take interest in our schools and brightening up. There are dozens of nice dwellings that have gone up, and this nice schoolhouse has been built and a library installed. Do you think this library would have ever been here if these distilleries hadn't closed down?

That was the kind of argument that carried the day in North Carolina. It was the oratory of simple, direct appeal for the protection of the home and the children, and of all that is held dear and sacred by men, from the degrading and brutalizing tyranny of the liquor interests. The State is to be congratulated, but the campaign should not be regarded as ended with the recent vote. Let it be kept up energetically along moral and educational lines until the whole State is so thoroughly enlightened that the inevitable attempt of the liquor interests to regain their lost prestige will meet with failure.

The next great battle-ground against intemperance will be New York. Both armies are now girding themselves and the war flags are flying.

The Return of the Prodigal

WHENEVER a prodigal son is spoken of, our minds revert instantly to the story told so graphically in the Bible of the wayward, headstrong youth who would try the pitfalls of the world for himself rather than avoid them through the advice and loving wishes of his father. But the prodigal whose transgressions and return have furnished the theme for innumerable sermons and inspiration for many famous pictures in centuries past is only a type of hundreds of young men of to-day. Restless, impatient of home ties and the guiding hands of father and mother, which seem to the unthinking youth like needless restraints, they go out into the world to taste its pleasures and dissatisfactions only to find them rotten at the core. How often do we hear the story of one who in after years longs again for those same restraining hands that saved him so often in his boyhood and which now would seem to him like a benediction!

It often happens that, ashamed of his failure in life, the prodigal never returns, and never writes, but plods along among the outcasts until his short day is done. It is a well-known fact that young men who have had a spirit of adventure rather than any desire to sin are more often the ones whose pride keeps them from going back, though home and mother, father and the rest of the family circle are ever present in their thoughts. Those who do return to the sheltering arms of home are almost always sure of the welcome accorded to the prodigal of the Scripture narrative and to thousands of other prodigals, waifs and strays ever since the world began. On the cover of this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is a picture that tells the story without words. There is the grieved yet rejoicing mother, the elder brother who has stayed by the home nest, and the son who has come home broken and bruised by his unsuccessful conflict with worldly forces that proved too strong for him. He has dropped on his knees and feels with gratitude the touch of the mother's hand on his weary head through which are rushing in a tumult thoughts of the life which he may now begin anew and regrets for youthful sins. It is a picture of which one with any experience has seen many a counterpart in actual life.

Women and the Ballot

THERE are indications that the present year will be a memorable one for the cause of woman's suffrage, in one country at least. Premier Asquith of England, recognizing the fact that the movement has made phenomenal progress despite opposition, and feeling that the Radical Party may be defeated unless the influence of the women is enlisted in its behalf, has decided, it is said, to make votes for women a prominent issue at the next general election. On the other hand, the Unionists may also bid for the support of the women. It would not surprise many to find both parties advocating a woman suffrage measure, granting the ballot to single women or to those who possess the requisite property qualifications in their own right.

Interest in the movement is not confined to England, however. Other countries are showing a keen interest in the seven days' meeting of the International Woman's Suffrage Alliance, which will meet at Amsterdam on June 15 next, with its American president, Mrs. Carrie Chapman Catt, of New York, presiding. Twenty-two countries send delegates to this convention, to break up what has been called "the masculine monopoly of the ballot box."

To those who have not closely followed the progress of the Woman's Suffrage movement, its present proportions may well seem astounding. There are five full-suffrage countries, if one can include the United States (because of its four enfranchised States of Wyoming, Utah, Colorado, and Idaho), the other countries being New Zealand, Australia, Finland, and Norway. Furthermore, we are told that "every square foot of England is alive on the subject," and that in Sweden forty-two societies were organized in a single year. In fact, every suffrage, except parliamentary, now flourishes not only in England and Sweden, but also in Scotland, Ireland and Wales; while the municipal vote obtains in Canada and Iceland, as well as the school suffrage.

In the municipal list the one State of Kansas is likewise enrolled, while lesser degrees of suffrage—for example, the tax-paying or school suffrage—are found in twenty-four other States in this country. In France women to-day vote for members of commercial tribunals and minor offices. The outlook from the standpoint of the suffragist must be highly gratifying, even to the most aspiring.

There is an unmistakable note of justice in the banner recently carried through the streets of Paris by the French suffragists: "Women must have votes for the taxes they pay and the laws they obey." But, laying aside all question as to herity or suitability to serve in public office, the another feature of the suffrage movement strikes home to every man in whose blood instinctive devotion to the time-honored idea of womanhood, and to every woman who prizes homage to her womanliness as a sacred birthright. Experience teaches us that every important in one direction of civilization means a corresponding loss somewhere else along the line of advance. The question is: Is the gain worth the price paid? The not improbable sacrifice of many dearly-loved feminine attributes that are often the greatest charm of the sex on the altar of "equality with men" touches us far more nearly. On every side we hear the wife and family of the public man complaining that his every moment is so taken up that it is hard to find time for home. In the case of the "public woman," will it prove different?

The statement of ex-Minister Luzzati, of Rome, that "the whole civilized world is now agitated by this question, which must be settled in favor of the women sooner or later," sounds like a prediction. But to every true woman, the suffrage question—or at least that side of it which pertains to service in public office—must resolve itself into a purely personal one; however keen her interest, or great her ability or desire to enter this field that has hitherto been regarded as man's exclusive realm, will the end, in her case, justify the means? Will the gain be worth the price paid? Will Home, in the first kingdom, suffer in the eager effort to see her country?

Birthdays are pleasant affairs in human experience, especially when they mark off twelve months of service for God and one's fellow men. The New York Observer, one of the pioneers in religious journalism in America, has just celebrated the passing of its eighty-fifth milestone with a large and attractive anniversary number which does credit both to its editors and publishers. The Observer has always stood firmly for the high ideals that inspire its founders, and has been a power for good, advocating civic as well as spiritual righteousness.

We extend our congratulations to the Observer and wish it many more successful years of Christian service.

Among the Workers

—CHINA HAS NOW 166 missionary hospitals and 241 dispensaries. —A FAMINE IN USOGA, a province of Uganda, Africa, has caused 40,000 deaths recently. The government is now feeding 50,000 natives.

—REV. N. L. ROCKEY, M. E. Mission, Gonda, India, writes: "There are hundreds of deaths occurring from lack of vitality through starvation that are reported as pneumonia, dysentery, etc."

—THE PRESBYTERIAN GENERAL ASSEMBLY has outlined plans for world-wide evangelistic campaign, to begin soon under the leadership of Rev. Wilbur J. Chapman. The expenses will be borne chiefly by laymen.

The Franco-British Exhibition

THE inauguration of the Franco-British Exhibition, which was opened by the Prince of Wales in May, was of the most impressive character. It included the singing of the National Anthem by Madame Albani and a chorus of a thousand voices, accompanied by three military bands; an Ode of Welcome written by the Duke of Argyll, with music by Sir Charles Villiers Stanford; a gathering of two thousand athletes in the Stadium, and in the evening a display of fireworks. It is the largest exposition that has ever been held in the British Isles. Situated at Shepherd's Bush, a western suburb of London, it covers 140 acres of ground and includes 125 principal buildings. One of the most interesting features is the great Stadium, in which the Olympic games will be held. It holds ten times of seats and is capable of seating 150,000 spectators. Among other features of the Irish Village is the cottage in which President McKinley's grandfather was born. The windows and doors and furniture seen in it have come from the original dwelling in Ireland.

The buildings have been sixteen months in process of construction. The cost of the edifices and laying out of the grounds was more than $10,000,000. Sir John Gockburn, Vice-Chairman of the Organizing Committee, in his paper read before the Society of Arts, gives this description of the great exposition:

There are palaces of applied art, of women's work, of decorative work, of music, and of the art; in the latter the French and British exhibits will occupy opposite sides of the building. There is an education hall and a hall of electricity. The machinery exhibits contain about 300,000 square feet of space and form three sides of a huge quadrangle, within which, together with other municipal edifices, will be situated the pavilion of the Ville de Paris, on which the municipality of Paris is expending a sum of $60,000. In a galaxy of enchanting scenes the Court of Honor will glitter like a queen jewel in a cluster of gems. Here is a spacious lake spanned by a bridge strong enough to bear the tramp of an army. It is with tracery airy and gossamer as a strand of coral. At the end of the lake a cascade leaps in musical cadence down a terraced fall. On the bridge, and at intervals jutting into the water from the sides of the lake, are stationed dainty pavilions in which visitors can sit and enjoy to the full the surrounding delights. The scene will be surpassingly brilliant by day, but at night, when 1,000 dazzling lights make dim the stars and are multiplied myriad-fold in the broken reflection of the waters, whose surface stirred by a procession of gaily-decorated craft, when by an ingenious arrangement of electric beams the hues of the rainbow are refracted through the cataract in a scheme of bright and ever-changing colors, the sight will be one to bewitch the beholder.

There have been many times in the history of these two nations when such an enterprise as this would have been an impossibility. The only exhibition they gave to the world was that of marching armies and clashing steel; such times as put Napoleon at the head of one army, and Wellington at the head of another. It is a glorious era when two of the five great powers can set such a splendid example as the one in the great enterprise just completed. It seems like a great waste to build a white city, with its hundred palaces and its artistic beauty, and then tear it all down again, but there is no waste where the people have been instructed in science, literature, art, and where two great nations can meet and join in recreations on such a great layground, and when they can have their hearts drawn together by such fraternity. This exhibition is not only the result of a great movement in the world toward international peace, but will itself be an important factor in bringing about that result, thus making it possible for each of these two governments to appropriate for itself the divine promise:

I will make of thee a great nation, and I will bless thee, and make thy name great. (Gen. 12: 2.)

An American Judge in China

Attention is directed by the Outlook to a successful experiment in judicial procedure in China. It appears that under our treaty with the Chinese government, Americans in that country might claim the right to have any dispute in which they become involved adjudicated by the American consul. The plan did not work satisfactorily, because the consuls had too much to do with their legitimate duties to give proper attention to difficult and complicated disputes. Some eighteen months ago a change was made, relieving the consuls of the duty and constituting one American court under a duly qualified judge. The court has now been in operation a year and has held sittings in Shanghai, Tientsin and two other Chinese cities. To the astonishment of the Chinese the American judge has been most active in meting out penalties to his own countrymen. One American who had defrauded a three minutes, and the cars over the railroads at a mile a minute, and men are impatient with this tardy method of communication and use the cable and telephone, and the communication is as swift as the flash of a thought. One of the most important departments of the training of the Young Men's Christian Association is the gymnasium, where strength of body, swiftness of motion and endurance of energy are promoted.

It is a religious duty to take care of the body, because, other things being equal, a man or a woman will advance in life or accomplish its great purpose best who has the largest measure of physical force back of the mental plans and moral principles. Let us then remember that in the words of sacred Scripture,

The glory of young men is their strength. (Prov. 20: 29.)

President Roosevelt to Methodists

The delegates to the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church went from Baltimore to Washington to a great meeting at the American University, where the President spoke and in the name of the nation welcomed them. Among other things, he said:

The whole country is under a debt of gratitude to the Methodist circuit riders, the Methodist pioneer preachers, whose movement westward kept pace with the movement of the frontier, who shared all the hardships in the life of the frontiersman while at the same time ministering to that frontiersman's spiritual needs and seeing that his pressing material cares and the hard and grinding poverty of his life did not wholly extinguish the divine fire within his soul. Such was your work in the past; and your work in the present is as great: for the need and opportunity for service widen as the field of national interest widens. It is your task to do the work of the Lord on the farm and in the mine, in the counting room and the factory, in the car shops and beside the blasting furnaces, just as it was the task of your spiritual forebears to wrestle for the souls of the men and women who dwelt on the stump-dotted clearings in the wilderness.

Prosperity such as ours, necessary though it be as the material basis of national greatness, inevitably tends to undue exaltation of the merely material side of the national character; and we must largely rely on the efforts of such men and women as those I am addressing to build up the spiritual life without which the material life amounts to nothing. As generation succeeds generation the problems change in their external shape; old needs vanish and new needs arrive; but it remains as true as ever that in the last analysis national greatness, national happiness, national success, depend upon the character of the individual man and individual woman. We admire a good man, but we admire a good woman more. We believe in her more. All honor is due the man who does his full duty in peace; who as a soldier does his full duty in war; but even more honor is due the mother, for the birth pangs make all men the debtors of all women. No human being has a greater title to respect than the mother who does her full duty, who bears and rears plenty of healthy children, so that there shall be national growth and not national decadence, so that in quality and quantity our people shall increase. Courage, unselfishness, common sense, devotion to high ideals, a proper care for the things of the spirit, and yet also for the things of the body; these are the qualities that make up the right type of family life.

No truth is greater and none more necessary to enforce at this present time than that of the necessity of moral integrity and religious principle to the prosperity of the nation. Nothing can be more true than the fact that American womanhood is largely responsible for the prosperity and happiness of our commonwealth. The mothers of Britain and Germany and America, like those of all great nations, are the measure of a people's greatness and goodness,

Favor is deceitful, and beauty is vain; but a woman that feareth the Lord, she shall be praised. (Prov. 31: 30, R. V.)

General View of the Franco-British Exposition Buildings

Chinaman was ordered to make restitution and was then put on trial for obtaining money by false pretenses. Gambling house keepers, swindlers, and immoral offenders have been fined a thousand dollars each and sixty of their adherents have left China. The Chinese citizens look on in wonder and wish that a similar system prevailed in their own courts.

The example of this honest judge will go far toward bringing our civilization and Christianity into favor with the Chinese. Therefore it will behoove American judges ever to bear in mind the sacred injunction:

Consider what ye do: for ye judge not for man, but for the Lord; and he is with you in the judgment. (II. Chron. 19: 6, R. V.)

Seven Hundred Messenger Boys

Next July a message is to be taken from the Mayor of New York to the Mayor of Chicago on foot. Seven hundred boys, furnished by the Young Men's Christian Associations on the line, are to be placed in relays of a mile apart, the chain from one to another beginning at the City Hall in New York and continuing by the directest route to Chicago. There is to be no competition in the running and no prizes awarded. This novel experiment is a return to the method of early history, when the mail carriers of the world were men on foot. Now the ships carry the mail-bags over the ocean at the rate of a mile in

THE MANIFOLD CHRIST

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts*

THE Shepherding Christ. "The Lord is my Shepherd," was the Golden Text, and the teacher in a class of little children was trying to teach it impressively. She said: "Each little child here must know that Jesus is his or her very own Shepherd. Can you not say the Golden Text in a way prised and delighted to hear one child after another say, "The Lord is my Shepherd for me." He sympathizes with Mary and Martha in the death of their brother, even to the shedding of tears. "Your sympathy has the Christ-like touch," wrote a lady to a friend who had written her a letter of condolence about the death of her husband, a man who had been particularly useful in Christian work. Could anything be more tender or more exquisitely beautiful than this response? Even a child may be such a comforter. A mother who was in the habit of asking her children before they retired for the night what they had done to make others happy, found her young twin daughters silent. She spoke tenderly of habits and dispositions founded on the Golden Rule, Do unto others as you would have them do unto you. Still these bright little faces were bowed in silence. The question was repeated. "I can not remember anything good all this day, dear mother," said one of the little girls, "only a little girl who sits with me on the bench at school lost a little brother, and I saw that while she studied her lesson she hid her face in the book and wept. I felt sorry and laid my face on the same book and wept with her. Then she looked up, and was comforted and put her arms around my neck; but I do not know why she said I had done her good."

Dr. Guthrie has said: "Thank God in life's dark hour for the assurance that 'in all his people's affliction, he is himself afflicted' (Isa. 63: 9). We may get a hint of how the heart of Christ is touched by our griefs if we will some day go into a room where there are two pianos. Let some one touch a note on one while you hold your ear close to the strings of the other, and you will hear a vibration of the note struck upon the other piano. So the heart of Christ vibrates to our hearts either in joy or in pain."

The Understanding Christ

He understood the loving deed of Mary when she anointed his feet with precious ointment, and he understood Judas when he spoke harsh words concerning the "waste" of what Mary had given. And why did Jesus so well understand the hearts of men and women alike? He was one with them in toil and burden bearing. It has been said that he was not only an obedient son to his mother, but also a willing helper to his foster father in the carpenter shop, and that "he who came to bring peace into the world, and to hallow the beginning and the end of human life, had to work in fashioning both the rockers of the cradle and planks of the coffin, and the peaceful instruments of husbandry and family life." It has also been said that "His soul was the workshop of the world."

That is not a bad title which the Christian World, of London, gives to one of its departments of news: "Our Chronicle of Good Works. By One Who Looks Out for Them." Those who look out for good works find them. There is good enough going on in the world to make the believer's heart glad and grateful.

The Teaching Christ

He taught the disciples by washing their feet that the way to go up in honor is first to go down in humility. "Whosoever would be first among you shall be your servant." On another occasion Jesus taught a similar lesson. He had been invited by one of the chief Pharisees to take supper with him. There were several guests beside himself, all Pharisees. Jesus noted how they chose out the most honorable places at the table. He taught them a lesson that day about high position not being the pedestal of greatness, by a parable about a great supper to which the poor, the maimed, the lame and the blind were invited.

The Inspiring Christ

How sad must have been the apostles when Jesus was making his farewell address to them in the upper room before going out to Gethsemane! But the darkness of desolation which they felt in their hearts Jesus caused to be illuminated by the promise that he would send a Comforter to them, even the Holy Spirit. Jesus told them just how they should be instructed and guided and helped by the Spirit, and so inspired them with hope and courage. The Holy Spirit is the greatest of all helps to memorizing Scripture, because it brings the soul into sympathy with the subject—and sympathy is the very root of memory. Attention is commonly said to be its root, but back of real attention there must be sympathy and interest, and these the Holy Spirit gives. We get a hint of what the Holy Spirit can do to reward good men through quickened memories as we read the pleasing reviews of life that Samuel and Job and Paul uttered in the presence of peril and death.

The Praying Christ

Jesus took his apostles into the Garden of Gethsemane, and told them to watch and pray. But instead they fell asleep. Did he upbraid them? No; he lovingly tried to excuse them by saying, "The spirit indeed is willing, but the flesh is weak." Three times he went away by himself, farther in under the dense shade of the old olive trees, and prayed, bearing the agony of our sins, until he sweat drops of blood. It was then an angel was sent to comfort him. And he was prepared to meet the murderous band that came under the leadership of Judas to find him and deliver him to those who sought his life. In the shadows of Gethsemane we get the full force of the Saviour's words on another occasion: "Men ought always to pray and not to faint," teaching us that it is our duty to pray.

Shall we say we have no gift in praying? Perhaps this might be so if we should attempt long prayers. Sentence prayers are not a new thing. Many such are found in the Bible. These are a few examples: "Lord, save us, we perish!" was the cry of the disciples when the waves were breaking over their small ship. "Lord, save me!" cried sinking Peter. "Lord, that our eyes may be opened," was the plea of the two blind men.

The Dying Christ

There was a great light round about when Jesus was born, though it was night; when he was dying there was great darkness, though it was noon. Psalm 22 has been appropriately named by Dr. J. A. Alexander, "The Cross and Its Victories," for almost every word spoken by Christ on the cross was a quotation from that Psalm. Dr. Alexander analyzed the Psalm as follows: "He was forsaken of God (vs. 1-5). He was called to face the contempt of men (vs. 6-8). He endured the hatred of the Jews, here likened to the bulls of Bashan (v. 12). He was assailed by the devil as a ravening and a roaring lion (v. 13). He was prostrated by bodily weakness (vs. 14, 15). The Gentiles, like dogs, compassed him, and pierced his hands and feet (v. 16). The soldiers parted his garments among them (vs. 17, 18). It was not possible that he should be holden under the power of death (vs. 19-21). Then comes the exaltation (v. 22). He thus becomes the object of Israel's hope (vs. 23, 24). But the crucified, risen and exalted Redeemer enlarges the source of his rejoicing, and tells of grace to the neglected Gentiles (vs. 25, 26). As the reward of that atoning sacrifice the Psalm looks on to millennial (vs. 27, 28). "A seed shall serve" (v. 30). Then the closing words substance mean the same as "finished" (vs. 30, 31).

His triumph was in destroying last enemy, death. And because lives we shall live also. This is Dr. T. L. Cuyler calls "human

Questions and Answers

Mr. K. Natchez, Miss. Where is the "secretary bird" found?

Africa. It is a bird of prey and belongs to the vulture family. It gets its name from the tuft of feathers at the back of its head that are supposed to resemble the pens that a clerk sticks behind his ear. It is protected in South Africa, as it is a destroyer of snakes and insects.

Dayton, O. What rule governs the use of "an" or "an" before a vowel or the aspirated "h" in "history" and "historical," etc?

There are differences of opinion on the subject. The English use "an" to a much larger extent in such cases than we do here. An American authority says: "'An' is properly used before the aspirated 'h' only when the accent is on the following syllable, as 'a history' but 'an historical.'" We consider, however, that euphony should govern to a large extent in such cases. It does not sound well to American ears to say "an historical," "an habitual trap," "an European" or "an unique idea." In such cases, the use of "an" is clearly not so euphonic as "a." As there is no fixed rule, the best writers govern themselves according to the euphony of the phrases or sentences, the articles or adjectives being interchangeable.

Danbury, Conn. What is the significance of the Hindu word "Om"?

It is explained by students of Oriental mysticism that "Om" is the past, the present, the future, and the self (soul). By meditation on "Om" the soul becomes identified with Brahma. The word or letter, they add, has four parts, viz.: A, U, M, and the three together. The first (A) represents the waking state of the soul; the second (U) the state of dreams; the third (M) deep sleep, and the fourth (all three together) represents Brahma absolute and infinite.

Newfoundland. What do you think of a religious organization going into a place of 100 people and two churches, and drawing people away from these churches to establish their own?

As you state it, it can hardly be expected to meet with general approval. Yet, if the people of the place are not church-goers to any great extent, and if the new organization attracts them, and induces them to attend services, it would be a most desirable thing. But to simply draw people away from one denomination to another is wrong.

W.S., Hollis, L. I. Where is the Serpent Mound, supposed to have been built by the Mound Builders?

It is in Adams County, Ohio. It is 100 feet high, thirty feet wide and one thousand feet long. It is built in the form of a serpent with a small mound in its open jaws. It has a triple coil at the tail, otherwise it is quite straight.

E. R., Kansas City, Mo. The conditions of salvation are unchanged: "He must be born again." The convert must be known by his newness of life, by avoiding even the appearance of sin, by forsaking vain amusements, by seeking out godly, helpful companions, his endeavors to bring others to the light, and by that general transformation of his own character and nature which can only be produced by the Holy Spirit. Confessing Christ before men is a preliminary. It is taking a stand and making a declaration of allegiance. Regeneration must follow to make the work of grace complete. Not every one who names the name of Jesus is a follower of his. This is the reason why thoughtful Christians who look beneath the surface of things hesitate to approve sensational evangelistic methods and astounding claims of numerous "conversions." We can estimate the number of those who confess Christ, but God himself, who alone knoweth the heart, must be the judge of the genuineness of the conversion.

Referring to a recent inquiry, S. P. C., Slate Hill, Pa., writes:

The first lodge of Odd Fellows in the United States was held on the 26th day of April, 1819, by Thomas Wilday of England. The lodge was on the corner of Gay and Front Streets, Baltimore, Md.

A. J. W., Oxford, Pa. Wherein lies the cruelty of wearing ornaments on hats and bonnets which are procured from birds? What kind of birds?

It is one of the barbarities of modern fashion. Hundreds of thousands of feathered songsters are deprived of their lives to furnish these ornaments for women's head-gear. Many kinds of birds are the victims, including the egret,

Massachusetts. 2. No; soldiers, in a few instances, have acquired citizenship in the States in which they were stationed and thus were entitled to vote, but as most of them retain citizenship in their native towns and are moved frequently from one post to another, they seldom have an opportunity to vote. The laws in the States vary as to who shall have the right of suffrage, and in a number of States soldiers and sailors are not permitted to vote even though they may be natives and residents of the States in question.

B. A. Z., Memphis, Tenn. What is the average growth of New York in population?

About 11,000 per month, or 130,000 to 140,000 a year.

Mrs. J. D., Annville, Pa. What are the "soft drinks" we hear so much about? Do they contain alcohol? I recently tasted one kind and it did not taste mild or soft to me.

Soft drinks, so-called, are soda

A. R. H., Saltsburg, Pa. How many of the signers of the Declaration of Independence were American born?

There were fifty-six signers of the Declaration, and of these only seven were foreign born. The others were of colonial stock. The great majority were of English descent, and all of the rest, with perhaps one exception, were descended from ancestors who came from the British Isles.

T. T. B., Portage la Prairie, Man. 1. A minister preaching a temperance sermon, while speaking about some one who had been writing in favor of the liquor traffic, said: "To the devil with such people." Is it proper or right to use such language in the pulpit? 2. Is it correct to say that Jesus Christ was a Socialist? 3. Do you think it wise in the present age, in a church where every one is supplied with hymn books, for the minister to occupy the time, both before and after the sermon, in reading out the hymns?

1. Either in or out of church such talk is reprehensible. In the pulpit it is doubly so, as the preacher should show the example of temperance in his language and charity in his judgment. 2. Certainly not in the modern sense in which Socialism is understood. 3. It seems superfluous and a waste of time.

G. E. J., Logan, Ia. How can a member prepare himself to take part in our Christian Endeavor meetings?

By reading the weekly articles on the lesson which appear in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and which discuss the topic with the express view of assisting those who expect to take it up in the meetings.

The New Hindu Temple in San Francisco

It will come somewhat as a surprise to the people of this Christian country to learn that a Hindu temple has just been dedicated in San Francisco by the members of the local Vedanta Society.

The interior of this building, the cornerstone of which was laid in 1905, is similar to that of an ordinary house of worship, and it is only by its exterior, with its domes, towers and minarets, that the stranger is given notice that the architecture of another people and clime has been transplanted into the midst of Western progress and civilization along with the teachings of the Vedas themselves. The dedicatory services were simple, consisting of music, a prayer and sermon. Callalilies and greens served as decorations. On the platform were two large pictures of noted expounders of the Vedanta faith, dressed in their native Hindu costume.

It is possible that one having been brought up in a Christian home and having had the love of Christ instilled in his heart from childhood, might not be able to fix the date of his conversion. On the other hand no one who is really a Christian can be in doubt about it.

I have been reading replies from your correspondents on how to raise church funds. The fact that this question is being discussed presupposes that there is trouble in raising them. It seems to me they all fail to diagnose the case on its real conditions.

1. Has the minister done his part in educating his people up to their duty of what they owe to God, that all belong to him, and that to withhold from him what is his due is robbing God? 2. Has he told his people that without consecration we cannot walk by faith, and that to fill his church with members that are not born of the Spirit is no kindness or help to them? Teach a full salvation, then consecration, and your problem will disappear.

J. W. C., Raritan, Ill., writing on the same subject, says:

Church funds should be raised by circulating a subscription paper in the hands of a committee appointed for that purpose, and if a collector is necessary, it is better for the same committee to do the collecting. To Christen Mont-Lawn's New Cottage

WHEN THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S Children's Home at Mont-Lawn was first opened, there was but the roomy "Homestead" and one or two small buildings to accommodate the little ones who for the first time were to breathe fresh air and romp upon the greensward of the spacious grounds. As the work grew, however, and more children came trooping to the Bible House to ask wistfully for a chance to spend a few days at the delightful spot whose fame had spread among the tenements, one cottage after another was added in order that these little waifs might not plead in vain. In a few short years quite a number of buildings were clustered along the broad pathway beyond the wide lawn which stretches from the roadway back toward the "Homestead." Then the beautiful chapel was built, to be followed a little later by the pavilion.

This spring, the carpenters and stone masons have again been busy, and the finest and most commodious cottage of all has been built about a hundred feet from the chapel. As all of the buildings at Mont-Lawn bear some appropriate name, a proper designation for the new cottage has been under discussion. From the large number suggested, the list of names which would be appropriate, either on account of the site or as bearing reference to the purpose for which the building was erected, has been at last reduced to sixteen.

The proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has thought that it would be an excellent idea to secure the preference of his readers as to which name on the list would be best suited for the new cottage. All who are interested in the beautiful work at Mont-Lawn for the children of the tenements are cordially invited to indicate their preference among the names given in the list below. Write the preferred name on a postal card together with your own name and address, and send it to the Children's Home Department, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York City.

The list of names suggested is as follows:

Sunbeam	Rainbow	Fidelity	Friendship
Riverside	St. Nicholas	Columbia	The Gem
Liberty	Goodwill	Washington	Woodbine
Mispah	Trinity	Maple	Apple Tree

A description of the new cottage, which will be a home in the best sense of the word for many little visitors during the sultry summer months, can not fail to be of interest to patrons and readers alike. The building is seventy-eight feet long and fifty-two feet deep, and one story high. It has two dormitories, each twenty-nine by thirty-seven feet. Each room has 1,200 square feet of space. In front of the main building are two teachers' rooms. These rooms are nine by fourteen and have openings into the dormitories, so that the teachers can oversee their charges without leaving their apartments. The dormitories are fourteen feet in height from floor roof, and the porch piers are also of stone. The native field stone of a grayish hue has been throughout for the mason work and the effect is most pleasing. The side wall spaces are covered with shingles of a gray tone, as are those of the roof and gables.

The cottage stands on quite a steep slope, making it necessary to have a considerable number of steps at the front, arranged in two flights, with wide landings at the bottom. The lower platform and the front porch are made of concrete. There is a large gable below this gable is a large bay-window which is much to the architectural effect, as well as to the space of the teachers' room. On this bay-window is a pediment in maroon on which in letters will appear the name of the cottage, when the station has finally been made. Below the bay, on the lower landing of the entrance steps, there will be placed a large box for the flowers, which the children so dearly love. This box will be supported by ornamental stone corbels. Above the coping of the walls and steps of the porches are of concrete, as are also the entrance steps of the porch to the east and facing toward "the Homestead."

The interior finish of the cottage is simple yet most harmonious in color. The walls are plastered in light blue. The floors are of hard pine and the ceilings of wood, with beaded boarding, finished in natural tone. The upper sash in all of the windows is diamond shaped and of glass cathedral glass, tinted a light amber color. The building faces south as do the other cottages.

Upon a broad walk which continues from the entrance driveway westward past the cottages and the chapel. Beyond this walk is a row of young trees and a broad lawn.

The cottage was planned by M. L. and H. Emery, the architects who designed the chapel, the lodge, the pavilion and several of the cottages; consequently the buildings form a harmonious whole as regards the general architectural scheme, to make Mont-Lawn one of the show places of the lower Hudson, and undoubtedly the finest Children's Home in America.

to ceiling, thus giving plenty of space for the circulation of air. Each room is lighted by eight large windows and has two outside doors and two large ventilators in the ceiling. At the front are two small porches, one at each end, from which entrance may be gained direct to the dormitories or to the teachers' rooms.

The cottage is treated in a most picturesque manner and resembles somewhat the English cottages of the Middle Ages, the most interesting period in cottage architecture. It is constructed of stone up to the floor level and all of its angles are reinforced with the same material. Stone piers run up to the

The event marks the one hundredth anniversary of the first temperance society in America—"The Union Temperance Society of Moreau and Northumberland." It was formed in the spring of 1808 by a Christian layman, a thoughtful physician, Dr. B. J. Clark, of Moreau, N. Y., and his pastor.

Dr. Clark had seen the evil effects of the drink habit in his boyhood home in Vermont, where his father kept a general store and sold intoxicating liquors, and later in life, as a practicing physician, he had been made deeply conscious of the impelling need for organized temperance work. He first tried to arouse an interest among his friends connected with the bar and bench, hoping for an organization to secure better legislative enactments. Not succeeding in this, he, with the aid of his pastor, effected the formation of a society whose definite purpose was "wholly to abstain from ardent spirits."

That little meeting of a score of drinking men and their temperance friends was the beginning of the magnificent organizations now belting the world for temperance. The original society, it is pleasant to record, is still maintained. The site of the original meeting place will be marked by a tablet to commemorate the centennial.

The plan for the World's Temperance Centennial Congress originated with the Rev. J. W. Durkee of Rochester, N. Y. The idea of the observance was so cordially received that a committee of promotion was formed of leading Christian and temperance workers of New York State, of which the Rev. J. W. Durkee was made chairman, the other members being John McKee, and Capt. H. M. Randall, of Brooklyn; Charles Robbins, Saratoga Springs; Albert L. Manierre and William T. Wardwell, New York City; Dr. J. A. Hartman, Albion; Rev. C. J. Taft and Levi Hoag, Binghamton.

A New Serial Written for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

By MRS. ELEANOR H. PORTER

Author of "Into Still Waters," etc.

MRS. KENDALL never thought of that speech of her little daughter afterward without a shudder. She even dreamed one of this all-powerful Tom Whalen—

—he stood over her with clinched fists and flashing eyes, demanding that she "divvy up" to the last cent. Clearly as she understood that this was only a dream, yet the vision haunted her; and it was not without some apprehension that she went with Margaret to the station to meet her guests, on the day appointed.

A letter from Margaret had gone to Patty, and one from Mrs. Kendall to Miss Murdock, the city missionary who had been so good to Margaret. Houghtonsville was on a main line to New York, and but a few hours' ride from the city. Mrs. Kendall had given full instructions as to trains, and had sent the money for the six tickets. She had also asked Miss Murdock to place the children in care of the conductor, saying that she would meet them herself at the Houghtonsville station.

Promptly in return had come Miss Murdock's letter telling of the children's delighted acceptance of the invitation; and almost immediately had followed Patty's elaborately flourished scrawl:

"Much obliged for de invite an wes comin. Tanks.

"Clarabella, Arabella and Patty, at yer service."

Mrs. Kendall thought of this letter and of Tom as she stood waiting for the long train from New York to come to a standstill; then she looked down at the sweet-faced, daintily-gowned little maid at her side, and shuddered. It is the thing to carry beef-tea and wheelchairs to our unfortunate fellow men, and quite another to invite those same fellow men to a seat at our own table by our own fireside.

Margaret and her mother had not time to wait. Tom Whalen, in spite of the conductor's restraining hand, was on the platform before the wheels had ceased to turn. Behind him tumbled Peter, Mary and Clarabella, while Patty, carefully guiding Arabella's twisted feet, brought up the rear. There was an instant's pause; then Tom spied Margaret, and with a triumphant "come on—here she is!" to those behind, he dashed down the platform.

"My, but ain't you slick!" he cried admiringly, stopping short before Margaret, who had unconsciously shrunk back close to her mother's side. "Hi, dear, Patty," he called, hailing the gleeful children behind him, "what would the Alley say if they could see her now?"

There was a moment's pause. Eagerly the children had followed Tom's lead, they stood abashed now before the tall, beautiful woman and the pretty little girl they had once known as "Mag of the Alley." Almost instantly Margaret saw and understood; and with all the strength of her hospitable little soul she strove to put her guests at their ease. With a glad little cry she gave one after another a bear-like hug; then she stood back with a flourish and prepared for the introductions. Unconsciously her words and manner aped those of her mother in sundry other introductions that had figured in her own experience during the last four weeks; and before Mrs. Kendall knew what was happening, she found herself being ceremoniously presented to Tom, late of the Alley, New York.

"With wild shouts, gleeful laughter and scampering feet"

"Tom, this is my dear mother that I lost long ago," said Margaret. "Mother, dear, can't you shake hands with Tom?"

Tom advanced. His face was fiery red, and the freckles shone luridly through the glow.

"Proud ter know ye, ma'am," he stammered, clutching frantically at the daintily gloved, outstretched hand.

Margaret sighed with relief. Tom did know how to behave, after all. She had feared he would not.

"And this is Mary Whalen, and Peter," she went on, as Mrs. Kendall clasped in turn two limp hands belonging to a white-faced girl and a frightened boy. "And here's Patty and the twins, Clarabella and Arabella; and now you know 'em all," finished Margaret, beaming joyously upon her mother, who was leaning with tender eyes over the little lame Arabella.

"My dear—how thin your poor little cheeks are," Mrs. Kendall was saying.

"Yes, she is kind o' peaked," volunteered Patty. "Miss Murdock says as how her food don't 'similate. Ye see she ain't over strong, anyhow, on account o' dem," pointing to the little twisted feet and legs. "Mebbe Maggie told ye, ma'am, how Arabella wa'n't finished up right, an' how her legs didn't go straight like ours," added Patty, giving her usual explanation of her sister's misfortune.

"Yes," said Mrs. Kendall, hurriedly. "She told me that the little girl was lame. Now, my dears, we—we'll go home." Mrs. Kendall hesitated and looked about her. "You—you haven't any bags or—or anything?" she asked them.

"Huh!" cried Tom, turning sharply toward the track where had stood a moment before the train that brought them. "And if it ain't gone so soon!" "Gone—the bag!" chorused five shrill voices.

"Sure!" nodded Tom, as he thrust both hands into his trousers pockets. "Gone she is, bag and baggage!"

"Oh, I'm so sorry," murmured Mrs. Kendall.

"Pooh! 'tain't a mite o' matter," assured Patty, quickly. "Ye see, dar wa'n't nothin' in it, anyhow, only a extr'y ribb'n fur Arabella's hair." Then, at Mrs. Kendall's blank look of amazement, she explained: "We only took it 'cause Katy Sovensky said folks allerstook 'em when they went trav'lin'. So we fished dis out o' de ash barrel an' fixed it up wid strings an' tacks. We didn't have nothin' ter put in it, 'course. All our clo's is on us."

"We didn't need nothin' else, anyhow," piped up Arabella, "for all our things is span clean. We went ter bed 'most all day yisterday so's Patty could wash 'em."

"Yes, yes, of course, certainly," agreed Mrs. Kendall, faintly, as she turned and led the way to the big four-seated carryall waiting for them. "Then we'll go home right away."

To Tom, Peter, Arabella and Clarabella it was all so wonderful that they fairly pinched themselves to make sure they were awake. The drive through the elm-bordered streets with everywhere flowers, vine-covered houses and velvety lawns—it was all quite unbelievable.

"It's more like Mont-Lawn than anythin' I ever see," murmured Arabella. "Seems 'most as though 'twas heaven." And Mrs. Kendall, who heard the words, reproached herself because for four long weeks she had stood jealous guard over this "heaven" and refused to "divvy up" its enjoyment. The next moment she shuddered and unconsciously drew Margaret close to her side. Patty had said:

"Gracious, Mag, ain't you lucky? Wish'd I was a lost an' founded!"

The house with its great stone lions was hailed with an awed "oh-h!" of delight, as were the wide lawns and brilliant flower-beds. Inside the house the children blinked in amazement at the lace-hung windows and gold-framed pictures; and Clarabella, balancing herself on her toes, looked fearfully at the woven pinks and roses at her feet and demanded: "Don't walkin' on 'em hurt 'em?"

"Seems so 'twould," she added, her eyes distrustfully bent on Margaret, who had laughed, and by way of proving the carpet's durability, was dancing up and down upon it.

The matter of choosing beds in the wide, airy chambers was a momentous one. In the boys' room, to be sure, it was a simple matter, for there were only two beds, and Tom settled the question at once by unceremoniously throwing Peter on to one of them, and pommeling him with the pillow until he howled for mercy.

The girls had two rooms opening out of each other, and in each room were two dainty white beds. Here the matter of choosing was only settled amicably at last by a rigid system of "counting out" by "Eeny, meeny, miny, mo," and even this was not accomplished without much shouting and laughter, and not a few angry words.

Margaret was distressed. For a time she was silent, then she threw herself into the discussion with all the ardor of one who would bring peace at any cost; and it was by her suggestion that the "Eeny, meeny, miny, mo" finally won the day. In her own room that night as she went to bed, she apologized to her mother.

"I'm sorry they was so rude, mother. I had forgot they was quite so noisy," she confessed anxiously. "But I'll tell 'em to-morrow to be more quiet. Maybe they didn't know that little ladies and little gentlemen don't act like that."

CHAPTER VII

FIVE OAKS awoke to a new existence on the first morning after the arrival of its guests from New York—an existence of wild shouts, gleeful laughter, scampering feet and confusion. In the kitchen and the garden old Mr. and Mrs. Barrett no longer held full sway. For some time there had been a cook, a waitress, a laundress, and an experienced gardener as well. In the barn, too, there was now a stalwart fellow who was coachman and chauffeur by turns, according to whether the old family carriage or the new six-cylinder touring car was wanted.

Tom, Peter, Mary, Patty and the twins had not been at Five Oaks twenty-four hours before they were fitted to new clothing throughout. Mrs. Kendall had not slept before she had interviewed the town clothier as to ways and means of immediately providing two boys and four girls with shoes, stockings, hats, coats, trousers, dresses and undergarments.

"Course 'tain't 'zactly necessary," Patty had said, upon being presented with her share of the new garments, "but it's awful nice, 'cause now we don't have ter go ter bed when ours is washed—an' they be awful nice!—just bang-up!"

No wonder Five Oaks awoke to a new existence! The wide-spreading lawns knew now what it was to be pressed by a dozen little scampering feet at once; and the great stone lions knew what it was to have two yelling boys mount their carved backs and try to dig sharp little heels into their stone sides. Within the house, the attic, sacred for years to cobwebs and musty memories, knew what it was to yield its treasured bonnets, shawls and quilted skirts to a swarm of noisy children who demanded them for charades.

Tom, Peter, Mary, Patty, Arabella and Clarabella had been at Five Oaks two weeks when one day Bobby McGinnis found Margaret crying all alone in the old summerhouse down in the garden.

"Hello! what's up?" he questioned, adding cheerily: "Soldiers' daughters don't cry!" It was a quotation from Margaret's own childhood's creed, and one which in the old days seldom failed to dry her tears. Even now it was not without its effect, for her head came up with a jerk.

"I—I know it," she choked, "and I ain't—I mean, I am not goin' to. There, you see," she broke off miserably, falling back into her old despondent attitude. "'Ain't' should be 'are not' all ways, and I never can remember."

"Pooh! Is that all?" laughed Bobby. "'Would take more'n a 'are not' ter make me cry."

"But that ain't all," wailed Margaret; and she did not notice that at one of her words Bobby chuckled and parted his lips only to close them again with a snap. "There's heaps more of 'em: 'bully' and 'bang-up' and 'gee' and 'drownded' and 'g' on the ends of things, and—almost everything I say, seems so."

"Well, what of it? You'll get over it. You're a-learnin' all the time; ain't ye?"

"'Are not you,' Bobby," sighed Margaret.

"Well, 'are not you,' then," snapped Bobby.

Margaret shook her head. A look that was almost terror came to her eyes. She leaned forward and clutched the boy's arm.

"Bobby, that's just it," she whispered, looking fearfully over her shoulder to make sure that no one heard. "That's just it—I'm not a-learnin'!"

"Why not?"

"Because of them—Tom, and Patty, and the rest."

Bobby looked dazed, and Margaret plunged headlong into her explanation. "It's them. They do 'em—all of 'em. Don't you see? They say 'ain't' and 'gee' and 'bully' all the time, and I see now how bad 'tis, and I want to stop. But I can't, Bobby. I just can't. I try to, but it just comes before I know it. I tried to stop them sayin' 'em, first," went on Margaret, feverishly, "just as I tried to make 'em act ladylike with their feet and their knives and forks; but it didn't do a mite o' good. First they laughed at me, then they got mad. You know how 'twas, Bobby. You saw 'em."

Bobby whistled.

"Yes, I know," he said soberly. "But when they go away—"

"That's just it," cut in Margaret, tragically. "I wa'n't goin' to have them go away. I was goin' to keep 'em always; and now I—Bobby, I want them to go!" She paused and let the full enormity of her confession sink into her hearer's comprehension. Then she repeated: "I want them to go!"

"Well, what of it?" retorted Bobby, with airy unconcern.

"What of it?" wept Margaret. "Why, Bobby, don't you see? I was going to divvy up, and I ought to divvy up, too. I've got trees and grass and flowers and beds with sheets on 'em, and enough to eat, and they hain't got anything—not anything. And now I don't want to divvy up, I don't want to divvy up, because I don't want them—here!"

Margaret covered her face with her hands and rocked herself to and fro. Bobby was silent. His hands were in his pocket, and his eyes were on an ant struggling with a burden almost as large as itself.

"Don't you see, Bobby, it's wicked that I am—awful wicked," resumed Margaret, after a minute. "I want to be nice and gentle like mother wants me to be. I don't want to be Mag of the Alley. I—I hate Mag of the Alley! But if Tom and Patty and the rest stays I shall be just like them, Bobby. I know I shall; and—and so I don't want 'em to stay."

Bobby stirred uneasily, changing his position.

"Well, you—you hain't asked 'em to yet, have ye?" he questioned.

"No. Mother 'spressly stip'lated that I shouldn't say anything about their stayin' always till their visit was over and they saw how they liked things."

"Shucks!" rejoined Bobby, his face clearing. "Then what ye cryin' 'bout? You ain't bound by no contract. You don't have ter divvy up."

"But I ought ter divvy up."

"Pooh! 'Course ye hadn't," scoffed Bobby. "Hain't folks got a right ter have their own things?"

Margaret frowned doubtfully.

"I don't know," she began with some hesitation. "If I've got nice things and more of 'em than Patty has, why shouldn't she have some of mine? 'Tain't fair, somehow. Somebody ain't playin' straight. I—I'm goin' to ask mother." And she turned slowly away and began to walk toward the house.

Not once, but many times during the next few days, did Margaret talk with her mother on this subject that so troubled her. The result of these conferences Bobby learned not five days later when Margaret ran down to meet him at the great driveway gate. Back on the veranda Patty and the others were playing "housekeeping," and Margaret spoke low so that they might not hear.

"I am goin' to divvy up," she announced in triumph, "but not here."

"Huh?" frowned Bobby.

Which Shall It Be?

Home-baked Beans or Van Camp's?

On one side the beans are mushy and broken, because you have baked in dry heat.

The other beans are baked in live steam.

They are all baked alike—baked until they are mealy. Yet they are nutty because they are whole.

On one side the beans are heavy and hard to digest, for you lack sufficient heat. They ferment and form gas.

Van Camp's are baked at 245 degrees. That fierce heat separates the particles so the digestive juices can get to them.

Then we bake the beans, the tomatoes and the pork all together, and get our delicious blend.

On one side is the bother of soaking, boiling and baking. The other beans are all ready. Heat the can in hot water, open. The dish is as fresh and savory as when it was freshly baked.

Let your people decide which they will serve both your beans and Van Camp's, and see which they ask for next. And glad of their choice. For 'twill save the bother of baking beans, and let your chef cook for you.

Van Camp's pork and beans baked with tomato sauce

You don't know how good beans can be until you once try Van Camp's.

We pay $2.50 per bushel to get the choicest Michigan beans. We could buy beans for 30 cents. But ours are picked out by hand to give us only the whitest, the plumpiest, the very cream of the crop.

We could buy tomato sauce ready-made for exactly one-fifth what we spend to make ours. But it would lack the richness, the sparkling zest, which get from vine-ripened tomatoes.

We believe that the best beans, baked with the best sauce, are cheap enough. And millions of people agree with us.

For beans are Nature's choicest food when they are rightly cooked. They are like meat in their food value, and like it in cost. Try serving such beans as your people want often, and see what you save on meat.

Prices: 10, 15 and 20 cents per can.

What Will You Give To Be Well

I CANNOT tell you how happy I am that I have been able to bring health and strength to 30,000 women in the past six years. Just think! This means a whole city. It is to my thorough study of anatomy, physiology and health principles, and to my 12 years personal experience before I began my instructions by mail, that I attribute my marvelous success. It would do your heart good to read the reports from my pupils—and I have done all this by simply studying Nature's laws adapted to the correction of each individual difficulty.

If vital organs or nerve centers are weak, I strengthen them so that each organ does its work. I bring each pupil to symmetrical proportions and I teach her to stand and to walk in an attitude which bespeaks culture and refinement. A good figure gracefully carried, means more than a pretty face. Nature's rosy cheeks are more beautiful than paint or powder. I help you to

A Better Wife
A Rested Mother
A Sweeter Sweetheart

You can easily remove the fat and it will stay removed. I have reduced 15,000 women.

Too Fleshy? One pupil writes me: "Miss Cocroft, I have reduced 78 pounds and I look 15 years younger. I feel so well I want to shout! I never get out of breath now."

"When I began I was rheumatic and constipated, my heart was weak and my head dull, and oh dear, I am ashamed when I think how I used to look! I never dreamed it was all so easy, I thought I just had to be fat. I feel like stopping every fat woman I see and telling her of you."

Too Thin? I may need to strengthen your stomach, intestines and nerves first. A pupil who was thin, writes me:

"I just can't tell you how happy I am. I am so proud of my neck and arms! My bust is rounded out and I have gained 28 pounds; it has come just where I wanted it and I carry myself like another woman."

"My old dresses look stylish on me now. I have not been constipated since my second lesson and I had taken something for years. My liver seems to be all right and I haven't a bit of indigestion any more, for I sleep like a baby and my nerves are so rested. I feel so well all the time."

Write me today telling me your faults in health or figure, and I will cheerfully tell you whether I can help you. I never treat a patient I cannot help. If I cannot help you I will refer you to the help you need.

To Have Good Figure, Vibrant Health, Rested Nerves?

Arise To Your Best

The day for drugging the system has passed. In the privacy of your own room, strengthen the muscles and nerves of the vital organs, lung and heart and start your blood circulating as it did when you were a child. I teach you to breathe, so that the blood is fully purified.

You Can Be Well Without Drugs

And the vital strength gained by a forceful circulation relieves you of such chronic ailments as Constipation, Torpid Liver, Indigestion, Rheumatism, Weaknesses, Catarrh, Dullness, Irritability, Nervousness, Sleeplessness or Weak Nerves by strengthening whatever organs or nerves are weak.

I wish I could put sufficient emphasis into these words to make you realize that you do not need to be ill, but that you can be a buoyant, vivacious, attractive woman in return for just a few minutes' care each day in your own home.

MICA AXLE GREASE

adds years to the life of a wagon. Just what a farmer, teamster or drayman needs to make the "wheels go round" with least wear and most profit.

Poor grease cuts the boxes out of your wheels — don't use it — get Mica Axle Grease and save the wagon.

Mica Axle Grease has just the right "body" to wear long without running. Coats the axle with an anti-friction surface of powdered mica which is almost as good as roller bearings.

Your wagon needs Mica Axle Grease — ask the dealer for it.

Memories of Mother

The Latest Gospel Hymn as Sung by Evangelist Alexander

FRED. P. MORRIS

ROBERT HARKNESS

1. My mother's hand is on my brow, Her gentle voice is pleading now;
2. Once more I see that look of pain, The anguish in those eyes again;
3. While others scorn'd me in their pride She gently drew me to her side;
4. The mem-o-ries of by-gone years, My mother's love, my mother's tears,
5. I'm coming home, by sin be-set, For Je-sus loves me e-ven yet;

A - cross the years so marred by sin What mem-o-ries of love steal in.
My heart is sad, for well I know My sin has caused this bit-ter woe.
When all the world had turned away, My mother stood by me that day.
The thought of all her constant care Doth bring the answer to her pray'r.
My mother's love brings home to me The greater love of Cal - va - ry.

CHORUS.

O mother, when I think of thee, 'Tis but a step to Cal - va - ry;

Thy gen-tle hand up - on my brow Is leading me to Je-sus now.

THIS is one of the most effective and touching of Mr. Alexander's new Gospel Hymns. At the business men's meetings at the Garrick Theatre in Philadelphia, it melted the hearts of the men in a remarkable manner. It was written by Robert Harkness last year in his native town of Bendigo, Australia. During Mr. Alexander's second tour of the world, he conducted meetings in Bendigo. One day Mr. Alexander handed Mr. Harkness the words of the hymn to be set to music. The composer called his mother into the room, and playing over the melody asked what she thought of it. His mother's eyes filled with tears, as she replied that she thought the hymn would be the means of bringing back many a wandering boy. Her prediction has already come true.

Cooking in Primitive Fashion

READERS of this journal have shown more than a passing interest in the splendid Christian work of Rev. Dr. Weiss and his co-laborers among the lepers of Surinam, and many of them have contributed for the support of the Leper Colony there. A friend of the work, Mr. R. Dan Wolterbeek, of New York, who has been in communication with Dr. Weiss, writes to ask whether there are not a few CHRISTIAN HERALD readers who would aid the Colony still further by helping it to a modern stove for kitchen purposes. The Bethesda Lepers' Home in Surinam can not use the regular stoves, he writes, "on account of the peculiar large boiling pots they cook in, and which are of dimensions large enough to cook a small calf at once. For that purpose they need three round holes in the top piece of the stove, of nearly two feet diameter each. Such a stove as they need could be procured at about $73. The freight would be about $10, making a total of about $83. Until now, and I think ever since times immemorial, they have been doing this cooking in the open air on tri-pots; but now they have a place-ready for a decent stove, which certainly will be a great comfort to the nurses, whose duties before these open fires in that hot climate have never been very enviable."

This request may appear to be a small thing but the comfort and well-being of the little colony may depend upon it to a great extent. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will gladly forward any contributions that may be received to help the Lepers' Home to a modern cooking apparatus to take the place of the primitive arrangement now in use.

The best of anything is generally the highest priced, but Alabastine—the artistic, clean and durable wall covering—is an exception.

Alabastine, coming in many soft, velvety tints, is not only the most beautiful and dainty of wall coverings, but by using it you save money—and that's worth considering.

This Is How Alabastine Saves Money

These figures are the results of actual experience. They show just how much Alabastine saves for the thrifty housekeeper:

	Cost per sq. yd.
Alabastine	1 1/2c
Wall Paper	5c
Oil Paint	10c
Wall Paper (Washable)	19c
Burlap	30c

Alabastine

The Sanitary Wall Coating

The saving is really more than is shown by the figures that we have given above, because you can apply Alabastine yourself—or if you want expert service, you may employ a painter or decorator. Then, when your walls are once covered with Alabastine, you do not have to scrape it off when you wish to redecorate. This saves half the cost of redecoration.

Free Book

Alabastine is sold by hardware, drug, paint and general stores. It comes in sealed packages, 50c for white and 55c for tints. If you want to know more about it just send the coupon below filled out, and a 2 cent U. S. stamp, and we will send you free our book which shows the various tints of Alabastine in colors—and tells you all about it.

Or, send us 10c in U. S. stamps, we will forward a copy of "Dainty Wall Decorations," a valuable and beautifully printed book, crammed full of suggestions for home decoration. It tells how to estimate cost of materials, how to Alabastine a wall, and gives many admirable hints on arranging original color schemes.

A LITTLE CHILD*

OUT there she could breathe, and think, and hope, as she fondly watched her baby play with the beautiful shells and frolic in the clean sands. The child wandered on up the shore a short distance, then sat down to play.

Approaching from the opposite direction, Mrs. Hays noticed a man, feeble and bent, walking wearily and slowly, followed at a considerable distance by another. As the man approached the spot where her baby played, she saw him stop a moment, then slowly seat himself by the child's side. There was something strangely familiar in his appearance, yet she could not recognize him. He seemed to enjoy being with the child, and as she knew no harm could come, she left them alone for a time.

"May I play in the sand with you, little one? What a nice shovel you have! I will fill your pail and you may empty it out. It will be lots of fun. May I?" said the man to the baby.

"You darling! What a beautiful little girl you are! What do they call you? Helen! Why, that was the name of the dearest girl who ever lived," he said as if half in soliloquy. "Once she loved me. I am sure of that. This memory is the only consolation left, the only thing to cheer my desolate and wasted life. Oh, how I wish now that I had listened to her advice, to her pleading! Fool that I was to exchange the most valuable, the most precious thing in the world, an honest woman's respect and love, for money and power! I wronged her, I wronged myself. I would give every dollar I am worth for just the respect of that woman. I can never win back her love, for she has given that to another—yes, to a better man."

Then turning to the child he said, "To no one but you, little one, would I admit that. But you are so innocent, so sweet, so comforting. I can safely tell you my heart, my very soul, for you can not understand or tell. And it relieves me to say these things to a human being. My master, pride, would not let me say so to any one but a baby. Never, even to myself, have I said these things without cursing my luck and thinking hate for the man now in the place I should have occupied. But in your pure, sweet presence I can neither curse nor mentally hate. You are a real nerve tonic, you little dear. You help me forget myself. Oh, if only I could forget myself entirely, forget my wicked deeds for one year, I would surely regain strength and health. Happiness and I are strangers forever."

Mrs. Hays had walked on over to where the two were sitting. She had witnessed the affecting scene unobserved and had heard his last sentences.

"Mrs. Hays," he said, "I did not intend to thus intrude. Attracted by this beautiful child and her innocent play, I sought momentary relief from my loneliness and broken spirits and health in her enchanting society. When she told me her name was Helen, it awoke recollections and stirred the only memories I would not banish. . . . I never thought I would come to the point of accepting charity from any human being, Mrs. Hays, least of all from you. But I grasp it now eagerly. I am trying hard to forget myself—but I can not. The only time I have succeeded was when playing in the sand with your precious baby. I know it is selfish to put it on that ground, but I have been steeped in the very essence of selfishness so long that it has become a part of my nature, the principal part, and I fear I never can overcome it.

"Out of my weakness, in the midst of memories rekindled while playing with her (the child), I am ashamed to say that tears came to my eyes for the first time in twenty years. And would you believe it—that little darling actually shed tears from those wonderful big eyes of hers, out of sympathy for me. I tell you it was overpowering! It was the first genuine sympathy bestowed upon me since—since—well, since very long ago. I did not know I had any heart left until she thus touched it; I wonder if her tears can revive it from its atrophy. I doubt it. But she is good medicine, anyway. What a fool I must seem, telling you these things like a big sniveling boy! But somehow I can not help it. I do not know what has come over me today. That little girl seems to have modified the intensity of my mental passions which for all these years have been burning out my mind, wrecking my body, and blasting my soul. Never do I expect to be a better man. I can not undo the past. It is too late, too late!"

"Perhaps you could make some amends, some restitution," suggested Mrs. Hays, without thought of the way it sounded or what it meant, but ever seeking to give gentle service.

"Restitution! How could I do that? I have robbed everybody, the entire American people. I do not know how much I have taken from each. The Wall Street machine largely hid their identity from me, as well as mine from them. I am the richest man in the world—yet the poorest. The humblest citizen has in abundance that which is more valuable than riches, that which I have not, that which all my wealth can not buy—contentment and happiness. . . . But I would give every dollar for penniless happiness and the strength I have lost. That desired luxury is a will-o'-the-wisp moving on as I move, ever eluding my grasp. I shall obtain it never—never—never!"

"If you have taken from the whole people, why not restore to the whole people that which you have taken? Would not that be right? You could do no more. Should you do less?"

"Ah, that is it! That is it! That is the idea I have been blindly groping for. To be sure it would be right! To be sure it is all I can do! To be sure I should do it—I will do it!"

Chinese Preachers and Their First Flocks*

IT would be difficult to find a people who delight in the preaching of the Gospel more than do the Chinese at the present time. There is a real danger that the preaching of the Word may be considered most important instead of holding fast to the truth that Christianity is the expression of the Spirit of Christ through the believers. It is life more than formal doctrine.

The Chinese have expressed their moral truths in concrete phrases and proverbs for many hundreds of years and it is a natural thing for the Christian to make much use of a similar method of expression for Christian truth. The native evangelists glory in the message they have for their fellow men and their enthusiasm is nothing less than contagious. The instruction of the Chinese language in its conciseness and in its tonal range, makes it a strong ally in stimulating men to give attention to the claim of the new religion.

The writer has frequently, accompanied by two or more Chinese evangelists, entered eight or ten different towns and villages in one day, preach the Gospel to the people rarely has such a day been spent out some distinct advance to the cause.

The lives of the preachers in China are happy because they have a work to do and most of them are doing it. Some time ago a preacher to the headquarters at Kityang having spent the whole night on a ferry boat. He complained that fellow passengers were more urbane than any he had ever met. Full conversation on the subject revealed the fact that they had threatened to throw him overboard because he persisted in preaching to the people during the entire night! He could sleep on a moving boat and so thought to make the best use of his time and opportunity. He quoted the passage of our duty to preach "in season, out of season." His case is but an illustration of the tremendous efforts of the thousands of evangelists are putting forth this day in the land of China.

But now let us look in upon a typical congregation of new adherents. In an old house in the town has been renovated and a number of benches placed in the room. The people are standing about in groups smoking their pipes and talking as usual in loud voices. Their language is still filthy and their expressions show that the Christian moderation and love have not yet taken possession of them. Their habits are still the same as those of the pagans. Word is given by the evangelist in charge that the time for morning has arrived. At the signal every one cries out, "Li-pai!" Worst of all those who have not yet done so with their braids, done up in a top-knot and let them fall down the back. Each takes a seat, every man talking in loud tones to his neighbor. The evangelist finds it necessary to tell the audience to be quiet, and in order to give something to do calls out the number of a hymn. Some ten or more may repeat the number in a loud voice without least thought of any disturbance.

After a number of hymns have been sung the evangelist announces the lesson of Scripture and begins to read when a man decides that he wants to turn to the page of Scripture too, having missed the chapter and book calls out in a loud voice to ask where the lesson is found. Several, including the evangelist, inform him. At that point, just as the evangelist is about to resume reading, he spies one of the late-comers sitting on the rear bench smoking his pipe. He calls upon him to put away his pipe, and at once upon a number from the audience turn, crying, "No smoking," each one of them being convinced that he did his share towards keeping things in order. They listen with reasonable quietness, excepting a disturbance or two by late-comers who perhaps have deposited a corner a basket containing potatoes or live chickens or even a pig tied securely. There is very little reverence shown in their demeanor, and the missionary finds himself growing impatient within him as he observes the lack of this, which seems to him a solutely necessary for the proper development of a true spiritual life.

An Acrostic

Christian in name and in spirit well blended
Happy the homes by its visits befriended
Round the hearth gathering, lost in its page
Innocent children, gay youths and wise sage Something for each, the unlearned or refined Thoughts for the simple or culture-trained mind
In every column the bright gems are gleaming
All with the beauty of reverence beaming,
Never the poison of "critical" dreaming.

Herald of tidings from over the sea,
Every week bringing to you and to me
Rich illustrations from peoples afar,

A Beautiful Memorial

ALL people are familiar with the story of Sir George Williams, the Englishman who founded the Young Men's Christian Association; whose work spread to every land, and who,

Sir George Williams Memorial

in recognition of his services to humanity, was knighted by his sovereign. England has several memorials, and not the United States, in which the Y. M. C. A. movement has reached its greatest magnitude, is to have a commemorative piece of sculpture worthy of the man whose bust it will bear. It is the work of Mr. George Frampton, a member of the Royal Academy of England. Above the bust is the coat of arms of Sir George, and on each side of the name-tablet are two supporting figures. The quotation below is taken from one of his last public utterances.

'Lovest Thou Me?'

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

THERE was a constraint about the disciples after the resurrection. They knew He was the Lord, yet not one of them called him by name. But, in his wonted way, he took bread and gave them, and fish likewise, and set them at ease with him. But something remained to be done: Peter had denied Jesus, even with oaths and curses. True, the look of Jesus had recalled him, and he had gone out and wept bitterly; the message of the resurrection and the invitation to meet him in Galilee had been sent personally to Peter (Mark 16: 7); he had been breathed upon by Jesus, and had received the Holy Ghost; he had seen the hands and side of Jesus when he had said, "Peace be unto you." But a definite wrong needs to be definitely set right. Peter had said, "Tough all men shall be offended because of thee, yet will I never be offended" (Matt. 26: 33). Peter had valued himself as being the most faithful and most devoted among the disciples; now Jesus said to him: "Simon, son of Jonas, lovest thou me more than these?" When Peter had acknowledged him to be the Christ, the Son of the living God, Jesus had named him Peter, but he calls him now by the old name, "Simon, son of Jonas." Peter had counted on himself, not on the grace of God, and so the Lord calls him by the name he had before he knew him. "Lovest thou me?" Jesus uses the word for "love" which expresses the least intensity, "Dost thou care for me more than these?" Peter had learned at last that to compare himself with the other disciples was treacherous to the honor of his Lord. Without answering that part of our Lord's question, he says: "Yea, Lord; thou knowest that I love thee." And Jesus committed unto him the charge, "Feed my lambs."

Once before, Jesus had said, "Simon, Simon, behold, Satan hath desired to have you [all of you] that he may sift you as wheat; but I have prayed for thee, that thy faith fail not; and when thou art converted, strengthen thy brethren" (Luke 22: 31, 32). Peter was converted from the world to God, but he needed to be converted from self to God, from his self-dependence to nothingness in himself, that he might know the keeping power of Jesus. Now he does not venture so much as to say, "I am sure I love thee," but "thou knowest." He has been disappointed in himself, and can count on Jesus only. Three times had Peter denied Jesus, three times must he pass through the humbling ordeal of Jesus thus questioning him before his brethren.

A second time Jesus asked him, "Simon, son of Jonas, lovest thou me?" This time he did not say, "More than these." Peter replied as he had done before, using the intense word for love, "Thou knowest that I love thee with all my soul." Jesus repeated his charge, and said, "Feed my sheep." But a third time he asked him the same question, now using the intense word himself, "Simon, son of Jonas, lovest thou me?" Peter was grieved because he said unto him the third time, "Lovest thou me?" and he said unto him, "Lord, thou knowest all things; thou knowest that I love thee." Jesus saith unto him, "Feed my sheep." Peter was converted from himself, weaned from self-confidence, at last. All through this test he does not assert himself at all. "Thou knowest" is his stronghold, and thus he is deputed to strengthen his brethren. Usefulness is not a reward for superior faithfulness; Peter had no faithfulness to boast of, but he took the place of nothingness, and so could be an instrument ready to the hand of God. God never slurs over sin in his children, never treats it as though it had not been. He forgives freely. His blood cleanseth from all sin; but that he may fully restore our souls and lead us in the paths of righteousness, he must bring us to see the sin in his light, know his mind upon it, and see ourselves as he sees us.

Called Higher

Mrs. Delora C. Baker, of Allen, Mich., passed recently to the better land. She was a Christian in thought, word, and deed. For years she had been a constant reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Mr. M. C. Johnson, of Hitchcock, Okla., after a long illness, passed away the 18th day of March, 1908. He was seventy-eight years of age, and had long been a subscriber to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Entered into rest, Peter Hall, of Ashville, O. He was a faithful member of the Lutheran Church, and gave both time and money to further all Christian work. He had been a constant reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for about fifteen years. Deacon Charles M. Minor, who passed away in his home in Bridgeport, Conn., February 9, 1908, in his ninety-first year, was for many years a lover of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Since he became so deaf that he could not hear the sermon at church, he always saved the sermon in this paper to read Sunday morning. He was deacon of Park Street Congregational Church for twenty-six years and an earnest worker for missions, both home and foreign. He was a happy Christian, always looking on the bright side of things.

SPEAKS FOR ITSELF

Experience of a Southern Man.

"Please allow me to thank the originator of Postum, which in my case, speaks for itself," writes a Fla. man. "I formerly drank so much coffee during the day that my nervous system was almost a wreck. My physician told me to quit drinking it but I had to have something to drink, so I tried Postum. "To my great surprise I saw quite a change in my nerves in about 10 days. That was a year ago and now my nerves are steady and I don't have those bilious sick headaches which I regularly had while drinking coffee. "Postum seems to have body-building properties and leaves the head clear. And I do not have the bad taste in my mouth when I get up mornings. When Postum is boiled good and strong, it is far better in taste than coffee. My advice to coffee drinkers is to try Postum and be convinced." "There's a Reason." OUR students are now brought to consider one of the cardinal points of Esperanto, called the "correlative words," forty-five in number. They are fundamental in character, for on an Esperanto page almost every line has two or more of them. They are divided into nine sections, or shall we say "families"? Read in the first column, from the top downward, the names of the families. Another part of the family name is in the second row of squares; again begin at the top and read downward. The second part of the family name begins with i, and has an ending peculiar to itself which is descriptive: ia, some quality; ial, some reason; iam, some time; ie, some manner; iel, some place; ies, somebody's; io, some thing; iom, some quantity; iu, some one. In a few minutes these names can be learned so that they will stand in the mind as pictures. To write them will help to fix them in the memory. Let the leader of the circle write them on the blackboard, and let others write on the blackboard from dictation. Now it must be said that each one of these families has five members, and also, that in a way the nine families are connected, as each has a member whose name begins with ĉi, meaning all; another with ki, meaning what; another with nen, meaning none, and another with ti, meaning that. Now begin with the ĉi members: ĉia, ĉial, ĉiam, etc., every kind, every reason, every time or all time, etc. Take the ki row: kia, what quality; kial, what reason; kiam, what time, etc. Now begin with the nen, and go through the nine families. At last take the ti members.

Exercise

Give Esperanto words for the following:

What time. Never. Nobody's. Everywhere. Everything. Always. The whole. Nobody. Something. Somewhere. When. Nowhere. Nothing. Whose. How much. Anything.

Those of our scholars who have primers should look through them for correlative words. They should also write many original sentences, using the correlatives.

How Our Readers Helped China

IN his report to the General Conference on the China famine Bishop J. W. Bashford paid high tribute to the generosity of the readers of this journal in relieving the distress in that country. He said, toward the close of his address:

"The most pitiful was the cry of the children. At Hsueheofu, the members of the Southern Presbyterian Mission sent word to the Relief Committee at Shanghai that they had milk enough to save 1,200 babies for a few days, but only enough to keep 200 until the harvest; so that rather than let them all starve after keeping them a few days, they had selected 200 and turned the rest away to die.

"When the report of this reached America, it was read by a man to his fellows at a club in New York. He said: 'Let's do something to help save the babies at that temple in Hsueheofu.' They helped; others helped, and soon after this a telegram was received in Shanghai from Mr. Klopsch announcing $50,000 more for famine relief, and $5,000 of it for the 'temple babies.' When I reached Hsueheofu they had 1,300 temple babies—saved by American money.

"I am more proud than I can ever tell you of the generosity of the American response to the appeals sent out by the Associated Press. Mr. Louis Klopsch, editor and proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, through his large experience in collecting famine funds for India, probably was the most competent man in America to take charge of the American relief funds. At the earnest invitation of President Roosevelt and others, Mr. Klopsch assumed this responsibility, and brought to the aid of the China sufferers the large resources of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and hired, at his own expense, a force of stenographers, clerks, etc., for handling the work. Moreover, more than once THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, in response to urgent appeals for aid from China, advanced money—at one time $50,000—for the relief of the suffering, trusting to the subscriptions of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers to reimburse them. This paper, with its immense circulation, served as a medium for Mr. Klopsch's appeal, and he succeeded in raising something like a half million dollars for the China sufferers. Large amounts were also raised through the appeals of the denominational papers, and money for the relief of hundreds was sent through our own missionary office, and the missionary societies of other churches. Thus American generosity, inspired and directed by Mr. Klopsch and others, saved literally tens of thousands of lives, and led man after man in China to say: 'Had it not been for America all of us would have perished.' Thus there was rendered a great international service, contributing to cementing at a critical stage very largely the bonds of friendship between the greatest nation on the western shore of the Pacific and the greatest nation on her eastern shore. Better still—there was rendered a great service to the country, and doubtless multitudes of those who listened to the appeal of Mr. Klopsch and others will hear falling from the Saviour's lips on the Day of Judgment: 'Inasmuch as ye did it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye did it unto me.'

YOUNG PEOPLE'S SOCIETIES

True and False Success*

THERE are two kinds of success in this world—that which is the result of earnest effort and sound moral principles, and that which comes from a selfish and conscienceless application of our talents, regardless of morals or of the rights of others. Joseph was prospered because it was apparent to all who came in contact with him that he was a youth whose ingenuous address, good behavior and amiable manners were the outward manifestations of a noble and upright soul within.

Joseph's career is a model for employees through all the ages. He had had to contend with more than the usual number of obstacles that beset a young man; but from the home teaching he had learned many admirable lessons. He had learned to put God and religion first in all things. Charles Kingsley has well said: "Let any one set his heart to do what is right in God's sight, and nothing else, and it will not long ere his brow is stamped with a mark that goes to make up the heroic expression, with noble indignation, noble self-restraint, patience, and great hopes." There was in Joseph's face the visible integrity, truthfulness and purity which quickly won him friends.

Many great careers have had as humble a beginning as that of Joseph. Gifford drove mules on the towpath all later became President of the Republic. Lord Campbell, Chancellor of England, began life as a printer's boy. Lincoln came from the log cabin to the White House. The greatest prizes are within the reach of the humblest, if only righteousness rule the life.

Probably, next to the love of God in the heart, the three most desirable qualities for a young man beginning life are respect for superiors and elders, implicit and conscientious obedience and inflexible fidelity in word and deed.

There are many good people who make poor employees and unconsciously hinder their own advancement. They may possess the cardinal virtues—be truthful, honest and God-fearing—and yet lack thoroughness or diligence, or be too slow or too dull to suit the requirements. Their work may be conscientious, but so imperfect that it will never yield them rich results. It is the attention to detail that tells in the end. "I have neglected nothing," said the great painter Poussin, in explaining his wonderful success. "If I am building a mountain," said Confucius, "and stop before the last basketful of earth is placed on the summit, I have failed." A man may fail because of inattention to seeming trifles, or because of some little defect of manner which he might have remedied. A sour face, a chronically suspicious look, a harsh way of speaking, will not please either an employer or the public. There are few more valuable aids to success in life than a bright, smiling face, a cheerful tone and a frank, open, engaging, self-reliant manner. "A bright, serene spirit," wrote Schiller, "is the source of all that is noble and good."

To sum up the whole: Fear God and trust him to guide you in all things; put your whole heart into your work; be cheerful, hopeful, tactful, truthful, watchful of opportunity, and you can not fail. Such service is sure of ultimate appreciation and honor. It was such service that took Joseph out of a pit and made him ruler of Egypt.

Cardinal Wolsey, when facing death at the executioner, lamented in words that are now historic, his shutting out of God and principle from his later life. He brought his career, with all its glories and subtleties, to an inglorious close. "Had I been as diligent in serving my God as I have been to please my king," he said, "he would not have forsaken me now in my gray hairs." Had he put God first in his life, how different might have been the end!

God's Protecting Care*

CONFIDENCE in the love, the wisdom and the protecting care of our Heavenly Father is the theme of this lesson.

Scripture and history abound with instances of God's protection to his children in peril. Joseph, saved by God to become a savior of his jealous brothers; Moses, delivered from Pharaoh to become the deliverer of Israel; David, protected from Saul to become Saul's successor; Daniel, unharmed by lions, to vindicate the power of his God; Peter, released from prison in answer to prayer; Stephen, given a vision of Jesus Christ in the moment of his enemies' triumph.

Missionary biography is full of the same convincing material. Dr. Gamewell, who led the defense of Peking, took six thousand native Christians and missionaries through lines of infuriated Boxers out of Peking to a place of safety. When asked how they could have run this fearful gauntlet unharmed, he said that on that day bands of Christians were united in prayer for them in the churches of America.

A student in Peking University, Feng-Ting-Hsin, tells of his experiences during the Boxer uprising. "Some Boxers came to Tientsin from Shan-tung," he said. "We held a daily prayer meeting every day from one o'clock to three, at which my father presided. One day, when the meeting was in session, some Boxers came upon us with gongs and ropes, clubs, lances, and swords.

"Then they wanted to tie my father up and to burn up all our books. They tried to make my father worship the idol; and if not, they would bind him. My father refused, and when tied up said to us: 'You need not be sorry for me; life and death are in God's hands. If God wishes me to die, I shall die willingly. If he wills not, they can do nothing to harm me. I would rather die than deny my Lord and betray myself.' Soon a man came with several scores of men with rifles. The man said: 'This is my friend; turn him loose; if not, I will strike.' They let my father off and then they hastened away."

Miss Dix, well known for her philanthropies and her visitations among the prisons, being once interrogated concerning the perils of her work, said:

"I had hired a carriage and driver to take me some distance through an uninhabited portion of Michigan. I discovered that the driver had a pair of pistols. I said to him, 'Give me the pistols; I will take care of them.' He did so reluctantly. In pursuing our journey through a dismal-looking forest, a man rushed into the road, caught the horse by the bridle, and demanded my purse. I said to him, with as much self-possession as I could command, 'Are you not ashamed to rob a woman? I have but little money, and that I want to defray my expenses in visiting prisons and poor-houses, and occasionally in giving to objects of charity.' 'Oh,' he exclaimed, 'that voice!' and immediately told me he had been in the Philadelphia penitentiary, and had heard me lecturing some of the prisoners in lecturing cells. He then desired me to pass on, and expressed deep sorrow at the outrage he had committed." It is better to trust in the Lord than to put confidence in princes, or in pistols. Had the driver kept his pistols, and used them, both Miss Dix and he might have been murdered.

Let us learn, as Luther did, who, looking out of his window one summer evening, saw, on a tree at hand, a little bird making preparations for a night's rest. "Look," said he, "how that little fellow preaches faith to us all. He takes hold of his twig, tucks his head under his wing, and goes to sleep, leaving God to think for him."

A Summer Necessity

Because the New Perfection Wick Blue Flame Oil Cook-Stove concentrates heat at the openings on the stove top, it boils and bakes in less time than a coal or wood stove, which wastes heat by radiating to the farthest corner of the room.

This is the reason, too, why the "New Perfection" keeps your kitchen so uniformly cool while you're working in it.

This wonderful comfort-quality, combined with great convenience and economy, makes the

THE "GOOD INDIAN" OF THE FUTURE

Government Spending $4,000,000 Yearly for Indian Schools and to Eliminate the Old Savagery

THE first efforts to educate the Indians of any part of the vast territory now comprised in the United States were made by the Spaniards, who conducted schools in connection with the missions in New Mexico and Arizona three full centuries ago. As the hold of Spain upon its American possessions gradually relaxed, less and less attention was given to the education of the native tribes, and they were permitted to lapse into barbarism. During the period of Mexican occupation, the Indians of the region now comprised in the American Southwest were left practically to their own devices. About 1850 the United States government began to give some attention to the matter, making contracts with various mission schools for the education of the red children.

In 1892 Congress passed an act providing that twenty per cent. of the contract schools should be abolished each year until all were done away with. This law was carried into effect during President Cleveland's second administration, under the direction of Commissioner Browning. In thirty years, the cost of maintaining our Indian schools has increased from $20,000 to $4,000,000 annually. There are now 257 schools, in which about 23,000 Indian children are being educated. Of these 12 are day schools, 93 reservation schools, and 25 non-reservation schools. There is a growing sentiment in favor of abolishing the last named and establishing a much larger number of reservation schools to take their place. The most serious objections to the non-reservation schools arise from the fact that boys and girls from widely separated tribes are brought together and given precisely the same training. The nomadic Apaches and the sedentary Pueblos, for example, with many others, are brought together in the schools at Albuquerque and Santa Fe, N. M. Yet there is nothing in common between them. Differing widely in language, customs, traditions, intelligence, capabilities and manner of life, there is no rational excuse for subjecting them to the same educational treatment. Again, it is believed that schools located on the reservations will be centers from which will radiate civilizing influences to the tribesmen.

The newest of the non-reservation schools is the San Juan Indian School, located at Shiprock, N. M., on the great Navajo Indian reservation. The Navajos are scattered over a territory that extends 250 miles from east to west and 200 miles from north to south, including not only the Navajo reservation proper, but also a large part of the Hopi (or Moki) reservation, and thousands of square miles of the public lands in New Mexico and Arizona. It is a country of parched and arid deserts, barren and inhospitable mountains and deep canyons, with a few magnificent pine forests and wooded mountain streams. The greater part of it is little known and rarely visited by the whites. The Navajos have no towns or villages; they are herdsmen, with great flocks of sheep and goats, and every family lives by the formation known as the "ship-rock." Three large buildings have been completed, at a cost of $47,000, and the contract has been let for two more. In addition, there are about fifteen smaller buildings, including barn, laundry, carpenter and blacksmith shops, coal house, gas house (with machinery for the generation of acetylene gas), warehouse, and cottages for the accommodation of the superintendent and the agency employees. All are arranged in rows, fronting wide and well kept streets, with lawns and flower gardens. At this writing, there are 115 pupils in the school; but when the additional buildings have been completed this number will be increased to 160. The three large buildings are steam heated, equipped with acetylene lights, modern sewer and water systems and many improvements.

Belonging to the school are 300 acres of fertile land. On this all the fruits and vegetables needed by the students and school employees will be raised, with a large surplus for market. Although classroom work was not begun until May, 1907, nearly every child can now carry on an ordinary conversation in English, and all are fairly started on the way to fit themselves for useful lives.

Contrary to the general opinion, attendance at the Indian schools is not compulsory. Parents generally consent to allow their children to attend school on account of a personal liking for the superintendent, a teacher or some other government employee, or else through a crafty idea that it is a good way to curry favor with the great "White Father" at Washington. Transportation to and from the schools, maintenance while there, clothing, text books and all school supplies are furnished by the government. Few of the students are ever graduated. Most of them enter for a five years' course, and a few for a three years' course, and no attempt is made to carry instruction beyond the eighth grade. The great majority leave school before their course is completed, but all learn to speak, read and write English, and to perform such mathematical calculations as are likely to prove useful. Formerly, great effort was put forth to train a considerable number of the Indian youth for careers as teachers, but the plan was not a success.

itself, often in an isolated spot many miles from a neighbor. Their homes are rude huts, called hogans, built of logs or the limbs of trees, banked up with clay and thickly covered on top with the same material, to make them rain-proof.

Owing to their habits and to the nature of the country, it has been found almost impossible to induce the Navajos to send their children to school. Some attend the government schools at Santa Fe, Albuquerque and Phoenix, but the majority have never seen even the exterior of a school.

The San Juan school is in northwestern New Mexico, near the foothills of the Lukachuka Mountains, almost in the shadow of the tremendous nat-

The Question OF Amusements

TEXT—Ecc. 11: 9

"Rejoice, O young man, in thy youth"

THE question of legitimate pleasure is one that engages the thought of all young Christians; and rightly so, inasmuch it plays a most important part in the business of life. The difficulty is to know how far one may indulge in certain amusements of a more or less doubtful character without compromising his usefulness and loyalty to Christ.

A safe answer is given in the text by Solomon, who, by reason of his supernatural gift of wisdom and rare experience, was competent to speak in these premises. His words are regarded by some commentators as satirical, meaning, "Go on, young man, in your wild career; have your fling, but the furies will be after you!" In fact, however, he meant nothing of the sort. His words are to be taken seriously, and we shall find in them a real contribution to the solution of the question before us. He begins by saying, "Rejoice in thy youth and delight thyself in the ways of thy heart and in the sight of thine eyes." We will agree that recreation is a necessary part of life. "All work and no play makes Jack a dull boy." It is as impossible as it would be undesirable to have an old head on young shoulders. Let the dew sparkle and the birds sing in the morning; the sun will be hot enough further on. "Life goes a-Maying," said Milton, "with nature, hope and poesy, we are young."

Youthful Enjoyments

And the enjoyment of youth is multiplied manifold when it is coupled with loyalty to Christ. To associate religion with hypochondria is so serious a misrepresentation as to approach the blameworthiness of a cardinal sin. The man who wrote,

They wear long faces, just as if their Maker,
The Lord of Glory, were an undertaker, was gravely at odds with truth. The saying that Christ never laughed has no better foundation than the fact that no record is made of his having done so. For the same reason it might be affirmed that Plato and Aristotle, Seneca, Marcus Aurelius, Epictetus, Sakyamuni and Confucius never laughed, since their biographers never found any occasion for mentioning it. Let it suffice to say that Christ was a man. He went down to the marriage supper at Cana and participated in the festivities as a welcome guest. His life was pure and his conscience clean; therefore, his smile must have been serene and his laughter as innocent as that of childhood. One whose sins are unforgiven may well wear a sober visage; but he who believes in divine grace and hopes for heavenly felicity has reason to "delight himself in the ways of his heart and in the sight of his eyes."

"But let him know," says Solomon; that is, let him ponder his ways. So Paul, writing to his "son" Timothy in the pleasure-loving city of Ephesus, bids him "be sober." Why not? The fountain of sin is thoughtlessness. A hand beckons to an illicit joy; we follow impulsively and excuse ourselves by saying, "I did not think." Not think? It is our business to think. "Be sure you're right, then go ahead."

And the one thing in particular which Solomon commends to the consideration of youth is this, "That for all these things God will bring thee into judgment."

The Penalty of Indulgence

This is indeed a serious thought. There is a judgment here and now; as the saying runs, "Every day is judgment day." There is another which comes to-morrow. He who revels to-night will have a headache in the morning. Time brings its avengements. But there is a final judgment which is appointed for "the Great Day," when the books are to be opened and we shall be called to an account for the deeds done in the body. The point, therefore, on which the emphasis of our thinking is to be placed is not death, but what comes after it. We live forever. Here Solomon parts company with Epicurus, whose aphorism was "Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die." But death does not end all. After death comes judgment; and after judgment eternity. Wherefore, think; and let thy pleasures be such as shall harmonize with those which await thee further on.

But the advice of Solomon is not sufficiently definite. Is there no standard by which we may arrive at a clearer and more specific answer to the question, What amusements are lawful and what are not? There is. But before stating it, let us make note of certain fallacious rules of guidance.

Following the Fashion

It is a mistake, at the outset, to direct our conduct by what others do. If we follow the fashion we shall frequently find ourselves "going with the multitude to do evil." It is far better to stand, like the three youths in Babylon, bracing ourselves against our principles, and let the crowd sweep by. Our Lord said, "To what shall I liken this generation? It is like unto children sitting in the marketplace, and calling unto their fellows, and saying, We have piped unto you, and ye have not danced; we have mourned unto you, and ye have not lamented. But wisdom is justified of her children." In other words, it is hopeless to adjust our life and conduct to what others expect of us. To be singular may be unconventional; but "wisdom is justified of her children." All's well if Christ smiles upon us.

It is a mistake, also, to say, "I will seek the counsel of my pastor and follow it." If I were a priest, I could settle all questions of this nature off-hand, saying, "No, you may not do this or you may not do that, under pain of the anathema." But, in so doing, I should usurp the functions of the individual conscience and dwarf it. How easy it would be to live if we could throw off the responsibility of personal decision in that way! But this is impossible. We live alone, fight our own battles, meet our own responsibilities, die alone and stand for ourselves before God. It is the business of a minister not to dwarf the individual conscience by absolving it from responsibility, but rather to stimulate and educate it. And the fact is that the humblest of Christians has the same data which the minister has for the making of moral choices. He has the Bible, the privilege of access to the mercy-seat, the communion of the Spirit and the great promise, "If any of you lack wisdom, let him ask of God, who giveth to all men liberally and upbraideth not, and it shall be given him."

Christ's Perfect Example

It is fallacious, also, to say, "I must do as Christ did." There are some excellent people who affirm that our lives are to be regulated in that way; but Christ himself never said so. He was aware of the fact that circumstances alter cases. He was too wise to require of us an imitation in detail and particular of a perfect life that was lived nineteen hundred years ago. He did not say, "I wear sandals; so must you. I live a celibate; so must you. I drive the money-changers out of the temple with a whip of small cords; so must you. I begin my sermons with 'Verily, verily, I say unto you'; so must you." But what he did say was, "Ye are my friends if ye do whatsoever I command you"; and this is our rule of conduct, plain, simple, comprehensive. Our lives, if we are true Christians, must be adjusted to it. And, fortunately, his commandments are sufficiently clear for the settlement of all doubts and perplexities in every relation of life. He does not, it is true, make specific mention of certain doubtful amusements, which are usually in the mind of young people when they raise the question in hand, but he does lay down such rules of conduct as make a plain path before us, providing we are disposed to walk in it.

First: The Moral Law. To the rich young ruler who came running and prostrated himself before him with the question, "What must I do that I may have eternal life?" he answered, "Keep the Commandments." The precepts of the Decalogue are so interwoven with the human constitution as to be of binding force forever; therefore, our Lord paid tribute to it, saying, "I am come not to destroy the law, but to fulfil it." If we are ready to follow the injunction of Christ thus far, we shall find ourselves at once, as Christians cut off from participation in all such pleasures as are smirched with sin. To indulge in profane swearing is now out of the question, since it is a violation of the Third Commandment. To engage in amusements which are of a purely secular character on the Sabbath is unlawful, because the Fourth Commandment forbids it. To read an unclean book, witness an unclean play, listen to an unclean story or participate in an unclean conversation, or to do any sensual thing or anything calculated to wear off the fine edge of personal purity, is banned for us, because it is a breach of the Seventh Commandment. To get something for nothing, by any form of game whatsoever, on Wall Street or over the card in a drawing-room, or by betting on races or games is prohibited in the Eighth Commandment. To participate in scandalous gossip, to "convey a libel a frown or wink a reputation down" is outlawed for us because it is so nominated in the Ninth Commandment. In general terms, all questions relating to such pleasures and amusements as in any contravene the letter or spirit of the Decalogue settled definitely and finally for all professing Christians by the prescript of Christ, "Keep Commandments." No man or woman can be a true Christian and continue to indulge in things. For these are the habits that poison and ruin the bodies and souls of men.

Good and Bad Influence

Second: The Rule of Influence. This is laid down by our Lord in the words, "It must needs be that offenses come; but woe unto him by whom the offense cometh! It were better for him that a stone were hanged about his neck, and that he were drowned in the depth of the sea, than that he should offend one of these little ones." We are "compared about by a great cloud of witnesses." They wait to see whether or no we are consistent in our profession. No man liveth unto himself. Our influence, consciously or unconsciously, falls on all about us. By the due observance of this rule we are estopped from many indulgences which do not immediately fall under the interdict of the Moral Law. A case in point is that of the idol meats in Corinth. It appears that these meats, left over from the sacrifices laid on pagan altars, were offered in the shops at public sale, and not infrequently the members of the Corinthian church sat at tables where they were expected to partake of them. Now, there were some of these Christians who said, "We were formerly idolaters, but now having been converted to Christ, we perceive that an idol is nothing at all; therefore we can partake of this meat without being defiled by it." But there were others, of weaker conscience, who were led by this example to eat these sacrificial meats and, in so doing, compromised their loyalty to Christ. So Paul writes, "wounding their weak conscience, and giving them occasion to stumble, ye sin against Christ;" and himself he frames this declaration of independence: "If meat make my brother to offend, I will eat meat while the world standeth!" For the diet of idol meats substitute the wine cup, and you have the argument for total abstinence in a nutshell. It is a little thing to refrain from drinking it; so little in view of the possibility that otherwise I might place a fatal stone of stumbling in the way of a weaker brother who is trying to serve God.

The Test of Conduct

It is proper, however, at this point to suggest caution; to wit, we are not called upon to adjust our lives to the criticism of every censorious finder who takes issue with us. And if our yielding is likely to imperil the interests of truth and righteousness or pander to mere superstition, then we are under bonds to stand firm. The First Council at Jerusalem, recorded in the fifteenth chapter of the Acts of the Apostles, was called to determine upon a question of this sort. The Jews took umbrage at the fact that Gentile converts were received in the church without subjecting themselves to the requirements of the Levitical law. It was decided that historic Council that there was no valid ground for the criticism and that a principle would be sacrificed if the Gentiles were required to submit to the conditions referred to. By this we perceive that the test question for the solution of our ethical perplexities is not, "Who criticizes?" but, "Does anybody stumble?"

We may not be clamorous for our rights if any thing is to be gained by waiving them. All rights are superseded by the high privilege of helping others or saving the soul of a man. We are to lie down not because we are criticized for standing up; but when we perceive that we are really in somebody's way. We are to prostrate ourselves in the dust, if so another may walk over us into the kingdom of God.

Third: The Rule of Service: namely, "Seek ye first the kingdom of God." As Christians we are in covenant with Christ and under bonds to allow no minor considerations to interfere with our complete devotion to him. For "ye are not your own; ye

TO REACH THE CHURCHLESS MILLION

THIS month the Evangelistic Committee of New York City enters upon its fourth summer campaign. At the opening rally on April 21 over five thousand persons crowded the Metropolitan Opera House. During the intervening month, several union meetings were held by the churches in various sections, where teachers are to be located, with a view to stimulating interest in the prospective work.

The greatest strength of the Tent Campaign is that you who conduct it are going to revive in the churches and in each other a new vigor," said Ralph Connor (Dr. C. W. Gordon), author of The Sky Pilot, in his address at the opening rally. "I like to think of the Christian religion as a live thing, of the Christians as live wires, and of the churches as mighty storage batteries where heat and light are stored to be set out. I think Christianity is the biggest thing in the world.

This movement stands for the union of Christian people in Christian service," says George A. Warburton of the Railroad Young Men's Christian Association, "with the churches united for the specific purpose of carrying the Gospel to those who do not ordinarily enter churches." According to Rev. A. F. Schauffler, president of the New York City Mission and Tract Society, five percent of the population of the United States is in New York.

The work begun here goes out in streams of influence throughout the country," said Dr. Schauffler. "An army comes to us from the ends of the earth; many of them will not go to church, the church must go to them. Experience has taught us that thousands will go to the meetings in the tents or open air, especially the children whom we would win from the street and woo them to Christ."

"It is so easy to reach the people," observes Dr. Arthur J. Smith, the superintendent of the Com-

"Here are over one million unchurched Protestants in the city, and as many more from all the corners of the earth without a hope in Christ. The church has a duty to perform toward this great multitude. It has a responsibility for the multitude. The city is full of people with burdens of sadness and sin. It is the business of the churches to find such people. The cry of loneliness and despair going up from our great cities should pierce the hearts of Christians and stir them to activity."

The Committee will erect ten tents; five for English-speaking people, three for Italians, one for Finns and Swedes, and one for Germans. Four open-air centres will be continued, as in previous years, with a multiplied number of meetings for workmen to be held in factories and shops. Children's meetings will be made even more conspicuous a feature than in the past. The tents will open on Sunday evening next, June 21, and a grand mass meeting will mark the beginning of the outdoor services the following Monday. Well-known evangelists will be associated with preachers and laymen in the campaign. These will include Evangelists Sheldon, Smiley, Nardi, Morris, Davidson, and Greenwood, with others who have been previously engaged in the work here and more recently in Philadelphia. Among the new members of the Committee are Bishop Greer, Charles Stelzle, and Rev. Dr. Aked.

The Evangelistic Committee estimates that forty thousand dollars will be required to carry on the campaign from June 21 to September 15, when it will be practically closed for the season.

mittee. "The people love the open air. Some of the greatest meetings of the Christian church were conducted in the open air. Pentecost, when three thousand were converted, was an open-air meeting. The meetings conducted by Philip the Evangelist in Samaria were in the open air. The great sermon of St. Paul was preached on Mars' Hill in the open air. The Lord Jesus Christ himself loved to work in the open air. The Sermon on the Mount was delivered in the open air.

Particular attention is given to industrial training. Each student attends the academic classes half a day, for five days a week, during the school year of ten months. The other half day is devoted to industrial training. Those who show an aptitude for any particular trade are given instruction in that direction. Tailoring, shoemaking, blacksmithing, carpentry, plumbing, mechanics, and other trades are taught. Those not desiring to learn a trade are taught farming and gardening. Girls are given practical instruction in dressmaking, house-keeping, nursing, cooking, and laundry work. At some of the schools blanket weaving, basket and pottery making, working embroidery and drawn work and manufacturing mission furniture are taught.

The matrons experience little trouble with the girls, but it has been found difficult to form the boys into something like a military organization. They are organized into companies, which constitute a battalion, officered by cadet officers. These rank from corporals to captains, and are found to be efficient and trustworthy aids to discipline. In the vacation months many of those in the non-reservation schools are permitted to go home for short visits, but the greater part of the vacation is spent in some way that keeps the students in touch with the teachers. Many of the boys are allowed to hire out for work in the sugar beet fields, in grading work for the railroads, on farms, or at any other work suited to their capacities. The older girls are permitted to seek positions as housemaids, cooks, nurse girls and other domestic capacities.

In many non-reservation schools the outdoor summer camp has become an established vacation feature. Picnics, hunting and fishing expeditions and outdoor sports fill the hours, so that this feature of school life does much to reconcile the children of the plains to the irksome restraints of the classroom and workshop.

The social side is not neglected. The boys are encouraged to organize bands, and every school of importance has its baseball nine and football team. Non-sectarian Sunday Schools impart religious instruction. If there are no churches within reasonable distance, chapel services are conducted regularly; but if there are any churches near, students are required to attend.

It is true that the majority of the Indian youth and maidens leave the schools to don the aboriginal blanket and go back to the ways of their ancestors, and that in many communities, two weeks is the

to the children themselves and discouraging to their teachers; yet it is not strange that the passing generation of redskins make this demand of those who are to succeed them. That they cling to the customs and the manner of life that have always distinguished their race is no more than natural. That they strive to transmit the same customs to their children is inevitable. But, while they may compel the children to abandon the clothing of the whites and to return to the aboriginal blanket, and may even forbid them to display the skill and knowledge acquired in the schools, they can not instil in the hearts of those who have been students the prejudices, superstitions, animosities, and race hatreds that the schools are surely eliminating. Soon the children of to-day will themselves be parents, with children in the government schools. When the next generation of boys and girls go home, they will find no such prejudices as are in evidence to-day. Not until the second or third generation, perhaps, will the seed now being sown in the government Indian schools bear fruit in the development of a new type of American Indian—a really civilized Indian, who may be "good" without being dead. The present educational policy will fit the "wards of the government" to stand alone and to work out their own destinies.

A Truly Great Book

This unsolicited testimonial comes from one who has read Dr. Peters' The Great Hereafter:

"Dear Dr. Klopsch: I did not wish to express an opinion about The Great Hereafter until I read it, and now I am astonished at the amount of labor it must have cost Dr. Peters to collect so many quotations, ancient and modern, and also at the low price; but if it were not for the low price, poor men like myself would never have it to read. The weight of opinion from the thinkers of ancient times who knew nothing of Revelation, goes to prove that God will not mock the hope He giveth.

Military Drill at Santa Fe School

A LEARNED SEÑORITA VISITS US

Veranda of Girls' School, Mexico

Senorita Juana Palacios

In the Beautiful Patio of the School

COMMISSIONED by the Mexican government, through its Department of Public Instruction, to visit universities and schools in the United States and report her impressions, Miss Juana Palacios is now in New York studying schools of all grades, from the kindergarten to the colleges. Her first report has been sent to Mexico, based on her observations at various educational institutions in Pittsburg and in Boston, where she has been for the past eight months.

Since the teaching of religion has been forbidden in government schools in Mexico, the question has been growing more and more pressing as to how far ethical training can be given without religious support; and this young woman has been sent to this country to find out how we accomplish the ethical part of education in our schools, what is the influence of our colleges and schools on moral education, and what they are doing in this direction.

"There are two theories," says Miss Palacios, "as to inculcating moral instruction. The opinion is held very largely that the right environment will result naturally in proper development, and in many schools moral instruction is given indirectly. Others, however, believe that direct teaching, as well as most beautiful and helpful surroundings, are necessary to the development of the various virtues. In many schools, moral training is emphasized only in the lower grades, while in the higher it is inculcated only indirectly.

"It is a philosophical question whether it is possible to divide ethics from religion. Personally I believe that if we do not have a religious basis for our education, it will become strictly utilitarian.

"Conditions in Mexican schools are much the same as here. That is, we have to face the same perplexing problems. Of course, we are much more limited as to financial ability and age. You know you are over one hundred years old, while we are only thirty-five. I am impressed deeply in your great cities where I see so many foreigners who are continually sweeping into this country all those dreadful conditions of dirt and ignorance that are ours by inheritance, and that we are fighting so hard."

Miss Palacios is a modest yet learned and energetic young woman, who has won many honors in her own land. She is now a teacher at the Puebla State Normal Institute for Girls, the only private institution in Mexico whose diplomas are acknowledged by the Mexico City Board of Education.

"The Puebla school is the centre of the missionary spirit in Mexican Methodism," says Miss Palacios. "Our pupils come from at least twelve of the twenty-seven States of our republic, some traveling a distance of nearly a thousand miles to reach us. We have outgrown our present quarters, and land has recently been purchased for new buildings. The aim of our school is to develop Christian character. The majority of our graduates are teaching in Mexico City, Pachuca, Puebla and the towns and villages where our mission is established. As a rule, they help in Sunday School work and church work and are the leaders of Epworth Leagues and Women's Foreign Missionary Society auxiliaries. During the visit of Secretary Root to Puebla, the mayor of the city said to the principal of the Normal Institute, who was one of the reception committee, 'I will tell Secretary Root that your school has been a blessing to the city.'" THE SENTINEL ON THE WALLS*

By United States Senator Albert J. Beveridge

THE "ragged Continentals" who won our independence carried the Bible in their knapsacks. The most impressive picture of the Revolution was Washington on his knees at Valley Forge. His first act when victory came was to give thanks to the Supreme Being. Every session of the convention that framed the Constitution was opened with prayer. And so it was natural that in the very infancy of the Republic, a hundred years ago to-day, the Pennsylvania Bible Society should be founded to give to the poor of every tongue and faith that holy Book, whose words were woven into the very warp and woof of our nationality. It was natural that this organization for the spread of God's word should be formed in the "City of Brotherly Love" and of the Liberty Bell. From that day to the present the Pennsylvania Bible Society has distributed millions of Bibles and Testaments in almost every language spoken on the earth.

Jesus started the mightiest revolution of all times. It has not ended; it never will end—never can end. For it is not enough that nations formally shall adopt the faith of the Crucified One; it is not enough that the world nominally shall become Christian; it will be enough only when every human being in the sanctuary of his soul shall acknowledge and in his daily life shall practise every teaching of the Nazarene.

We say to-day, when some truth in politics is uttered and for a while defeated, that it is vain and that those who fight for it have lost the battle. This short and narrow judgment discourages more men who are fighting for the right than any other thing. We are too apt to say when we do not see the fruits of our work grow and ripen beneath our hands, that our labor is useless.

Let the revolution started by the Carpenter's Son be our reassurance and our inspiration. When Jesus went to the humblest and poorest with his absolute idealism, he made his appeal to those who would accept it most easily—fight for it most unyieldingly. The so-called better classes want conditions to remain as they are; the so-called lower classes dream of brighter days, of higher things, of a sweeter life. They do this because they have none of these things in their own lives.

Speaking to the common man, he spoke in the language of the common man. While his ideals were divine, his ideas had the human touch. This is true of the whole Bible. In all literature its language is the simplest, and of all literature the Bible, merely as a matter of human interest, is the best reading. Merely as an entertaining book of short stories it is the most thrilling and vivid—Maupassant, Poe and Doyle are tame and vapid compared with the Bible authors. Even Milton, Shakespeare and Dante do not approach the Hebrew prophets or the inspired poems of the Holy Book. The world's philosophers are turgid and prolix compared with the profound and lucid statements of the Bible's reasoners. No oratory that ever fell from human lips equals at least two of Paul's addresses; and the sermons of Jesus, in power and clearness, surpass all merely human efforts. "For he spoke as one having authority, and the common people heard him gladly."

Because of its human interests; because it touches every phase of life; because of its divine idealism; because of its call to the broken, forlorn and neglected among men; because of its promise of the certain dawn of a happier life here and of eternal joy hereafter, the Bible captures the common heart. From first to last it is the sentinel on the walls of human hope which, when questioned, "Watchman, what of the night?" makes answer, "Lo! the morn appeareth."

If the Bible were literature only, if its divine element were not considered, if it were merely a human document, it would still be immortal so far as anything human can be, and its permanence and power as literature would be caused by its appeal to and approval of the masses. It is the masses, and they alone, who first discover and finally determine all great and lasting literature. Shakespeare was quoted more among the common people than in the courts. The songs of Burns pealed from the lips of men clad in hodden-gray and glorified the cotter's thatched and humble home, before they were heard by the ears of the high-born or sounded in castle halls. The theme of Wagner's masterpieces were the folk-legends of the German people; and Homer did no more than to put in form the stories of struggle and heroism that had been told for generations by the Grecian mothers to their children, and were the common possession of Hellenic firesides. Lincoln's address at Gettysburg was not noticed at the moment, while Everett's finished and sounding periods were considered the triumph of that occasion. It was the man in the furrow and the street, the man at the anvil and in the mines, the family gathered about the common American fireside, who first realized the greatness of Lincoln's immortal utterance.

And so the Bible is read and quoted by the masses, and thus lives on with growing vigor.

REBURYING A REVOLUTIONARY HERO

The Body of Clinton being Carried into New York City Hall

Major-General Frederick D. Grant Leading the Procession

NEW YORK is often spoken of as a city that is so absorbed in business that its inhabitants are unable to stop for anything else; yet recently in its great commercial and banking session over a hundred thousand people waited patiently to do honor to the remains of General Clinton, the brave Revolutionary soldier. Flags were everywhere at half mast and the sextons of the churches stood ready to toll the bells when the boom of the guns should announce the coming of the cortege. The body was brought from Washington, taken across the river and received by the troops at the Battery.

The parade was not a large one from the point of numbers, but of great interest on account of the prominent people and historic organizations that participated.

George Clinton was a major-general in the Revolutionary Army, and so an officer of the same rank, Major-General Frederick Dent Grant, was chosen to lead the procession. General Grant is the son of the famous Civil War general, and at present is in command of the Department of the East with his headquarters at Governor's Island in New York harbor. He fought over under his command two battalions of regulars.

Clattering behind the General came aids representing all branches of the military service, followed by officers of the New York State Cavalry in their hussar uniforms of sky blue and gold, and wearing air busbies on their heads. There was an interval, and then came the infantry in white and blue, the artillery in red and blue from Forts Wadsworth and Tompkins, soldiers, marines and sailors from the Brooklyn Navy Yard, and three mounted troops of the New York police, who rode just in front of the caisson on which the casket of Clinton had been placed.

A notable guard of honor surrounded the caisson.

It included members of the Society of the Cincinnati, wearing on their breasts the eagle emblem that was so proudly borne on the lapels of the generals who had fought with Washington and Lafayette. Forming an outer line was the Veteran Corps of Artillery of New York, who are all descendants of soldiers who fought in 1812. The members of the corps wear the uniform of the period of the Second War for Independence, and add greatly to the picturesqueness of the procession. The minute guns began to boom from the forts in the harbor, sending the echoes reverberating far over toward the green hills of Staten Island and the Jersey shore. A moment later the bells of old Trinity began to toll, to be followed by the bells of all the other down-town churches. The procession made a detour to pass Fraunce's Tavern, famed in revolutionary history, then it wended its way up Wall Street, passing the spot where Washington was inaugurated first President of the United States. Clinton had stood beside him on that day. A beautiful bronze statue of Washington stands now by the Sub-Treasury steps, and it was an impressive moment when the casket of Clinton passed on beneath its shadow.

Turning into Broadway by Trinity the procession marched northward to the City Hall. The procession passed through what was the most important part of the city in Clinton's day, and it is estimated that along that comparatively short line of march there were gathered over one hundred thousand spectators.

The body was placed in the Governor's Room in New York City Hall until the afternoon, and thousands passed with uncovered heads, gazing reverently at the closed casket. At four the body was taken to the Hudson River and placed on board a torpedo boat destroyer, and with an escort of one or two light craft from the United States Navy, steamed up the river to Kingston. Every city on the banks saluted the destroyer and its burden with booming guns. When it rounded the great curve in the river at West Point, the batteries fired the Vice-Presidential salute. At Kingston the body was removed to the old graveyard by the side of the historic church, where rest the bones of other members of the Clinton family, and of many brave men, soldiers who fought gallantly for their country "in the days that tried men's souls."

ness of any historical ceremonial in which they take part.

Behind the caisson walked a number of the lineal descendants of General Clinton, who had given the necessary permission for the removal of the body; a delegation from the Sons of the American Revolution, Mayor McClellan, city officials, the Holland and St. Nicholas Societies, and others.

As the procession started across Battery Park,

LIFE AND DEATH

An Allegory by Rev. Charles M. Sheldon

THE traveler was weary with the journey and paused a little while by the path to rest. And as she sat there one approached and said, "Thou hast only a little farther to go?"

"Only a little farther," she answered.

"Art thou not weary with the journey?" asked her new companion.

"Yea, I am. But the journey on the whole has been pleasant and I would not have missed it. I have had many friends and much joy, and great interest in doing my Lord's work."

"Where are thy friends now?"

"Some of them have gone on before me. The others have been with me until a moment ago. I can hear their pleasant voices and almost see them yet."

"But now thou art alone. Art thou not afraid for the rest of the way to go alone?"

"Nay, but I am not entirely alone. One is with me still. His name is Jesus Christ, and he has promised never to leave me desolate."

"I know that One," spoke her companion gently. "I went with him over the last of his way, and now I am come to be thy companion also. Shall we walk on together?"

"Dost thou truly know the way?" asked the traveler softly.

"Yea, I have been over it with every mortal since man began to journey over this road. Thou art not afraid?"

"Nay, what should I fear? I have loved my Lord. I have served his cause. He has given unto me eternal life. What should I fear?"

"What, indeed?" said her companion, as the traveler rose and the two proceeded until they came quite suddenly to a glorious gateway, wherein stood a glorious One holding out a welcoming hand.

"This," said her companion, "is one of the Angels of Life. He will usher thee into the presence of God." And as he spoke, he vanished.

"Tell me," asked the traveler as she took the hand of the Angel of Life, "who was that who has just departed?"

"That," said the Angel of Life smiling, "was Death."

"That Death?" she said; "I took him to be my friend."

"And was he not?" said the Angel, smiling again. "Has he not brought you to me, and am I not also your friend?"

"Yea," said the traveler joyfully, as she entered into the glories of Paradise with the Angel of Life, singing, "O Death, where is thy sting? O Grave, where is thy victory? Thanks be unto God, who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ!"

The Attack on Dreyfus

THAT France is still liable to a recrudescence of anti-Semitism is made painfully evident by the recent attempted assassination of Major Alfred Dreyfus. Standing beside the tomb of Zola in the Pantheon, Paris, during a solemn ceremonial and in the presence of the President and other high officials, a fanatical Jew-hater, on the staff of a monarchistic publication, committed the act which struck the republic with terror and indignation.

Gregoire, the would-be assassin, who narrowly escaped being torn to pieces by the enraged spectators, seems to have been a criminal without accomplices. He represents, however, an element which, though small, is still dangerous to the republic—the Anti-Dreyfusards, who were the moving spirits in that bitter conflict which raged in France for nearly ten years, springing out of the original plot against Dreyfus, on account of his race and religion. "I shot not to kill Dreyfus, but Dreyfusism," Gregoire explained after arrest. But there were no plaudits for a deed so vile. This mad effort to fan into new life the expiring embers of anti-Semitism meets with universal condemnation.

This is the second attempted assassination that has sprung out of the famous Dreyfus case. Maitre Labori, the able legal defender of the accused officer, was the first intended victim. He recovered from his stab wound in the back, but his assailant was never found. The collapse of the case against Zola, who was placed on trial for publishing the famous "j'accuse" letter to President Faure, in which he revealed the military intrigue against Dreyfus, and the subsequent complete exposure of the vile plot against Dreyfus, convinced the nation of the terrible injustice of the whole proceeding. Dreyfus was triumphantly vindicated and Zola also. The fame and character of Zola, no longer clouded, shone so clearly that France decided that not only as a writer but as a lover of justice, a social reformer, and a leader in national regeneration, he was entitled to a tomb among the illustrious dead. The calm judgment of the nation can not now be shaken by any insane attempt to revive the old antagonisms.

Congress and Its Work

AMERICA'S first "billion-dollar Congress" has just finished its first session, and yet, it may truthfully be said, it has not been an extravagant legislative body. Our country is growing in population at a tremendous rate, and every year there is a greater expense account for the government to meet for national housekeeping. Congress has to watch carefully or the yearly bills would amount to several billions if one-half the bills for appropriating money were allowed to pass. In the House of Representatives twenty-two thousand bills were introduced; in the Senate seven thousand. These bills were all referred to the consideration of various committees to be reported upon. Of course, the great majority were never allowed to see the light of the legislative day again.

A number of measures of more than transitory interest were passed. In view of the recent financial panic it is well to note what Congress did to prevent a recurrence of such financial depression and disaster. A law was passed whereby banks in periods of financial stringency would be permitted to issue currency to the amount of $500,000,000, depositing sufficient security. This temporary issue is to be so taxed that it will be retired as soon as the financial stringency has disappeared. A national monetary commission was also created to plan a sound governmental monetary system.

A number of laws were passed to protect the life and limbs of workers. It was provided that the government should compensate all of its employees for injuries received in the line of duty. Additional safeguards for passenger ships were provided, and an employers' liability law was passed to take the place of the one declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court of the United States. A law against child labor in the District of Columbia was passed which could be well copied by many of the States in which children now work at too early an age and at too long hours.

For national defense the militia of the States was made an integral part of the army and the pay of officers and men increased. For the navy money was appropriated to construct two battleships a year, and, what will also be of great interest to all patriotic Americans, the desecration and improper use of the flag was forbidden.

Among the laws that will aid peace and public order and better the moral tone of the community were those prohibiting the sending through the mails of anarchistic and seditious literature, intoxicants and cocaine, and all betting within the District of Columbia was forbidden. Among the last laws passed, but not among the least, was the one restoring to our coinage the motto, "In God We Trust," the successful agitation for its restoration being carried on mainly by the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

A Reckless Evangelist

EVANGELIST WILLIAM SUNDAY delivered an address to the Presbyterian ministers at Pittsburgh the other day which, if correctly reported, stamps the speaker as a man who has missed his vocation. The stream of vulgar abuse which flowed from his lips might have passed for wit on the ball field, the circus, or the variety stage, but it was altogether out of place in the pulpit and especially so on the occasion in question. Certainly, the man who could apply to the average preacher such choice terms as "fudge-eating mollicodde," "stiff," "salary quack," "grafter," and "candidate for the funny house," is not one to command or deserve the respect of any American audience of average intelligence. His proper place is as interlocutor in a minstrel show.

People may bear with Mr. Sunday's eccentricities in language, and even with his crazy, chair-smashing theatrical antics; but when he undertakes to criticize and to revile men who are a thousand-fold abler, more respected and incomparably better qualified by nature, training and experience for their work than he can ever hope to be, he simply exposes himself to ridicule. His amazing suggestion to tear down the seminaries as useless and to "stand the professors on their heads in mud puddles" was his wildest recorded flight of oratory, and shows to what extent it is possible for a man to unmask his real character when he "cuts loose," as Mr. Sunday did. It would be a charitable construction to say that his language was that of a man who had temporarily lost his mental equilibrium.

We regret to say that the Christian spirit was conspicuous by its absence throughout the address. Such an incident discredits evangelism and does more harm to the work than Mr. Sunday can ever repair.

Meeting a Great Need

ONE of the results of the hard winter, during which many firms were compelled to shut down or to greatly curtail the number of their employees, is now being seen in the public schools of New York City. Thousands of men have been necessarily idle and their children have been compelled to get along with hardly enough food in a day to make one small meal. The teachers have noticed the listless air of pupils who were formerly bright and energetic, and the gathering pallor upon their faces. Within the last few weeks children have dropped in a faint upon their desks and the anxious teachers began at once to investigate the home conditions of these pupils. In almost every place they heard the same pitiful story of no work for the father or mother, the same story of gnawing hunger. It was found that hundreds of children were compelled to go to their lessons without having tasted a mouthful of food. Energetic measures were at once taken to do all possible to remedy this deplorable state of affairs and an organization was started by philanthropists to give breakfasts to those hungry pupils.

Soon THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S Children's Home at Mont-Lawn will be opened to these hungry little folks of the tenements, and the waifs who possess nothing which can be called home. Never has Mont-Lawn had a greater or more needful work to do than during the coming summer months. To its care will come hundreds of ill-nourished, ill-clad children, starved in body and in soul by the hard experiences of the winter. For the first time many of them will know the comfort of clean clothing and healthful surroundings, and will be supplied thrice a day with proper food, and there will be empty plate when a timid voice asks for more. Every effort will be made by those in charge to select the most needy cases that can be found among the unfortunate families of the great city, and as possible will be done to make them forget for a deliriously happy days the sufferings they have undergone. To these little ones Mont-Lawn means chance for life itself, to grow strong in body and receive from teachers and surroundings the inspiration, the mental stimulus for better things.

A Card of Thanks

To the Editor: The Free Labor Bureau of the Bowery Mission desires to return thanks to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers for their generous cooperation in securing work for the unemployed men of New York City.

Up to date of writing work has been procured for 1,048 men on farms and in other positions suited to their various capabilities; and, with the small exception of eight cases (less than one per cent. of the total number), all have proved themselves earnest and efficient workers, worthy in every way of the assistance rendered them.

Such gratifying results have hitherto been unprecedented in the annals of charitable effort, and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has to congratulate itself on the possession of a list of subscribers whose practical philanthropy has been demonstrated time and again to the world at large, both at home and abroad.

The Free Labor Bureau will continue this service free of charge, either to the employer or to the employee, and hereby invites all who are still in need of helpers to communicate with John C. Earl, Financial Secretary, 54 Bible House, New York City.

Among the Workers

—THE SIXTH CONVENTION of the World's Sunday School Association will be held in Washington in June, 1910.

—THE REV. WM. CARSON, of St. James Congregational Church, Newcastle-on-Tyne, is on a visit to the United States. He is one of the best platform speakers in the north of England.

—MISSIONARY E. A. FERGUSON has just closed a series of meetings in Birmingham, Ala. The crowds were large and altars packed every night; 150 seekers found Christ. The meetings were under the auspices of the City Mission, and many churches co-operated.

—A SERIES of Union meetings has been held in Trinidad, Colo., under the direction of Evangelist Smiley. On the first Sabbath the cheers of the base-ball players in the park mingled with the voices of the people in prayer and song in the big tent. The battle was against Sabbath desecration, the saloon interests and the gambling fraternities. Gambling has been curtailed, and public sentiment for law and order hopefully strengthened. Over two hundred converts have been the fruitage thus far.

England and the Mohmands

ENGLAND, whose ships whiten every sea and whose soldiers camp in every clime, does not always have an easy time in managing her dependencies. It has been only under the severest struggles against internal dissension and outward assault that she has been enabled to maintain the integrity of her empire. She is, at the present time, in the midst of a struggle to pacify the revolt of the tribes on the Indian frontier. The Mohmand tribes are led by Multan, a famous free-bater who was formerly a Sepoy of the Fortieth Phans and is now captaining a band of marauders. The severest fighting which has yet taken place in the Mohmand country occurred on April 24, when General Anderson fought a big engagement at Matta, near Shabkadr. The Mohmands had been daily becoming more aggressive, threatening St. James Willcocks' lines of communication and advancing at several points upon the British troops, who held a line fifteen miles long, from Michni, on the Kabul River, to Abazai, on the Swat River. He, therefore, determined to teach the enemy a lesson, and attacked them in two columns comprising all the available troops. One of these columns was commanded by General Anderson, and consisted of 300 men of the Fifth Fusiliers, 200 men of the Warwickshire Regiment, 250 of the Fifty-third Sikhs, 20 of the Fifty-seventh Rifles, 159 of the Fifty-ninth Rifles, one squadron of the Twenty-first Cavalry, and four guns of the Eightieth Battery. The enemy were encountered near Matta, and their positions were carried by the English whose casualties numbered sixty-two, while the enemy's losses in killed and wounded were estimated at six hundred. The troubles have brought out the loyalty of some of the native subjects; particularly has Subadar Tor Khan of the Khyber Rifles made a fine record. On May 2 he and two others defeated a large body of Afghans who were attacking the block-house of Michni Kandack, west of Lundi Kotal. He had already received the Indian Order of Merit for gallantry in a previous campaign, and this decoration, which is the Indian V. C., was presented to him by the Duke of Connaught at Lundi Kotal on January 13, 1903.

While all of the acts of Great Britain in the subjugation and rule of India can not be justified, the fact remains that in India, as in every other nation mastered by the Britons, there is prosperity and happiness under her administration. Where the English flag goes there go mental enlightenment, increased personal liberty, material progress, domestic contentment, personal integrity and religious happiness. Side by side with the English flag can be found the cross of Jesus Christ. Hence the civilized world will rejoice when England shall have secured peace on her Indian frontier.

I have counsel and strength for war; now on whom dost thou trust, that thou rebellest against me? (Isa. 36:5.)

Artificial Precious Stones

Professor Miethe, of the famous Charlottenburg Technical School, and a member of the Privy Council, has discovered a successful and practical method of making artificial sapphires, rubies and emeralds of any size and shape desired. He has also perfected a process of making a rare gem called Alexandrite. Professor Miethe says that he has been unusually successful with rubies, manufacturing them of various shades, including the valuable pigeon-blood color. He claims that he can produce gems at a very low cost—rubies and sapphires at about $4 per carat, and Alexandrites at $12 a carat. Professor Miethe claims that he will be able to make diamonds soon. Experts are satisfied of the purity of the Miethe gems and of the impossibility of distinguishing them from the natural gems. A Russian noblewoman has already placed an order for a yellow sapphire weighing forty carats.

There are inherent traits that beautify the life, but most of the jewels that adorn Christian character are made in the laboratory of faith, hope and love, and in the workshop of patient, earnest, practical service for others. The new discovery will have to stand the test of time. The chemistry of the years that dissolves most material things, however hard, may turn them to dust, but the jewels of character, made by right thinking and right living, will, under divine grace, grow harder and more beautiful with

Hen Steals Eggs

A correspondent in the daily press gives an account of a hen that pushed eggs with her bill from another nest into her own, and says she even lifted up some of them between her chin and neck and carried them over to her nest, so that they had to put up boards to keep her from stealing from her neighbors.

If the lower animals know what is going on among men, this hen may have learned from people about appropriating the property of others without rendering an equivalent. The fault of the hen was the excessive exercise of a healthy instinct, that of multiplying her species. So most of the vices of men and women are over-ripe virtues. An excess of self-love is selfishness, love without restraint is lust, self-esteem unhindered is egotism and foolish pride, righteous indignation overmuch is malice. The acquisitive instinct in excess is theft. The hen did not know any better than to steal the eggs; but human thieves in overalls or in dress suits know that they are breaking one of the commandments.

Thou shalt not steal. (Matt. 19:18.)

A Girl's Heroism

Joseph Velsor, Samuel Adelman and Abraham Stern left the branch of the Jefferson Bank, at Clinton and East Houston Streets, New York, to go to the main bank at Canal and Forsythe Streets, the other day, carrying $43,000 in four packages, the bulk of it in a black satchel carried by Adelman. Three highwaymen leaped upon them, throwing red pepper in their faces, striking them with black-jacks and stabbing them with knives. In the midst of the scuffle, Eva Javnovitzka, a young Polish girl, seized one of the robbers and prevented the theft, and very likely saved the life of one of the messengers. Through an interpreter she told the following story at the police station:

I saw the man who was arrested throw the pepper in Adelman's face and then he and his two companions commenced to strike and slash all at once at the three men carrying the packages. I ran into the street crying "murder!" and jumped between this man (indicating the prisoner), and Adelman. Then the prisoner reached into his pocket and pulled out a big clasp knife, which he opened with his teeth, and commenced to stab at the man. I clung to his arm and tried to ward off the blows, screaming as loud as I could. All this time one of the other highwaymen was sawing at Adelman's wrist with a knife, while the third one was beating off Velsor and Stern.

The directors of the bank called the young girl into the president's office a day or two afterward, and made her a present of $500 in appreciation of her courage in saving the money and lives of the men.

There is almost no tragedy in life where woman does not come to the front as the symbol of the highest type of physical and moral heroism. The girl took her life in her hands while lazy, cowardly men looked on, until by her screams of "murder" and "help," they were led to come to her rescue and drive the robbers away. There are spiritual enemies waging moral conflicts every day, requiring the strongest courage upon the part of Christian men and women.

Be strong and of good courage, fear not, nor be afraid of them. (Deut. 31:6.)

the years and untarnished by death, they will reflect the light and contribute to the beauty and become a part of the treasure of the heavenly world.

The first row was a sardius, a topaz, and a carbuncle: . . . and the second row, an emerald, a sapphire and a diamond. (Ex. 39:10, 11.)

Senator Gore's Blindness

Senator Gore, from the new State of Oklahoma, is sense blind. He lost the sight of his right eye by being struck by a stone thrown by a playmate. A couple of years later he was hit in the left eye by an arrow, while he and his companions were playing Indian. Since then he has been compelled to depend upon his wife for information as to the news of the world. Recently he was taken to a private hospital in Washington, where an operation will be performed upon his eyes by a noted specialist. It is to be hoped that the operation will be successful, although there is no certainty that this will be the case.

It is not the eye which sees after all, but the brain through the eyes. Senator Gore sees vast worlds of thought and beauty though his eyes are sightless. There are so many persons who are spiritually blind, who do not see scientific or literary or æsthetic truth, who are blind to moral obligations and who do not behold the Cross nor the Christ on the Cross. The spiritually blind fortunately have a Great

E. A. M., Boiling Springs, Pa. Is there any class of people that eat sharks?

Yes; quite a large number of native islanders in the Pacific. It is also stated that sharks are eaten in a few places in the West Indies. We are unable to answer the other question sent. Send it to the Smithsonian Institution, Washington, D. C.

C. S., Hudson, N. Y. When were clergymen first given the title of Reverend?

About the middle of the seventeenth century it was given to all clergymen, though previously in the Roman Catholic Church to clergy of great distinction only.

L. F., South English, Iowa. Was Lazarus put to death the second time he died?

It is stated in McClintock & Strong's Biblical Encyclopedia that the fame which Christ received from raising Lazarus from the dead, of which the presence of Lazarus was the living proof, induced the Sanhedrin to plan to remove Lazarus at the same time that Jesus was put to death (See John 12: 10). It is thought, however, that having crucified Jesus, they left Lazarus in peace. According to one tradition, he was thirty years old when he was brought back to life and he lived thirty years thereafter.

Reader, Castleton, Vt. When and under what circumstances did Henry Hudson, the discoverer of the Hudson River, meet his death?

In 1610 he was exploring Hudson's Bay. He intended to pass the winter there, but finding his crew mutinous he started to sail for England. He had not proceeded far when he was seized by the mutineers and with eight others, including his son, was placed in an open boat and set adrift. He was never heard of again.

R. J., Atlantic Highlands, N. J. What is the correct pronunciation of Martinique?

It is pronounced Mar-ti-neek.

What is the smallest country in Europe under monarchical rule?

Monaco on the Mediterranean, nine miles from Nice. It has been under the rule of a Genoese family since 968. Its area is eight square miles, it has a population of 12,000, and has its own postage stamps and coinage.

Southern Reader. When was the cultivation of rice introduced into this country?

It was brought from the island of Madagascar in 1695, and its cultivation soon became popular.

L. W. D., Waterbury, Vt. 1. Is it true that deer shed their horns every year? 2. Where do the thousands of angleworms come from after a heavy rain? 3. What can one do to earn a living in the country districts of Bermuda?

1. This question was once submitted by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to Ernest Thompson Seton, the famous zoologist. He replied that deer shed their horns every season, and that in his various journeys in the wilds he had seen hundreds of antlers that had been dropped. 2. The worms come up from the ground to get the moisture. As the ground becomes drier they go down in order to find damp earth. 3. Fruit raising and agriculture are the principal occupations.

Although the Motto Restoration Bill has passed both houses and received the Presidential signature, petitions in its support continue to come in from different parts of the country. One of these protests received from a subscriber is from Austin, Tex., and contains 415 signatures of residents of that city. Many of our Texas friends no doubt have written to their Senators and Representatives while the struggle was pending and have thus contributed to the successful result.

A. P., Fisher, N. Y. I told a person I did not do a certain thing which I did do. It was nothing that harmed them in any way. Did I tell a lie? I did not want to tell a lie.

It was an untruth, but an untruth without premeditation. Still, your duty in such a case is to frankly tell the person interested that you were wrong in your statement and wish to set it right.

J. M. B., Fort Worth, Tex. 1. Who was the founder of the episcopacy? 2. When and by whom was sprinkling, for immersion, established?

1. Some Episcopalians refer to the ordination by Paul as mentioned in the Acts and the Epistles (and especially to Timothy and Titus) as the foundation of the episcopacy. Other authorities say that the earliest constitution of the Christian church was derived from the Jewish synagogue. Read Coleman's Apostolical and Primitive Church. Prof. Hitchcock writes that use the title. It did not come into general use until after the fifth century. 2. The Wandering Jew is a legendary story, which was brought to Europe from the East after the First Crusade under Peter the Hermit. The wanderer has been variously named: Joseph Cartaphilus, who was said to have struck Christ and urged him to "move faster" on the road to Calvary; and Ahasuerus, Salathiel, etc. Several books have been written on the subject. 3. The Catholics always sprinkle in baptism.

N. R. R., Milford, Texas. Who was the author of "Saved by Grace"? In one of your March numbers, you gave the credit to Miss Fanny Crosby as being the author, and in the May 13 number you give the credit to Mr. Stebbins. Which is correct?

Both are correct. Fanny Crosby wrote the words in 1892 and they were set to music by Mr. Stebbins in 1894. It is quite common under such circumstances to refer to either as the author, the truth), later they were known as Friends. Justice Bennet of Derby England, called them Quakers in 1650 from the fact that George Fox had told the people to quake at the word of the Lord.

Jennie M., Rahway, N. J. Are the printed stories of the public doings of the English suffragettes true? I think it an awful thing for women to electioneer like men.

According to the English press, their course has been somewhat sensational, but the leaders considered it necessary to do something to attract attention to their cause. The Manchester Guardian says they (1) tried to hold up King Edward on his way to open Parliament; (2) stormed the residences of cabinet ministers, to obtain a hearing; (3) collided with the police while trying to force their way into Parliament, and fifty-nine of them were arrested; (4) "charged" the residence of the Prime Minister, 300 strong, and forced their way into the cabinet room. Very dreadful, we suppose, from the British masculine point of view, but quite justifiable from the feminine. At all events, no one would condemn the ladies before hearing their side of the case. They surely deserve a hearing.

B. M., Chillicothe, O. What is the strength of the reorganized army of China?

Captain M. Kincaid Smith, a British official who lately visited China, gives its military strength at 1,500,000 on a war footing and 432,000 on a peace footing. He estimates the really available force, however, at about 75,000, and considers that figure a rather doubtful maximum.

Student, Washington, D. C. How long has opium been used in China?

Opium has been consumed by the Chinese for the last 500 years. It was certainly known to them for at least 300 years before the Western nations arrived in that country. It was declared illegal by the Chinese government in 1796 and this led to the war of 1839, when the foreign powers compelled China to permit the importation of opium.

A Band of Persian Entertainers

PERSIA is one of the few nations of Bible times which have had an uninterrupted existence to the present day. While having a wonderful ancient literature, art, music and letters have for centuries made no great advance. Above is a recent photograph of a Persian band of professional entertainers. The instruments, it will be noted, are exceedingly primitive, and are doubtless the same in form and construction as those used by the ancestors of these men generations ago. The clothing and weapons show a strange mingling of the ancient and modern.

the episcopal system was not of apostolic origin, but a later ecclesiastical development. The earliest church writer to refer to it was Clement of Rome (about A.D. 100), whose epistles employ the words presbyter and bishop interchangeably. 2. The Great Hereafter

From THEODORE ROOSEVELT,

President of the United States:

"I shall read THE GREAT HEREAFTER with deep interest. I have looked over it enough to be able to tell something of its value, and it has to me the added value of knowing the life, and the strife after right, of the man who wrote it."

I believe the saints will differ in Heaven in the glorified bodies which their souls will wear, and that the characters which they make on earth will determine their eternal bodies.

REV. MADISON C. PETERS, D.D.

From GROVER CLEVELAND,

Ex-President of the United States:

"THE GREAT HEREAFTER will not only have a place in my library, but will often be found in my hands, as a source of reinforcement of faith, exceedingly opportune in these days of loose thinking and careless teaching."

Heard not by mortal ears,
Thither their echoes roll
Into the answering soul;
Oh! 'tis a Voiceful Land!*

Glimpses of the Coming World

Did He See Heaven?

It is not often that the daily press contains sensational articles about the life hereafter, but a few days ago the newspapers related at considerable length the story of a priest, apparently in good health, who had a vision of heaven, and who died suddenly the following day.

The Other Side of Death

Such visions are not so rare as the prominence given to their occurrence would lead one to suppose. If all the exalted thoughts, the beatific insights and the death-bed ecstasies could be gathered together, they would fill, not merely whole volumes but entire libraries. There has been needed a book that should clarify the misty and often unhealthy notions that largely prevail in regard to the state of the righteous dead, a book not made up of the crude ideas of ignorant and superstitious people, but of the views of scholars and of the highest type of Christians.

The Great Hereafter

Such a book has indeed made its appearance. It is entitled The Great Hereafter, and is from the pen of the Rev. Madison C. Peters, D.D., the late pastor of the Bloomingdale Church, in New York City. Whether Dr. Peters has looked into heaven with his own eyes we know not, but in this substantial and handsome volume he sees, and makes his readers see, the beauties of the Cloudless Land.

It was a stupendous undertaking to bring together in one volume the views of more than four hundred of the world's greatest thinkers upon the questions of the immortality of the soul and the Great Hereafter, but Dr. Peters possesses unusual qualifications for the task. A ripe scholar, a sympathetic pastor and preacher, and an author of other works akin to the matter of this book, he has brought to bear upon his subject rare powers of heart and mind.

Is Heaven a City or a Country?

Some people picture Heaven as a beautiful country, with rolling hills, winding streams, orchards of luscious fruit and meadows of living green. With others, it is a city of everlasting foundations, jasper walls and golden streets. The author of The Great Hereafter shows how these opposite conceptions may be harmonized.

The Occupations of the Blessed

"Is there any one who can carry his present employment into Heaven?" inquires a writer in a recent periodical. "The lawyer cannot, there will be no quarrels; the doctor cannot, there will be no sick; the preacher cannot, there will be no sinners." Dr. Peters explodes some

Our Friends in the Sorrowless Land

It is a book for everybody because everybody is interested in the themes discussed. Such questions as these continually rise to our lips: Where are our dead? Shall we know our friends in heaven? What is the occupation of our loved ones in the life beyond? Do they know what is going on in this world? Can they communicate with us? Is Spiritualism a safe guide? What is the state of the soul between death and the resurrection? Are there degrees of happiness and glory in heaven? What is the nature of the resurrection body? What do the dying often see?

The Testimony of Great Men

These fascinating but difficult questions the author has undertaken to answer. He has ransacked the great libraries and questioned the master spirits of humanity, until he has knit together in one compact volume the best the world has to say upon these great themes. From Socrates to Spurgeon, from pagan philosophers to Christian preachers, the long procession moves on, each distinguished witness asserting his belief in the Great Beyond.

Shall We Wear Mourning?

The chapter on funeral customs is replete with interest. It is a collection of curious facts in connection with the burial of friends. Many good Christian people will be surprised to learn that the use of crape is a heathen custom, and not in harmony with the belief in the believers' victory over death. The author shows the marked changes which Christianity has made in funeral rites, but there are yet some needed reforms. The reader is exhorted to defy several silly social customs.

An Immortal Book

In an age of such an enormous output by the press, when the most popular book of a year is soon buried under fresher covers, it is hardly safe to predict the immortality of any work. But it is surely not too much to say, that as long as there are human griefs to be assuaged and human longings for another life, this noble book, The Great Hereafter, must find a place.

It is published by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, is finely illustrated, and is bound in several attractive styles.

THE GREAT HEREAFTER is a Magnificent Volume, consisting of 600 Large Pages, measuring 8 by 10 Inches, Beautifully Printed on very Heavy Paper, with Wide Margins, from Very Large, Clear Type, and exquisitely bound in Cloth, Half-Leather, and Full Morocco. The Volume Weights Six Pounds, and Charges are Prepaid by us in Every Instance: That is, we Send it to You Free of Expense on Receipt of Price.

PAUL'S TEMPERANCE TEACHINGS

LET us study not one temperance teaching of Paul, but his whole message on this subject, and let us give it not one hour only on temperance Sunday, but spread it through the week in home readings, prayer meeting talks and sermons, not forgetting the young people's meeting, the missionary society and the men's league.

1. Paul teaches not only temperance, that is, moderation, in good things (Phil. 4: 5), but total abstinence "from every form of evil" (I. Thess. 5: 22). We must therefore abstain not only from drinking but also from licensing intoxicating beverages (II. Cor. 6: 7). "Touch not the unclean thing." Paul bids us "lay aside" not only what we know to be "sin," but everything that would be even a "weight" to hinder our progress in character or influence (Heb. 12: 1).

What two evils are most closely allied to intoxicating beverages? Impurity and gambling. We do not speak of "moderation" in these evils. No more should we of the "temperate" us of poisonous and intoxicating beverages. The divine commandment, "Abstain from every form of evil," requires us to have no part in either the drink habit or the drink traffic. He who sells intoxicants can do so only by permission of the official who grants his license, and the official can act only by authority of the voters. Will any one deny that the drink system as it exists to-day is a "form of evil"? Whatever one might say about a single glass, is not the liquor traffic as a whole, which Gladstone truly characterized as more harmful than war, pestilence, or famine, a "form or evil"? We can not then escape the application to it of Neal Dow's unanswerable syllogism: "No man has a right to do anything which, if the whole world followed his example, as some are sure to do, would produce more harm than good." The churches generally treat the sale of intoxicating beverages as a "sin" by debarring liquor sellers from church membership. If you deny that drinking or voting for the sale of intoxicants is a sin, will you deny that participation in the drink system is a "weight" that will hinder your own progress in character or usefulness? We encounter Paul's law of abstinence again as he bids us "lay aside every weight" that like a long, entangled garment would hinder our progress in the race set before us.

Reasons for Total Abstinence

1. Paul's words about "weights" and "stumbling," both references to the famous Greek races, bring us to the first reason for total abstinence, namely, that it is the best plan for the body (I. Cor. 9: 24-27). "Every man that striveth for the mastery is temperate in all things." Appetite and passion must be mastered in order to gain the victory. "I keep my body under," said Paul. A Sunday School boy got the idea when he quoted the passage, "I keep my soul on top." For many centuries the Greeks celebrated national games at regular intervals, the Olympic and Isthmian games being the most important. The latter, to which Paul especially refers, were held on the Isthmus of Corinth, in honor of Neptune, and occurred every other year. The Olympic games were celebrated only once in four years, and were looked forward to as the greatest of national events, even war being suspended throughout Greece during the days occupied by the festival. The exercises on these great occasions consisted of contests in running, wrestling, boxing, throwing quoits and javelins, and leaping. In later times, foot races in heavy armor, races on horseback and in four-horse chariots were added. The Greek games were very different from the Roman gladiatorial shows, for no weapons were allowed to be used. The honors paid the victors at these games were so great that those who won at Olympia were considered among the distinguished men of their States. They received no prize in money, only crowns of olive leaves, which the judge of the contests placed on the winners' heads, and which was an honor never forgotten by their fellow citizens. Their praises were sung by the national poets, and statues of them were erected, to commemorate their names during coming ages. The contestants spent ten months in preparing for these great contests, undergoing a system of hard and tedious training, and abstaining from every kind of food or drink or pleasure which would weaken their bodies, very much as race horses and boat crews are trained now. They were allowed only the plainest food, and in quantities only sufficient to sustain strength without making superfluous flesh. The purpose was to have the body weigh as little as possible, and yet have the muscles full and hard. In order to make their limbs supple, they oiled their bodies every day. When the time came for the boxing matches and races, they laid aside every weight, wearing scarcely any clothes during the contest, in order to be free to do their very best. The foot race was from one end of the arena to the other, where stood the goal, and the judge beside it with the olive crown. After winning the wreath, the victor was received by his friends, and escorted with great pomp to his city, where they had prepared to receive him with a feast.

Athletics have always been a powerful argument for abstinence, and the wonder is how young men ambitious for physical excellence have so generally disregarded it. In the last half century the physical argument for abstinence has been greatly reinforced by the facts of life insurance. Here is a table made by the president of a life insurance company:

EXPECTANCY OF LIFE IN YEARS

Age	Abstainers	Moderate Drinkers	Lives Shortened
20	44.2	15.6	28.6
30	36.5	13	23.5
40	28.8	11.6	17.2
50	21.2	10.8	10.4
60	15.3	8.9	6.4

Liquor dealers, in their desperate effort to stay the "reform wave," are publishing alleged statistics of medical societies that assume to show that total abstainers die faster than hard drinkers, while moderate drinkers live longest of all. There are several of these fakes that are going the round. The conclusive answer can always be found in the nearest insurance office. The actuary's statistics mean profit or loss, and are based not on sentimental but on business reasons. In British companies of fifty years' experience, the abstainer get twenty to thirty per cent. more in rebates, on the average, than the moderate drinker.

2. Total abstinence is best for the mind (I. Thess. 5: 1-10). We are reminded that we are watchmen on guard and must be sober to fulfill our trust. The head is the watch tower of life and its watchman, the brain, must not be drugged. The great fault of alcohol is that it goes straight to the brain and thickens it as it does similar matter in an egg. Shakespeare exclaims, "Oh that men should put an enemy in their mouths to steal away their brains!"

The Effect of Alcohol

The first effect of alcohol is to flush the brain with extra alcoholized blood, and words come for a while more swiftly, and so some have thought to find inspiration for poetry and prose in wine. But the leading writers of to-day, responding to a circular letter of inquiry, declared they had learned better than to expect inspiration from such a source. A young man of fine family, with splendid gifts, was going down fast through strong drink. His friends had pleaded with him, but he had taken their warnings as an insult. One of them, who was a court stenographer, was sitting in a restaurant one evening, when the young man in question came in with a companion, took the table next to him, sitting down with his back to him, and not seeing him. He was just drunk enough to be talkative about his private affairs, and on the impulse of the moment the stenographer pulled out his notebook and took a full shorthand report of every word he said. It included a number of highly candid details of his daily life. When he was sober he would as soon have thought of putting his hand in the fire as of speaking about them to a casual acquaintance. The next morning the stenographer copied the whole thing neatly, and sent it around to his office. In less than ten minutes he came tearing in, exclaiming, "What is this, anyhow?" "It's a stenographic report of your monologue at the restaurant last evening," his friend replied, and gave him a brief explanation. "Did I really talk like that?" he asked faintly. "I assure you it is an absolutely verbatim report," was the reply. He turned pale and walked out. He never drank another drop.

It was probably the false idea of mental inspiration by drink that Paul sought to correct in the words of the Golden Text, "Be not drunk with wine, wherein is excess, but be filled with the Spirit." Spinoza was called a "God-intoxicated man." The apostles were such men in a deeper sense on the Day of Pentecost, when they were thought to be full of new wine. It was not spirituous but spiritual stimulation that they had received.

Best for Manners and Morals

3. Abstinence is best for manners and morals (Rom. 13: 8-14). The writer once said to a church member, "You seem more interested in Sabbath observance than in temperance." "Oh, yes," he replied, "because the Sabbath is in the Commandments." I answered, "You put up Paul's summary of the whole second table, 'Love worketh no ill to his neighbor,' as a sign over the door of a saloon, and you will suddenly discover that the saloon is under the ban not of one commandment but of all. Ex-Senator Carmack, of Tennessee, says bravely and truly, 'The saloon is an institution for developing the beast in man.'"

Abstinence is best not only for the individual but especially for the family, the city, the nation and the world. That alcohol is a deadly foe to the nation as well as the individual is strikingly shown by the startling picture herewith by a French artist, E. Legrain, entitled "Drink." It reminds us that the nation that drinks the most wine per capita, and the purest wine, right out of its own vineyards, is not thereby prevented from drinking the largest amount per capita of distilled liquors, including especially the worst of them all, absinthe, to which more than to anything else the learned patriots of France attribute the fact that there are more deaths than births. To cure this great evil France has inaugurated one of the best means of promoting temperance, the municipal poster signed by mayor and board of health, which Great Britain has copied.

IN THE BUDDING SPRINGTIME

Heroism in Daily Life

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

For the Housekeeper

A SPLENDID act of heroism in the presence of a great danger, as when firemen rescue women and children from a burning building, or a coast guard goes out in the face of a tempest to the relief of a ship in peril, thrills us with admiration. Apart from value to science in Arctic explorations, for example, they are worth what they cost in suffering as well as in money, because they show us how much brave men will undergo for a mere idea. But all about us, in every home, by every fireside, there are people living heroic lives, and there is scarcely a wife and mother among the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD who has not more than once displayed qualities that are heroic.

Think of the fortitude needed to live as some women do on a lonely ranch remote from neighbors. Think of the home missionaries and their wives, men and women deliberately sacrificing ease and pleasure, living away from society, away from kindred, on narrow means, enduring all sorts of hardships without a murmur, for the sake of Christ and the church. Yet we need not go so far in our investigation for heroism as to the missionaries and their homes. Faint justice is done to the ordinary husband and father who toils hard from youth to age, who asks little for himself and counts no cost too much when caring for his dear ones. Young people seldom feel the gratitude they ought to their fathers and mothers for the efforts the latter make to bring them up well and give them a start in life superior to their own. Youth is at once too self-centred and too inexperienced to estimate at the right worth the self-denial and the brave struggle made by parents who belong to the great majority, and never drive within hailing distance of anything like wealth. It is from the ranks of the working people, of small farmers, small store-keepers, clerks and artisans, employees in mills and factories, from the rank and file of the commonwealth that our schools are filled and our colleges are receiving supplies. The young son and daughter have everything they need, if not everything they want, while the father and mother go without, wear old clothing, never think of outings or pleasures and are more than contented if they can make ends meet at the close of a year.

During the time that a mother is raising her family, she has so many compensating joys that she makes light of what to others might seem hard. Wakeful and anxious nights are not subjects of complaint with her, and if the children are well and the house is comfortable, she is satisfied and asks nothing more.

In the biography of Mrs. Oliphant there is a touching passage written during her widowhood. She had been upstairs to tuck in her little ones, rosy and dimpled in their childish sleep, her husband had been summoned away for a little while on a business errand and she was sitting with her needlework beside the lamp. Was there room for heroism in such a life? Read a little farther and find how illness and death came, and how the mother was left desolate, her husband dying in a foreign land, and how she struggled to bring her children up, heroic to the very end of her life.

Anthony Trollope in his most interesting reminiscences tells of his father incapacitated, while his mother in middle life assumed all the family burdens, writing one story after another while she must have had a breaking heart. Once while she was writing an exciting novel, three of her family were literally dying, and the only means of procuring them comfort and aid was the mother's pen.

A woman delicately reared, knowing nothing but luxury in childhood and girlhood, married, had a large family and finally went to live in Florida. Without means to pay for it had it been available, she taught her children spelling, arithmetic and geography, Latin and French with books propped up beside her ironing board; she started a neighborhood club and a neighborhood prayer meeting that transformed the little settlement, and she never once dreamed that she was a heroine.

Yes, friends, there is heroism in daily life. Perhaps some of you are written as heroes and heroines on the page of the Recording Angel.

HER ONLY WEALTH

She has lived her life in the mountain land, the moorland bleak and the lonely dell;
She has tended her flock with a kindly hand, the sheep and the lambskins know her well.
They go to the pasture at early morn, at eve they come to the sheltering fold;
And she who loves them is not forlorn, she fears not hunger, or storm, or cold.

THE BABY'S NAME

By CARRIE L. POST

This tender little poem, springing from the depths of a mother's heart, is sent to us by one of our readers.

WE called her by pet names, the sweetest we could say,
Imprinting them with kisses day by day
On head and cheek, on lips and dimpled chin,
Trying by all kind ways our baby's love to win.
She was mama's "Precious Baby," very near her heart,
Of her very being a mysterious part.
She was papa's "Winsome Dollie" darling one,
Waking his paternal love when her life begun.

She was auntie's "Honey-bee," dumpling good and sweet Enough to hug and kiss, tempting her to eat;
Grandpa loved the baby pulling silver hair,
When at eventide he gave her tenderest care;
Grandma called her "Gentle Dove" and "Pretty Bird,"
And when the deepest depths of love were stirred
She called the baby "Breath of Heaven Sweet,"
And feared lest thorns might pierce her tender feet.

Our Saviour came and softly whispered a "new name"
Which none now know, save he who gave the same.
To her 'twas given, our precious baby dear,
And now to her pure soul no taint of earth comes near.
Grim death came not alone to desolate our home;
We felt the presence of the Shining One;
He gave our babe safe escort to the shore
That borders the fair world where sickness is no more.

I WONDER whether the housekeepers who read the family page will not be pleased with two or three excellent recipes that come from an old family cook book and that have been tried and found excellent in a Kentucky home. Here they are:

SALT RISING BREAD.—Early in the morning put into a stone "crock" half a tablespoon of salt and half a tablespoon of sugar and a heaping cup of corn meal. Pour into this two cups of boiling milk or water. Beat well and when smooth add two cups of cold milk or water. Stir enough flour to make a stiff batter. Beat it till smooth and then set the "crock" in a deep pan of hot water, just a little too hot to bear your hand in. Keep the water hot and whenever the water bubbles beat it down. In about five hours the batter will be ready to make into loaves. It will look like foam when it is light enough. Work in sufficient flour to make smooth dough. Mould into loaves and brush the tops with milk or butter. Cover the pans with caps of paper or inverted pans and put them in a very warm place to rise again. The very minute that the loaves look about twice the size that they did when set for the last rising, then is the time to bake them in a rather moderately hot oven. Some people make this bread at night, but as it takes so much watching, it is best to make it in the day time.

BATTER CAKES.—One quart of sifted flour, one and a half heaping teaspoon of baking powder, one heaping tablespoon of sugar, three eggs, beaten separately, one pint of milk and a half cup of cream, a handful of cooked rice or hominy, and a half cup of corn meal sifted. If too stiff add water to make a rather thick batter. Bake on a hot griddle and serve all during the breakfast on hot plates.

QUICK SPONGE CAKE.—Three eggs beaten separately, one cup of sugar, one cup of flour, one-third of a cup of boiling water added last thing. Flavor with vanilla. Beat in till well dissolved one and a half teaspoons of baking powder.

SAVIN JACK.—One can of green peas, two cups of water, one-half cup of rice. When these are done add one-half cup of sweet milk and one tablespoon of butter, a heaping teaspoon of sugar, a dash of red pepper or pepper sauce. Serve with croutons.

Except for Colds

In a friend's letter occurs the sentence, "We are all well, except for colds." Apparently it is taken for granted that colds are in the order of nature, and that nobody can escape their baleful influence. Colds, on the contrary, are intrusions on the order of nature. It is a pity that they are not regarded as miserable interlopers who have not the slightest right to interfere with robust health. Before we were so well taught as we are now, we fancied that colds came of themselves, or were due to draughts, or getting the feet wet, or to any one of a dozen different varieties of heedlessness. Children were bundled up when they went to school, windows were scrupulously equipped with weather strips, and apertures filled with cotton, that colds might be prevented.

To-day hundreds of little girls go to school with bare heads through rain and sleet and snow, and are none the worse. Everybody who has the modern hygienic notion of the value of fresh air sleeps with windows open at night, and is much more careful to have a well-ventilated house than an over-heated one. We have learned that colds are epidemic, and that a high state of physical health is an effectual bar to the entrance of evil germs. We sometimes forget that colds arise from indigestion, and that prudence in diet and avoidance of over-eating will effectually dispute their advance. Try to get through the stormy season without a single cold.

"I AM goin' to divvy up, Bobby—give 'em some of my things, you know," Margaret continued. "Then when they go back, mother's goin' with 'em and find a better place for 'em to live in."

"Oh, then they are goin' back—eh?"

Margaret flushed a little and threw a questioning look into Bobby's face. There seemed to be a laugh in Bobby's voice, though there was none on his lips.

"Yes," she nodded hurriedly. "You see, mother thinks it's best. She says that they hadn't ought to be here now—with me; that it's my form'tive period, and that everything about me ought to be just right so as to form me right. See?"

"Yes, I see," said Bobby, so crossly that Margaret opened her eyes in wonder.

"Why, Bobby, you don't care 'cause they're goin' away, do you?"

"Don't I?" he growled. "Humph! I s'pose 'twill be me next that'll be sent off."

"You? Why, you live here!" "Well, I say 'ain't an' 'bully,' don't I?" he retorted aggressively.

Margaret stepped back. Her face changed.

"Why—so—you—do!" she breathed, "And I never once thought of it."

Bobby said nothing. He was standing on one foot, digging the toe of the other into the graveled driveway. For a time Margaret regarded him with troubled eyes; then she sighed:

"Well, anyhow, you don't live here all the time, right in the house, same's Patty and the rest would if they stayed. I—I don't want to give you up, Bobby."

Bobby flushed red under the tan. His eyes sparkled with pleasure—but his chin went up, and his hands executed the careless flourish that a boy of fourteen is apt to use when he wishes to hide the fact that his heart is touched.

"Don't trouble yerself," he shrugged airily. "It don't make a mite o' difference ter me, ye know. There's plenty I can be with." And he turned and hurried up the road with long strides, sending back over his shoulder a particularly joyous whistle—a whistle that broke and wheezed into silence, however, the minute that the woods at the turn of the road were reached.

"I don't care," he blustered, glaring at the chipmunk that eyed him from the top rail of the fence. "Bully—gee—ain't—hain't—bang-up! There!" Then, having demonstrated his right to whatever vocabulary he chose to employ, he went home to the little red farmhouse on the hill and spent an hour hunting for a certain book of his mother's in the attic. When he had found it he spent another hour poring over its contents. The book was old and yellow and dog-eared, and bore on the faded pasteboard cover the words: "A Work on English Grammar and Composition."

A New Serial Written for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

By MRS. ELEANOR H. PORTER

Author of "Into Still Waters," etc.

CHAPTER VIII

TOM, Peter, Mary, Patty and the twins stayed at Five Oaks until the first of September; then, plump, brown and happy, they returned to New York. With them went several articles of use and beauty which had hitherto belonged at Five Oaks. Mrs. Kendall, greatly relieved at Margaret's somewhat surprising willingness to let the visitors go, had was a "Christmas present fur Mis' Whalen."

For a moment Mrs. Kendall had felt tempted to remonstrate, and to ask Patty if she realized just how a green satin-damask Turkish chair would look in Mrs. Whalen's basement kitchen; but after one glance at Patty's radiant face, she changed her mind, and merely said:

"Very well, dear. It shall be sent to Mrs. Whalen the day you go."

"'Mag of the Alley' had come back!"

finally consented to Margaret's proposition that the children be allowed to select something they specially liked to take back with them. In giving this consent, Mrs. Kendall had made only such reservation as would insure that certain valuable (and not easily duplicated) treasures of her own should remain undisturbed.

She smiled afterward at her fears. Tom selected an old bugle from the attic, and Peter a scabbard that had lost its sword. Mary chose a string of blue beads that Margaret sometimes wore, and Clarabella a pink sash that she found in a trunk. Patty, before telling her choice, asked timidly what would happen if 'twas "too big ter be tooked in yer hands." Upon being assured that it would be sent if it could not be carried, she unhesitatingly chose the biggest easy-chair the house afforded, with the announcement that it Arabella only, of all the six, delayed her choice until the final minute. Even on that last morning she was hesitating between a marble statuette and a harmonica. In the end she took neither, for she had spied a huge chocolate-frosted cake that the cook had just made; and it was that cake which finally went to the station carefully borne in Arabella's arms.

Mrs. Kendall herself went to New York with the children, taking Margaret with her. In the Grand Central Station she shuddered a little as she passed a certain seat. Involuntarily she reached for her daughter's hand.

"And was it here that I stayed and stayed that day long ago when you got hurt and didn't come?" asked Margaret.

"Yes, dear—right here."

"Seems 'most as if I remember," murmured the little girl, her eyes fixed on one of the great doors across the room. "I stayed and stayed, and you never came at all. And by and by went out there to look for you, and walked and walked and walked. An I was so tired and hungry!"

"Yes, yes, dear, I know," faltered Mrs. Kendall, tightening her clasp on the small fingers. But we won't think of all that now, dear. It is past and gone. Come, we're going to take Patty and the others home, you know; then to-morrow we are going to see if we can't find a new home for them."

"Divvy up!" cried Margaret, brightening. "We're goin' to divvy up!"

"Yes, dear."

"Oh!" breathed Margaret ecstatically. "I like to divvy up!" And the mother smiled content, for the last trace of gloomy brooding had fled from her daughter's face and left it glowing with the joy of a care-free child.

Not two hours later a certain alley in the great city was thrown into wild confusion. Out of every window leaned disheveled heads, and in every doorway stood a peering, questioning throng. Down by the Whalens' basement door, the crowd was almost impassable; and every inch of space in the windows opposite was filled with gesticulating men, women and children.

"Mag of the Alley" had come back. And, as if that were not enough excitement for once, with her had come Tom, Mary, Peter, Patty and the twins, to say nothing of the beautiful lady with the golden hair, and the white wings on her hat.

"An' she's all dressed up fit ter kill—Maggie is," Katy Goldburg was calling excitedly over her shoulder. Katy and Tony Valerio had the advantage over the others, for they were down on their knees before the Whalens' window on a level with the sidewalk. The room inside was almost in darkness, to be sure, for the crowd outside had obscured what little daylight there was left, and there was only the sputtering kerosene lamp on the table for illumination. Even this, however, sufficed to show Katy and Tony wonders that unloosed their tongues and set them to giving copious reports.

"She's got a white dress on, an' a hat with posies, an' shoes an' stockings," enumerated Katy.

"An' de lady's got diamonds on her fingers," shouted Tony. "I seen 'em when she took off her mittens."

"Pooh! them's gloves," scoffed Katy. "Ye don't know what yer talkin' 'bout, Tony Valerio."

Tony did not seem to hear. His eyes were glued to the window.

"An' de Whalen kids is all dressed up, too," he shouted. "An' say, dey've brought home stuff an' is showin' 'em. Aw! look at that sw-word!"

"An' thar's cake," gurgled Katy. "Tony, they's eatin' choc'late cake. Say, I am a-goin' in!"

Persecution in the Philippines

HOW eagerly the mission boat, El Heraldo Cristiano, is waited for, month by month, by the many Christians who are looking forward to a visit from their missionaries! Some high weeks ago we arrived in this village where there were six hundred native Christians. There have been bus hours of Bible study, for the instruction of the converts is our special work here.

The converts are eagerly taking the opportunity. Early and late they study God's word in their own homes, in the hours which they can take from their daily toil.

These happier days that have come to the Philippines, Christian parents work for their children with the ambition and sense of duty toward them. Their children have opportunities for education which did not exist in the old days of Romish rule. But while this village has its missionaries here, other places just as needy are waiting a visit.

One of our native Christians, who we desirous to go to Cebu on business, tried to get passage on one of the small native boats belonging to a Romanist neighbor, but he was refused. The boat, after a dozen hours' journey, for some unexpected reason began to leak, and before they could get it to shore it nearly went to pieces. For the people who were halting between two opinions, this incident was quite significant, as they judge by it that trouble overtakes those who oppose their Protestant neighbors.

The bright-faced young evangelist whose portrait we send you, is perhaps the most pressing of all in asking for his district to be visited. People are waiting baptism, marriage, and spiritual instruction. The native worker has himself pressed on bravely. He has been stoned, beaten, and imprisoned for the Gospel's sake, yet he continues with very much the spirit and look of a victor. Some months ago he was thrown into a village prison for having preached the Gospel. A crowd of curious people gathered outside the prison window. They wanted to see what Protestants were like! Our friend told us that the villagers looked at them as if they were wild animals. After a while the thought came to them to preach the Gospel to those people.

"My face was all marked up, where the mayor's son had struck me after I was arrested," said the evangelist, "but we had done right according to God's and man's laws, so preach we did. It was a grand opportunity, for the prison was in a good place for making ourselves heard nearly over the whole village, and most of the villagers must have heard us preach that day."

There has been very little opposition to the Gospel in that village since.

The Gospel of Christ proves itself to be a powerful weapon of defense among the Filipinos, for it draws those who would serve God into open and united testimony of their faith in him, and for the native Christians, after more or less time of suffering and persecution, it wins the respect of their fellow townspeople and villagers, as they see their good and industrious lives, and determination to obey God.

are bought with a price; not silver and gold, but the precious blood of Jesus, as if a lamb without blemish and without spot." In the interest of the service there are many things that might be given up. The world can indulge in some pleasures which, if not unlawful, are at least inexpedient for those whose time and energy are enlisted for Christ. Do we complain of this? Let us rather thank of those resources of pleasure of which the world knows nothing; such as the joy of sins forgiven, the delight of seeking the noblest and best, the peace that passeth understanding, and the hope of heaven. We are on the way to a country that floweth with milk and honey. Shall we murmur for the flesh-pots of Egypt when the vineyards of Eschol are before us? We are to live forever in a land "where the rivers of pleasure unceasingly roll, and the smile of the Lord is the feast of the soul."

Our work is "seeking the kingdom" and seeking it "first." We are never "off duty." There is no eight-hour day in the work of God. Our covenant binds us to devote our time, treasure, energies of body and soul to him whose we are and whom we serve; so that whether we labor or rest, laugh or weep, eat or drink, or whatsoever we do, we must needs "do all to the glory of God." In fine, the touchstone of the problem of pleasure is this: We are Christians. It was the custom of the greatest of Roman Emperors to quicken his sense of responsibility by contemplating the legend, "Remember, thou art Caesar!" No follower of Christ is in danger of doing wrong so long as he cherishes the friendship of his Lord and allows himself to be guided by him.

Submissiveness

PLACE me where I am needed most,
On highland plain or lowland coast;
In Africa's dark and deadly land,
Or midst broad India's burning sand;
Or if at home thou bidst me stay
To labor on in humble way,
Thy will be done. Just give me grace
To run to-day the appointed race.
I am thine own; thou knowest best.
Show me my work. I leave the rest
With thee. Thou art too wise and true
To bid a trusting child to do
A single thing that's void or vain,
Or cause to endure one needless pain.

What difference does it make, anyhow? Blankets are durable; and easily cleaned—if you go about it in the right way.

The best time to wash them is on a warm, sunny, breezy day in spring.

The best way to wash them is with Ivory Soap. Follow the directions given below and your blankets will be as clean and soft and fluffy as when you bought them.

First, shake out the dust, then soak in warm suds of Ivory Soap for thirty minutes. Work the blankets up and down in the water, squeeze them against the sides of the tub, and put them through the wringer, loosely adjusted, into another strong suds of the same temperature as the first. Stir about and soak for ten minutes, stretch soiled parts over a smooth surface, and rub with a brush, using a little of a solution of Ivory Soap cut up and dissolved in hot water. Rinse in several warm waters—or until both blanket and water are clean—then hang to dry in the open air. Hang the blankets so that they will dry straight. When perfectly dry, rub the surface with a soft flannel cloth and hang them near a stove or in a warm room for several hours. For each pair of blankets allow a half cake of Ivory Soap.

There was a sudden commotion about the Whalens' door. An undersized little body was worming its way through the crowd, and thrusting sharp little elbows to the right and to the left. The next minute, Margaret Kendall, standing near the Whalens' table, felt an imperative tug at her sleeve.

"Hullo! Say, Mag, give us a bite; will ye?"

"Katy! Why, it's Katy Goldberg," cried Margaret in joyous recognition. "Mother, here's Katy."

The first touch of Margaret's hand on Katy's shoulder swept like an electric shock through the waiting throng around the door. It was the signal for a general onslaught. In a moment the Whalen kitchen swarmed with boys, girls and women all shouting, all talking at once, and all struggling to reach the beautiful, blue-eyed, golden-haired little girl they had known as "Mag of the Alley."

Step by step Margaret fell back until she was quite against the wall. Her eyes grew wide and terror-filled, yet she made a brave attempt to smile and to respond politely to the noisy greetings. Across the room Mrs. Kendall struggled to reach her daughter's side, but the onrushing tide of humanity flung her back and left her helpless and alone.

It was then that Mrs. Whalen's powerful fist and strident voice came to the rescue. In three minutes the room was cleared, and Margaret was sobbing in her mother's arms.

"You, see, mother, you see how 'tis," she cried hysterically, as soon as she could speak. "There's such lots and lots of them, and they're all so poor. Did you see how ragged and bad their clothes were, and how they grabbed for the cake? We've got to divvy up, mother; we've got to divvy up!"

"Yes, dear, I know; and we will," soothed Mrs. Kendall, hurriedly. "We'll begin right away to-morrow, darling. But now we'll go back to the hotel and go to bed. My little girl is tired and needs rest."

CHAPTER IX

DR. SPENCER met Mrs. Kendall and her daughter at the Houghtonsville station on the night they returned from New York. His lips were smiling, and his eyes were joyous, as befitted a lover who is to behold for the first time in nine long days his dear one's face. The eager words of welcome died on his lips, however, at sight of the weariness and misery in the two dear faces before him.

"Why, Amy, dearest," he began anxiously; but her upraised hand silenced him.

"To-night—not now," she murmured, with a quick glance at Margaret. Then aloud to her daughter she said: "See, dear, here's Dr. Spencer, and he's brought the ponies to carry us home. What a delightful drive we will have!"

"Oh, has he?" For an instant Margaret's face glowed with animation; then the light died out as suddenly as it had come. "But, mother, I—I think I'd rather walk," she said. "You know Patty and the rest can't ride."

The doctor frowned and gave a sudden exclamation under his breath. Mrs. Kendall paled a little and turned to her daughter.

"Yes, I know," she said gently. "But you are very tired, and mother thinks it best you should ride. After all, dearie, you know it won't make Patty and the rest ride, even if you do walk. Don't you see?"

"Yes, I—I suppose so," admitted Margaret; but she sighed as she climbed into the carriage, and all the way home her eyes were troubled.

Not until after Margaret had gone to bed that night did Mrs. Kendall answer the questions that had trembled all the evening on the doctor's lips; then she told him the story of those nine days in New York, beginning with Margaret's visit to the Alley, and her overwhelming "reception" in the Whalens' basement home.

"I'm afraid the whole thing has been a mistake," she said despondently, when she had finished. "Instead of making Margaret happy, it has made her miserable."

"But I don't see," protested the doctor. "As near as I can make out you did just what she wanted; you—er—divvied up."

Mrs. Kendall sighed.

"Why, of course, to a certain extent; but even Margaret, child though she is, saw the hopelessness of the task when once we set about it. There were so many, so pitifully many. Her few weeks of luxurious living here at home have opened her eyes to the difference between her life and theirs, and I thought the child would cry herself sick over it all."

"But you helped some of them."

Again Mrs. Kendall sighed.

"Yes, oh, yes; we helped them. I think if Margaret could have had her way we should have marched through the streets to the tune of 'See, the conquering hero comes,' distributing new dresses and frosted cakes with unstinted hands; but I finally convinced her that such assistance was perhaps not the wisest way of going about what we wanted to do. At last I had to keep her away from the Alley altogether, it affected her so. I got her interested in looking up a new home for the Whalens, and so filled her mind with that."

"Oh, then the Whalens have a new home. Well, I'm sure Margaret must have liked that."

Mrs. Kendall smiled wearily.

"Margaret did," she said; and the doctor raised his eyebrows.

"But, surely, the Whalens—"

"Did not," supplied Mrs. Kendall.

"Did not!" cried the doctor.

"Well, 'twas this way," laughed Mrs. Kendall. "It was my idea to find a nice little place outside the city where perhaps Mr. Whalen could raise vegetables, and Mrs. Whalen do some work that paid better than flower-making. Perhaps Margaret's insistence upon 'grass and trees' influenced me. At any rate, I found the place, and in high feather told the Whalens of the good fortune in store for them. What was my surprise to be met with blank silence."

"An' sure then, an' it's in the country, is it?" Mrs. Whalen asked finally.

"Yes," I said. "With a yard, some flower-beds, and a big garden for vegetables." I was just warming to my subject once more when Mr. Whalen demanded, "Is it fur from the Alley?"

"Well, to make a long story short, they at last kindly consented to view the place; but, after one glance, they would have none of it."

"But—why?" queried the doctor.

"Various reasons. 'Twas lonesome; too far from the Alley; they didn't care to raise vegetables, anyway, and Mr. Whalen considered it quite too much work to 'kape up a place like that.' According to my private opinion, however, the man had an eye out for a saloon, and he didn't see it; consequently—the result!"

"Well, we came back to town and the basement kitchen. Margaret was inconsolable when she heard the decision. The Whalen children, too, were disappointed; but Mr. Whalen and his wife were deaf to their entreaties. In the end I persuaded them to move to rooms that at least had the sun and air—though they were still in the Alley—and there I left them with a well-stocked larder and wardrobe, and with the rent paid six months in advance. I shall keep my eye on them, of course, for Margaret's sake, and I hope to do something really worth while for the children. Patty and the twins are still with them at present."

On the Way to Church

DO you recall those Sabbath morns with Mother at your side?

Your hand in hers, the sunny road stretched out, serene and wide.

The gardens that you passed were sweet with lilac and with rose, And youth was filled to brimming with the best the country knows.

The blossoms showered on you, glint of silver in the birch;

Ah, those dear, sweet golden moments down the sunny road to church.

Do you recall that Mother said the birds were made for song;

Their minstrel chatter notes of prayer to help the world along?

And how she told you that the sky was woven from the wings

Of that great sacred angel host whose praise the preacher sings?

Each rose that brushed the cheek of you, dear Mother used to say,

Were drops of blood from Nature's breast to consecrate each day.

Do you recall the distant slope above whose yellow bend

The church spire pricked the crinkled clouds in hazy tint and blend,

While, knee deep in the sweet, fresh grass, a wild bud hid its face,

And you and Mother peeped at it there in its hiding place?

The clover-scent, the flowing fields—the hedge and fence and wall,

Along your road each was a friend, and how you loved them all!

Do you recall how Mother stooped to fix your hat on straight,

And how your little feet kept pace for fear you both were late?

The old road led through monarchies of sunshine and of smiles

Until, to you, the goal you sought lay onward countless miles.

The blossoms bowed a path to you—the silver on the birch,

Those dear, sweet golden moments down the sunny road to church.

OFF LABRADOR COAST, May 28, 1908.

Please accept my thanks for contributions to our work received. Here we are just in transition, the ice is leaving us and codfish vessels are swarming down to the summer industry.

We have had a long but very happy winter. The blessing of God has been manifested in very direct ways, and with great happiness and many bright hopes we leave the land and once more launch out into the deep. Personally, I had a close call in the spring. I was on a visit to a young man said to be dying, sixty miles to the south. I was crossing alone a large bay on the ice. After the wind changed, the ice broke up and let me through. Climbing out onto a piece of ice I drifted to sea, and for twenty-four hours had a good look into the face of death. There seemed no chance whatever of getting ashore again, when suddenly a boat came pulling through the ice and took me off. A man had seen me the previous day and at last they had found me. It was a source of great comfort, all those hours, to be absolutely certain that absent from the body means present with God. There was no fear, only regret that I had not accomplished more for Jesus Christ. Faithfully,

WILFRED GRENFELL.

A Teacher's Experience.

"My friends call me 'The Postum Preacher,'" writes a Minn. school teacher, "because I preach the gospel of Postum everywhere I go, and have been the means of liberating many 'coffee pot slaves.'"

"I don't care what they call me so long as I can help others to see what they lose by sticking to coffee, and can show them the way to steady nerves, clear brain and general good health by using Postum."

"While a school girl I drank coffee and had fits of trembling and went through a siege of nervous prostration, which took me three years to rally from."

"Mother coaxed me to use Postum, but I thought coffee would give me strength. So things went, and when I married I found my husband and I were both coffee toppers, and I can sympathize with a drunkard who tries to leave off his cups."

"At last in sheer desperation I bought a package of Postum, followed directions after boiling it, served it with good cream, and asked my husband how he liked the coffee."

"We each drank three cups apiece, and what a satisfied feeling it left! Our conversion has lasted several years and will continue as long as we live, for it has made us new. Nerves are steady, appetites good, sleep sound and refreshing."

Feeding the Hungry in Armenia

Miss Charlotte Ely's Relief Caravan on its Travels

The party consists of a government guard, a native Armenian pastor, and several helpers. The lady herself is not in the photograph.

LETTER from our mission treasurer, Mr. Peet, informs us that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers have at another generous donation for relief of earthquake and famine sufferers. In behalf of those who receive help from this fund, we desire to send most hearty thanks to you and of the donors. The blessings called down upon them are sweet to listen to! The earthquakes last year and the continued high price of grain have brought about great distress. During the last three decades war, massacre, famine, pestilence, fire and flood, with other afflictions, have visited this country. It is hardly possible for one not an eye-witness to conceive of the misery of the people. We are therefore expressly thankful for the sympathy and help extended in this time of dire need.

To insure the greatest possible good from the help sent by you and other friends, care has been taken in preparing the relief lists, to aid only the most destitute. These lists are instantly undergoing examination. A large proportion of those receiving aid at Bitlis City are refugees from villages, who have been driven here to avoid starvation. Some may be able when spring opens to supplement in some way what they receive from relief. It is our hope that when sowing time comes we may be able to provide seed-grain to those who have little or nothing.

This relief work—though primarily designed to alleviate physical suffering—often results in removing prejudice, and leading famishing souls to seek the Bread of Life.

CHARLOTTE E. ELY.

Bitlis, Turkey-in-Asia.

Missionary R. M. Cole writes: "Will you kindly pass along most grateful mention to your readers for their timely contribution to our orphanage relief work? We are trying to keep our factory running for weaving, shoemaking and tailoring, so that the orphan boys may learn trades and be able to earn their own bread. Our school graduates are largely engaged in teaching here or in other missionary fields of this land. One of them—Solomon by name—is a teacher and preacher in a village at the west end of Van Lake."

WORK FOR THE SEAMEN

THIS year the mission yacht Messenger in New York harbor enters the eleventh year of its work. Seamen have always been a needy and neglected class. They are eager to be instructed in the word of God; and the literature we offer them for their voyage at sea is accepted with expressions of gratitude. The leading matter the sailor receives from the mission yacht is the only real comfort he knows. He carries it to sea and there it is many times reread. It means much to the sailor. He often says that it is more precious to him than dollar bills. It breaks the awful monotony of a voyage at sea which sometimes drives men to insanity and suicide. It gives him a new lease of life, and promises better things when he changes his course. His reading becomes his chart which shows the rocks of drunkenness and the breakers of a dishonest life. The knowledge he thus secures is more than a temporary blessing. When on shore it becomes his pilot and enables him to save his hard earned money and to avoid evil associates. The bread thus cast on the waters prevents many a noble wreck and saves others nearly engulfed by the storm.

The service of sailormen is indispensable to the prosperity and comfort of civilization. Without them, the products of this country could not be sent forth to the markets of the world, and the many necessities of life could not be brought from foreign lands. Bibles and missionaries could not be sent forth to heathen communities, and the islands of the sea would remain as an abandoned hulk on the sand. The mind is never at rest, but is ever pursuing its onward course either in the light of day or the dark sea of evil. Therefore the reading matter the seaman receives from the mission yacht not only shows him that he must answer to another Power, but often prevents mutiny on the high seas. It leads him to the foot of the cross and to the Saviour. The reading matter sent forth on the Messenger during the past year consisted of 193 barrels, 148 boxes, 212 dunnage sacks, four large wagon loads from public libraries, and ten tons that the mission yacht brought from New Brunswick. The approximate weight was seventy tons.

This work among seamen contains greater possibilities of good than any one on land can imagine. Literature for seamen should consist of monthly magazines and religious papers and can be sent prepaid to Captain Benn, Baltic Terminal, Brooklyn, N. Y.

This mission yacht is maintained by voluntary contributions, and if financial aid is sent to the undersigned, P. O. Box 157, Brooklyn, N. Y., the yacht and its missionary will be able to circulate one hundred tons of literature among seamen and do a vast amount of good before the close of the year. CAPTAIN GEORGE E. BENN.

Getting Ready at Mont-Lawn

UNUSUALLY frequent and plentiful rains during the spring have made Mont-Lawn more beautiful than ever before. So it seems to one visiting the home at this time. Tree, shrub, and grass seem more vividly green, and wild flowers have bloomed in the utmost profusion.

Down in a little hollow, just below the large kitchen garden, violets have fairly carpeted the ground. Their purple, long-stemmed blooms, if gathered in their freshness, would outshine any hot-house product. Mont-Lawn is particularly rich in trees, some of them almost gigantic in size. Every year adds to their stature and beauty. Every morning just as dawn comes stealing across the Tappan Zee, the air is filled with liquid music from golden-throated bird choirs who warble their thanksgiving in a chorus of ecstasy. Each visit brings a fresh surprise to friends of this charming bit of God's architecture, where majestic hills form a background to the "Children's Paradise." There is always a new point of vantage from which the natural beauties of hill and valley, field and river may be viewed.

How small a sum it takes to make a little child happy for ten long lovely days, ten restful, happy nights! Only three dollars will do all—a small sum indeed compared with the inestimable blessings it conveys to the child. Twenty-one dollars endows a cot for the season. This endowment makes it possible for seven children to have an outing of ten days each, every hour filled with joy, plenty of good, wholesome food, and to many the hitherto unknown luxury of a soft, clean, comfortable bed. Many applications are already in for the coming season, which opens June 25. The little ones are looking forward with all the faith of children to the happy day when the noisy, dusty streets of New York will be exchanged for the wide, green fields of Mont-Lawn, where the hot, stuffy tenement will give place to the roomy cottage dormitory and open-air dining room, with its blissful second-story rainy day playroom.

As the season advances, we hope to take up in detail, from week to week, each separate detail of life at THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Home, to show our readers how great a blessing cometh down both to giver and recipient in this noble work for the little ones.

Life Through Christ

By MRS. M. BAXTER

THE past quarter we have seen Jesus as the Good Shepherd giving his life for the sheep. Our next lesson tells us of life from the dead, and of Jesus as "the Resurrection and the Life," mightier than death. We see how he allowed things to come to the worst with Lazarus that he might prove that through death he would destroy him that had the power of death, even the devil, and deliver them who through fear of death were all their lifetime subject to bondage" (Heb. 2: 14, 15). He is the Conqueror of death, physical and spiritual. Four days' death had apparently had the dominion of the body of Lazarus. What was that to him in whom was life, and who was in himself the resurrection and the life? The same voice which spake and it was done, which commanded and it stood fast (Ps. 33: 9), in the days of creation, said, "Lazarus, come forth," and the dead arose and lived.

The same power will raise from the dead "them that sleep in Jesus" (I. Thess. 4: 13), and will take away without dying those who wait for him (Heb. 9: 28, R. V.), and fashion anew their bodies of humiliation and conform them to the body of his glory (Phil. 3: 21), when he comes again. And the same power will raise the dead for the judgment at the great white throne, and make the very sea give up her dead (Rev. 20: 11-13). And it was the very same power by which he himself broke loose from the death which he accepted for our ransom. No man, no devil, even him that hath the power of death, could bind him in whom was life. And thus the risen Saviour ascended into heaven, passing through the realms of "the prince of the power of the air" (Eph. 2: 2), whom he will shortly expel from that dominion, when he can catch away to himself his waiting ones (I. Thess. 4: 17; Rev. 12: 6).

In John 13 we saw the humility of the Lord Jesus in washing his disciples' feet; a sample of the fruit which the life of God in man produces, so contrary to our natural hearts, which are infected with the wicked pride which made Satan fall (Isa. 14: 12-14; Ezek. 28: 17). And in John 14: 2, 3, we got a glimpse of our heavenly home to which our Lord says he will receive us unto himself when he comes, that where he is we may be also. Oh, how infinitely blessed it is to know that after all the changes of this mortal life, he who has guided us, cared for us, borne us through all, will make heaven home to us by his very presence there! And then we saw, in John 15: 16, something of the mission of the Holy Spirit; to the world in convicting it of sin, of righteousness, and of judgment; to the Church in his wonderful ministry of intercession in us, as our Lord intercedes in heaven for us at the right hand of God.

And then, in John 18, compared with the other Gospels, we saw how, after all the three years the disciples had been with Jesus, his chosen, constant companions, who had watched him, heard his words, shared his poverty, ministered to him, and who knew him so intimately, and so really loved him that they had left all for him—yet when it came to the point, forsook him and fled. Peter, the most profuse in his professions of fidelity, had even denied him, and Judas, who had a devil, but with whom the Master had borne with divine patience, betrayed him! No trust could be put in human nature; under the best of circumstances, it utterly broke down under a test. In his trial before Caiaphas, Herod, and Pilate, no man stood with him. He trod the winepress alone. It looked like a huge failure, but in him, the God-man, was life.

And then we saw how he was led away to be crucified. No one who judged him could find any fault in him, and yet man dared to execute the Holy One of God. And in the present day, the enmity against Jesus our Saviour is none the less. No man can find a fault in him, and yet how few there are who really follow him, and leave all for him! He was wounded for our transgressions, he was bruised for our iniquities, the chastisement of peace was upon him, and by his stripes we are healed, and yet the majority of men live as though everyone and everything were of more account than Jesus.

A Needy Mission Field

THE undersigned has charge of a field in the United Provinces of India, with a population of about 3,500,000. We have more than 22,000 Christian converts, and multitudes are ready to be evangelized. The headquarters of this work is in Meerut City. There is much religious interest and revival influence in this territory.

Our chiefest need is a large reinforcement to our band of about 150 native preachers and teachers. Our converts are without adequate care and multitudes of inquirers can not be instructed. To secure suitable workers, we must train them ourselves. Among our converts the material for such workers is abundant. The quickest method of supplying this pressing need is to gather in bright young men with their wives from our village Christian communities, who have learned to read a little, and to put them under a course of instruction and training for about three years, and then they are ready to go out and fill these needy places. We have such a training school and it has given us numbers of valuable preachers and teachers. We greatly need forty-five or fifty scholarships at $2.50 per month, or $30 per year. In few places indeed can $90 spread over three years do so much for the extension of Christ's kingdom in the Indian Empire. May God put it into many hearts to help us.

The Public Speaking Classes

PROFESSOR HAYNES' classes in the Art of Speaking in Public have proved remarkably popular among the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. At the present moment he is conducting by mail a class of some 1,500 students, men and women of all ages.

Hundreds have written in high appreciation of this course of ten lessons in the Art of Speaking in Public. "They excel anything I have ever read on the subject and the rules are so practical that I will put them into use," writes W. F. S., North Wilkesboro, N. C. "Your system is the most concise, practical, simple and efficient I have ever tried," writes W. J. F., Selkirk, Ont., and he adds that public speaking, instead of being a task, is now a pleasure. "The rules you laid down have been a blessing to me," writes C. C. H., Fairfield, Me. "I have studied them all with profit," writes the General Secretary of an association in Little Rock, Ark.

Other students send these expressions on the Course:

What you teach about word-painting and making your own illustrations is worth its weight in gold.

The study of the audience is great; it is perfect. That lesson on gesture opened a world of effectiveness to me.

Your letter on voice is itself eloquent.

I went at it night and day. I have not had a hoarse hour since. Yet I was always getting hoarse before.

I have put my vocabulary right up to 1,500 words by your system.

A Special Summer Course is now being arranged for CHRISTIAN HERALD readers. All who wish to take advantage of this opportunity to study the Art of Public Speaking under a practical master should at once send in their names and addresses together with one dollar enrolment fee. The lessons run through ten weeks by mail and will be an incalculable aid to all who have the desire to be able to stand upon their feet and express themselves clearly and correctly before an audience. There is positively no further expense connected with the entire course. Address, "Public Speaking Course," THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 92 Bible House, New York.

HELP your brother in his efforts
As he struggles on through life;
Kindly words and loving glances,
They will oft allay the strife.

Deeds of kindness, done in mercy,
Handed out in Jesus' name,
Will unto your heart bring blessings
Of more worth than praise or fame.

In the shadows after twilight
As the darkness covers you,
Then to you will come his mercy,
Filling you with courage new.

For the One who sees the sparrow
Looks through eyes of tender love;
Keeps a record of your doings
In his mansions up above.

PHONE OPERATOR

Regained Memory on Right Food

The girls who answer your call on the telephone, must be quick, accurate, and courteous. They must have good memories, also.

Those who work nights often get in the way of eating almost anything handy, which is apt to be the kind of food which does not rebuild waste brain and nerve cells.

"I have been night telephone operator for a number of years," writes a Calif. girl, "and was formerly in perfect health, never knew an ail.

"But irregular hours of sleep and meals, and the use of pastry or any food that happened to be available, soon caused my health and memory to fail.

"The loss of my robust health worried me very much. And medicine seemed to do no good.

"Four months ago, mother told me (it was the condition of my stomach that caused my trouble, and she believed if I would change to Grape-Nuts food, I would improve.

"Eager to regain my health, I took her advice and instead of eating just anything, I ate Grape-Nuts regularly, and at the end of four months on Grape-Nuts I am the happy, robust girl I once was.

"I have gained eleven pounds in weight, have good color, am strong and hearty and nothing seems to escape my memory. And all this I owe to Grape-Nuts."

"There's a Reason." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

A CHANCE TO MAKE MONEY

I have berries, grapes, peaches and apples two years old, fresh as when picked. Do not heat or cook the fruit, just put it up cold; keeps perfectly fresh and costs almost nothing. Last year I sold directions to over 120 families in one week. As there are many people poor, like myself, I feel it my duty to give you my experience, feeling confident anyone can make $100 around home in a few days. I will mail bottle of fruit and full directions to any of the readers for 21 2-cent stamps, to cover cost of bottle, fruit, mailing, etc. Address Francis E. Turner, 219 Seventh Avenue, New York. Let people see and taste the fruit and you should sell hundreds of directions at $1 each.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S SOCIETIES

The Scholar Missionary*

PAUL the Cilician enjoyed in his youth the advantages of the famous schools of Tarsus, which was then the rival of Athens and Alexandria in learning and philosophy. His writings prove him to have been a man of superior intellectual attainments. A Pharisee's son, he was doubtless carefully instructed in rabbinical lore. But only after his conversion were his latent talents fully developed and consecrated to the cause of Christ. Paul then became the typical scholar-missionary of the early Christian church, extending its borders and increasing its followers in many lands. In that wonderful second chapter of Corinthians he discloses the secret of his success. With Christ in his heart and on his lips, he was invincible.

Paul's secret of power has become known since that day to multitudes of believers throughout the world. That prince of science, Lord Kelvin, when asked what had been the greatest of his discoveries, replied: "The greatest I ever made was to discover my Saviour in Jesus Christ."

Henry Martyn was probably one of the best modern examples of the scholar-missionary, of whom Paul was the illustrious prototype. During his university career Martyn was still unconverted. His father's sudden death made the family poor. Martyn found an associate in Charles Simeon, an evangelical preacher, and a man of deep, earnest piety. Soon the young student became convicted of sin and took Christ into his heart as Saviour. Then came the great transformation in his life. He had found Paul's secret.

Martyn now worked with tremendous zeal to develop his talent and lay on the altar of service. He won the highest university honors—the senior wranglership, the Latin prize and a degree. His friends marveled when he told them that he felt a call to service in heathen lands. On account of his youth, his first application for acceptance as a missionary was rejected. Three years later, he was appointed to India.

He reached Madras in April, 1806, where his wonderful talents soon made him a foremost figure in the missionary field. He studied and mastered Sanscrit, Hindostani and Persian, and though almost constantly engaged in public ministry, he found time to translate the New Testament into the two latter languages. He traveled much, visiting Persia, Arabia and other countries, and speaking the word of truth to many races and religions—Mollahs, Softas, Parsees and Sheiks of the desert. One day he would preach to princes, governors and professors; the next to street beggars. His notable interview with the Grand Vizier at Tabriz, whither he went to see the Shah, recalls the famous incident of Paul's appearance before Agrippa. Indeed, there were many singular parallels in the careers of these two scholar-missionaries.

The Pauline zeal in Henry Martyn's noble heart was prematurely stilled by death, which overtook him among strangers at Tocat; but though he died a pilgrim in a heathen land, his influence and the fervor for missions which he kindled during those six brief but brilliant years, live to this day.

India's greatest need is for more men of the Henry Martyn type to spread the glorious Gospel. The greatest of modern religious reformers in India, Keshub Chunder Sen, said: "It is Christ who rules India. None but Christ has deserved this precious diadem, and Jesus shall have it!" "We recognize that the fulness of time has come for India," writes the Rev. R. A. Hume in his recent book on Missions from the Modern View, "when God will, through Jesus, give that land the same spiritual vision and power he has given to the Western peoples."

An Omnipotent Protector*

AS we advance in spiritual experience, we realize that many events in our career, which can not be explained at the moment by any process of the human understanding, are yet divinely directed for our ultimate good.

We learn, too, from the lesson that the worldly perils and dangers that beset us may be made contributory to our spiritual development. It has been related of Anshar the "Apostle of the North" (who was the first to carry the Gospel to the Danes and Swedes about 826 A.D.), that when he set sail for the Northland his vessel was attacked by pirates and plundered of everything of value, including even the Scriptures he had designed for use in his work. Anshar and his companions found themselves deserted on a bleak, inhospitable shore, with no idea of their geographical position. "Let us return," pleaded Anshar's comrades. "No," he replied; "whatever may happen to me is in the hands of God. I will not return until I discover whether it is his will that the Gospel shall be published in this land." So they took courage and plodded on their way inland until to their surprise they reached Siguntia, the capital city, where they were graciously received by the king. They were permitted to preach and soon the Gospel was proclaimed all over that heathen land.

During the voyage of the Discovery Captain Scott, with several companions, was making a sledge journey across antarctic ice. They left provisions in a depot on the ice field in order to lighten the load and provide for the return journey. Soon afterward they lost their bearings, and were in danger of starvation. No familiar landmark was to be seen. Suddenly one of the men slipped, and began to slide down a cascade of the glacier. The others, being roped to him, followed. Three hundred feet they slid when their progress was suddenly stopped on a lower level, and they recognized familiar landmarks, which directed them to the depot near by. If they had not fallen they might have missed it and perished.

John Hunt had labored heroically but without visible results among the heathen of Fiji for several years, when a strange thing happened which unexpectedly turned the tide of popular feeling in favor of the missionary. Native priests had threatened the lives of the missionaries, and because of their "evil work" had predicted a terrible drought; but it did not come and the people's belief in the powers of the pagan deities was rudely shaken. It was the turning point. The threat of disaster had been transformed into a blessing. The Queen of Viwa became a Christian, then King Thakombau's generalissimo, Verani, the "Napoleon of Fiji," was baptized and became an ardent preacher of the Gospel. The great royal canoe, formerly the messenger of war and bloodshed, was employed to carry the missionaries to the various islands to preach. Converts were soon numbered by thousands. Some years afterward Thakombau himself was baptized publicly. His whole land became Christian.

History is full of instances of God's protecting care of his people. Aged Alexander Peden, the Covenanter, and his band of worshipers were enveloped by a mist in answer to Peden's prayer for deliverance from the troopers who were seeking their lives. In 1686, eight hundred Waldensian fugitives were in danger of perishing from hunger when their prayers for succor were answered by a sudden thaw, which removed the snow and revealed a quantity of wheat standing ripe and uncut, which fed them all.

Thus, in all things, the believer is made to realize that God the Father is making provision for his welfare here and hereafter.

THE "LAKE OF BAYS" COUNTRY

A handsome brochure, artistically illustrated, has been issued by the Grand Trunk passenger department, telling of the beauties of the Lake of Bays district, in the "Highlands of Ontario." A new feature of this district is the new hotel—the Wawa—at Norway Point. The hotel itself has a page illustration reflecting the summer glories of woodland and water, with a brood of seven wild geese soaring skyward beyond the tower. The concise description embodies the story of a charming resort.

The very pretty duo tone photo engravings show the beauties of the new fairy land far more effectively than words can do. A copy can be obtained free on application to G. W. Vaux, 917 Merchants Loan and Trust Building, Chicago, Ill.

Questions and Answers

W. D., Germantown, Pa. What is the difference between Fabian Socialism (which I take to be true Socialism), and the brand that advocates conflict and violence?

Fabian Socialism believes in accomplishing its ends by the peaceful means of education, agitation and legislation. It has done much abroad, especially in Great Britain. Its leaders hold that the people have the power, through legitimate channels and by peaceful methods, to bring about all needed reforms, but that education and co-operation are essential to this result.

Reader, Ohio. If a woman with an infant leaves her husband, can the father be made to support the child and pay the wife alimony and also give the wife custody of the child?

A husband must support his wife and child, according to his means; but if he demands custody of the child, the law will let him have it, unless he is an unfit person. In this case, probably the child would be left with the mother. Consult a local lawyer as to proper proceeding.

S. J. S., Beaver Springs, Pa. 1. Why did Jesus ask Peter the third time "Lovest thou me?" Was it because he denied him thrice? 2. How was Rahab related to King David? 3. Is it wrong to have an orchestra play and lead the singing in the house of God?

1. The thrice-repeated question referred doubtless to the three protestations and denials, and were designed to elicit, as they did, answers full of love and faith, and without any trace of Peter's usual characteristic — presumption. 2. She became the wife of Salmon, son of Nahshon, and was the ancestress of Boaz, grandfather of Jesse, the father of David. 3. No. The finer the music, the better. We should cultivate the popular taste for the appreciation of the best music in the sanctuary. If you read the Biblical accounts of the magnificent array of instruments used by the choir in the Temple, you will realize how much importance was attached to that branch of the service.

Mrs. J. M. S., Binghamton, N. Y. I would like to ask which you consider the best Life of Christ?

The best we know of are by Farrar, Geikie, Edersheim, and Beecher, any one of which you can procure through regular booksellers.

Mrs. C. L., Clarion, Pa. 1. The people here say that if you sow on Ascension Day you will be struck by lightning. Where did such an idea originate? 2. Will a Christian swear under any circumstances?

1. It doubtless originated in the fact that holy days and fasts in the Roman, Anglican and Eastern churches were, and still are, rigorously observed. 2. Certainly he should not swear. See Ex. 20: 7 and Matt. 5: 34. Profanity is one of the crying sins of the day and every true Christian should strive to discourage it.

Mrs. G. N. P., Lithia Springs, Ga. Please explain the expression in the last verse of the last chapter of John, And there are also many other things which Jesus did, the which if they should be written every one, I suppose that even the world itself could not contain the books that should be written.

It means obviously that only a partial and exceedingly meagre account of all the wonderful acts and sayings of Jesus during his earthly ministry has come down to us. John is writing hyperbolically, and in the figure of an enthusiast, who feels that his materials far exceed his ability to handle them, and that the narration might easily be multiplied tenfold.

W. P. C., Paonia, Colo. 1. Was St. Peter ever in Rome? It seems to me that the story of his having been there is a mere Popish invention, though some scholarly works have allowed the legend to creep into their pages. 2. Paul calls himself the Apostle to the Gentiles, and Peter the Apostle to the circumcision. It is thought that not more than twenty per cent. of the Jews deported when Judah was overthrown by Nebuchadnezzar ever returned; that eighty per cent. remained in Babylonia. Was it not to these that Peter was finally sent? It seems from I. Peter 5: 13 that he was in Babylonia when he wrote the first epistle. 3. Has the legend that he was crucified head downward any foundation in fact?

1. Church chroniclers disagree as to the time of Peter's journey to Rome, but all concur in holding that he went there. Eusebius says Peter went to Rome from Antioch in the second year of Claudius Caesar. Jerome confirms this and says Peter remained in Rome 25 years preaching and teaching. Irenæus says Peter and Paul were in

It is "the life of the soul, as the soul is the life of the body."

Mr. G. A. P., of Newport, R. I., writes: "I am sending you a form of blessing used by my grandfather way down among the hills of Camden, Me., over sixty years ago, which among his numerous grandchildren has become almost a classic. It may interest the readers of the HERALD:

Heavenly Father, wilt thou behold us at this time in mercy? Grant us thy presence; comfort our hearts with the consolation of thy Holy Spirit. Grant us grace to strengthen us; pardon our sins and bless us, and grant thy favor upon the food provided. May we receive it in thy love and live to thine acceptance. These favors we ask in Jesus Christ's name. Amen.

H. B., Wenona, Md. For what purpose was Judas chosen as a disciple?

He was attracted, as the others were, by the preaching of the Baptist or by his own Messianic hopes. It can be imagined, however, that baser motives may have mingled with his faith and zeal. He must have possessed some qualifications, probably plausibility being one, and he may even have excelled the rest of the twelve in business each phrase or passage. "He descended into hell" is attributed to Thomas.

This is a little verse (forwarded by a CHRISTIAN HERALD reader), which expresses in felicitous phrase the sentiment of the Christian optimist:

If you wish to grumble, go
Where there's no one nigh to hear;
Let the story of your woe
Fall upon no mortal ear.
But if joy hath come to you,
Shout it! Spread it far and wide;
Share with others all the true
Happinesses that betide.

D. H., Greenwich, Conn. What became of Peter the Hermit, who preached the first crusade?

The great company which Peter led to the Holy Land on the first crusade was totally defeated in battle at Nicæa in 1096. Peter then joined the army of Godfrey of Bouillon. He returned from the Holy Land and founded an Augustinian monastery.

Missionary Student, Lowville, N. Y. Can you tell me something about the Loyalty Islands?

They compose a group of three large and several small islands in the South Pacific, 160 miles east of New Caledonia, and, like the latter island, they are under French colonial administration. The three large islands are Mare, Lefu, and Uea. Bananas are grown and sandalwood is exported. In 1901 the population was 14,800.

H. S., Roca, Neb. Please give the names of a few of the largest bridges of the world, and where are they located?

The Brooklyn, Williamsburg and Blackwell's Island bridges between New York and Long Island; the Tay and Forth bridges in Scotland, the Cincinnati bridge, the Memphis, Tenn., bridges, and the great bridge recently built across the Danube at Cernavoda in Roumania.

H. A. W., Society Hills, S. C. What is grace?

In theology, the word "grace" has been the hinge of three great historical controversies, and it is still a subject of varied interpretation. In the spiritual sense it is divine favor or condescension to mankind individually or collectively. In the concrete Gospel sense, it is the unmerited love and favor of God in Christ, as shown in the salvation freely provided for mankind (see Eph. 2: 9). It may also be described as the divine influence acting within the heart, regenerating, sanctifying and keeping it. Grace brings the peace and joy of assurance.

A PERILOUS AFRICAN JOURNEY

Mrs. Wodehouse's Trip to Interior Rhodesia's Wild Tribes Who Never Saw a White Woman Before

MRS. LOUISE M. WODEHOUSE, an American missionary, stationed at Umtali, Rhodesia, Africa, has written for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD a most interesting account of her recent tour among the strange tribes of the interior. With her husband, Rev. Robert Wodehouse, and several active attendants, they set out from Umtali in August of last year and traversed a large section of the country, meeting with many unusual adventures. In some of these places, Mrs. Wodehouse was surprised to find that she was regarded with extreme curiosity, no white woman ever having visited those tribes before. Her letter is given below:

On Thursday, August 29, we left Pakata's kraal at seven A.M. After a good night's rest. It was very hot traveling and my Machela boys put me down every ten minutes right in the burning sun. Some of the forest trees looked very beautiful, as if huge hanging baskets were suspended from the branches, the pretty parasites taking that form.

Next day we rose at five; were on our journey at half past six, and breakfasted at Sitza's kraal. We had to travel several miles over country where the grass fires had blackened everything, and the crunching of the burned grass under the boys' feet sounded as if they were walking on cinders.

Next morning we reached the Sabi River about nine, crossed it and then had a delightful bath, after which we started on again for the next kraal. We had to pitch our tent in the ploughed lands. The women came round me in great curiosity, never having seen a white woman before. I talked to them and found they knew nothing about God. I gave a tiny child a spoonful of sugar in my little hand. About a dozen women and children each took a little pinch to taste, and exclaimed, "Muhle! Muhle!" They had never tasted sugar before.

Our caravan now made a long line as we walked the native paths in single file. When we came to paths that branched off from the road we were traveling, the leader would make with a stick in the sand the form of a cross so that all that followed might know which road to take. When we came to Chigombe's kraal (a very large one), we heard the tom-toms some time before we reached the place and knew they were having a "beer drink." When we arrived we found they were in a heathen dance. We saw heathenism in one of its wildest forms. There was a large ring of men and women, and while the tom-tom played and the women chanted, first one and then another would run into the ring, their bodies almost naked, and feathers and other grotesque things sticking out all over their heads. Flourishing their assegais, bows and arrows, clubs, etc., they would leap and jump and stab an imaginary enemy. Some got into quite a frenzy. It Chigombe, the chief, came to see us and Mr. Wodehouse gave him a blanket; it was very funny to see him put it round his shoulders and then dance before us! He sent us a sheep for a present. We left at 6 A.M., rested at a kraal where we bought meal for the boys; then went on till we came to a very nice kraal. The chief was a quiet old man. Mr. Wodehouse gave him a blanket, and he in return sent us a goat. There is a beautiful river here running over sparkling sand. Mr. Wodehouse and I wandered down its banks and took a most enjoyable bath in its limpid waters.

Next we visited the kraal of Masuka, an influential "king." He is a nice, quiet old man, and would "like the missionary to come to his country." We saw a number of women at the threshing-floor, threshing with sticks. Toward evening, we reached a kraal where a woman has rule, and where they call her the "Ishi."

On the following night we heard a lion in the distance, at Gonela's kraal. We were told the lions had been there lately. There is a watch tower at the entrance to the kraal, where three men sleep every night with guns on account of lions, as they trouble their cattle. There were also reins stretched across hung with tins to serve as an alarm. The end of this rein is put through a hole in the hut, and if any lions are about, they pull it and make the tins rattle and are frightened away.

We had not been long in bed last night when we heard the lions roar. Mr. Wodehouse looked out of the tent and told Charles to tell the boys to make up blazing fires, as the lions were around, but he had already heard them and soon the fires were crackling and blazing. We thought it best to dress in case of an emergency.

We heard the lions off and on all night. They did not seem far away, and of course sleep was impossible. About four o'clock in the morning there was a prolonged roar, as if two or three were roaring together; but it proved to be their farewell, as we did not hear them afterwards. To our great joy, the morning soon dawned. How glad we were to hear the roosters at the neighboring kraal, and to feel that the night of terror was past. How good is our God that he did not permit was very strange to see them leap high into the air and, while off the ground, strike out their feet behind. They seem never to get tired. They must have been at it a good while before we came; after dark they were as hard at it as ever. It was quite impossible to have a service with them, they were so excited with the drink. We were kept awake till early next morning with the tom-toms and the shouts of the people. It seemed as if pandemonium were let loose. What a terrible thing heathenism is!

The Question OF THE Centuries

TEXT—Matt. 22: 42

"What think ye of Christ?"

THREE objects, partly natural and partly architectural, I have seen which meet the reasonable expectations aroused by the descriptions of travelers—the Alhambra, in Granada, Spain; the Japan Sea, and the glorious Taj Mahal, in Agra, India. Three works of artistic genius, each superb of its kind, have I seen which satisfy reasonable expectations—Raphael's "Transfiguration," Canova's "Penitent Magdalen," and the mysterious Sphinx. Three products of literary skill have I read, each almost perfect of its kind—Shakespeare's Hamlet, Milton's Paradise Lost, and Tennyson's In Memoriam. Three men have I studied, magnificent, majestic, and well nigh matchless—Moses the Lawgiver, Paul the Apostle, and Luther the Reformer.

But no one of these objects of nature or works of art, and no one of these men was ideal. The ideal man has not yet been discovered. Humboldt, who traveled far, saw much and felt more, recorded in his diary this sentence, "The finest fruit earth holds up to its Maker is a man." It is here implied that this finest fruit is the ideal man. But Humboldt did not affirm that he had ever found this man. The ideal man has not yet been discovered among those who were mere men. No one of our noblest men was a spotless sun; no one reached sinless perfection. From all our loftiest specimens of manhood I turn dissatisfied to Jesus Christ, and in him I find the ideal becomes actual, the dream real, and the hope fruition. He rises in unapproachable glory, not only above men, but also above saints and seraphs, and above angels and archangels. Gazing upon him, we can exclaim with inexpressible enthusiasm and unutterable ecstasy, "Ecce Homo!" and, with the same breath and with equal truth, we can also reverently exclaim, "Ecce Deus!"

The Great Question

The question of my text, "What think ye of Christ?" now presses upon our consideration. The setting of this text is instructively suggestive. For some time in his discussion with the Pharisees, our Lord had been acting on the defensive. Both Sadducees and Pharisees had been asking him questions. His answers put the Sadducees to silence, and their confusion greatly gratified the Pharisees. It is now their turn to experience similar confusion from the celerity and dexterity of his replies. Never was there so skilful a debater as Jesus Christ. He was masterful in his clarity of thought, simplicity of speech, and purity of motive.

In the case before us, he passes from the defensive to the offensive, and he convicts Scribes and Pharisees of entertaining false views of the Messiah. They had disputed his claims as a spiritual Messiah, and he now shows the irreconcilable contradiction between their views of him as a mere worldly Messiah, and the teaching of their own prophetic Scriptures. They were silenced and even stunned by his rapid, aggressive, and unanswerable attack. We are significantly told that "no man was able to answer him a word, neither durst any man from that day forth ask him any more questions."

It must, doubtless, be admitted that there are men in every community, who have no definite convictions regarding Jesus Christ. It seems almost incredible that in a community of culture and Christianity men and women should be found who have not reached definite conclusions regarding the person and character of Christ. I put then the question with the utmost directness, "What think ye of Christ?" This is the broadest, deepest, and loftiest question ever put to the human race. This is the question of all the ages.

A Humiliating Confession

My friend, the late Dr. Charles S. Robinson, once told me in his study, while we were discussing this text, that he asked a prominent business man what he thought of the Christ, and the man replied frankly, "I suppose I never do think of Jesus Christ." Then Dr. Robinson inquired of the man when he was born, and he gave the date, 1843. "B.C. or A.D.?" the doctor asked. The man remained silent in his confusion. Here was a man who had been dating letters for many years, and was thus commemorating the birth of Jesus Christ, and living in a world whose civilization is radiant with the glory of Christ, and yet he frankly acknowledged that he had no definite thoughts regarding this unique personage.

This was a humiliating confession for this man to make. Such a confession in this century argues some degree of social inferiority, intellectual inanity, and moral vacuity. It is astounding that men professing even average intelligence should not have reached well-defined views of the character of Jesus the Christ. His birthday gave the race a new era, and every man who dates a letter or a ledger pays tribute to his nativity. His life and teaching are shaping the literature, the art, the architecture, and the music of the world. His spirit has given us immortal paintings, and his hand has virtually carved the greatest figures in the modern galleries of sculpture throughout the world. He has inspired the sublimest oratorios of Bach, of Handel, of Haydn, of Mozart, of Beethoven, and of Mendelssohn. Jesus Christ has created a new world along all the lines of art, music, architecture, and literature for time and eternity. He is the most puissant force known among men since the creation of the race. The man who has no convictions concerning Jesus Christ is intellectually and morally an equally pitiful and reprehensible creature. He is no honor to any circle in life in which he moves.

People Who Know Not Christ

In our churches, there are no hearers unwilling to admit that Jesus Christ is at least a great historic character. They frankly admit that he was born at Bethlehem, brought up at Nazareth, and crucified at Jerusalem. They are entirely correct in the outward features of his earthly career, but they have comparatively little conception of the spiritual significance of his wonderful life and his vicarious death.

They think of the historical elements of his wonderful life as they would think of those of Buddha, Zoroaster, or Mohammed. Their conception of his earthly life has no power over the development of their own lives, except as a mere character of history. They fail to see that his was a unique life, and that it was lived on earth by him, that it might be lived in some measure over again on earth by us. They fail to see that he became the son of man, that we might become the sons of God. They do not learn that he revealed the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man that we should sweetly experience the one, and constantly illustrate the other. The historic Christ has no more power over the practical lives of some, than the traditional heroes of classic legend. Virtually for them there is no Christ of God. Practically for them there is no historic Christ. Until the historic Christ is translated into a personal Saviour and Master, controlling our acts, our words, and our thoughts by his matchless example, his unique personality, and his spiritual purity, there is for us no historic Christ worthy the name.

Tributes to Divine Perfection

There are those who think of the Christ as a dreamy, sentimental and poetic character. They are charmed by the commendable characteristics of his remarkable life. They refer to him in terms of soothing speech and of dreamy affection. There is an element of poetry in all their conceptions of the divine-human Christ. They think of him in language which the robust Chalmers called, in his lofty scorn, "nursery endearments." They are ready to adopt the language of the renowned French theologian, eminent Orientalist, and brilliant rhetorician, Renan, when he speaks of the Christ of God as the "sweet Galilean." Such epithets must be utterly unwelcome to Christ. If he be not more than man, then he is less than man. If he be not worthy of our loftiest devotion, he is certainly worthy of our severest reprehension. In a word, if he be not God, he is not a good man.

Carlyle described materialism as a "gospel of dirt;" we might fittingly describe this sweet and silly sentimentalism as a "gospel of gush." Only as we bow down at Christ's feet, and worship him as the divine-human Man, can we give him the honor which he merits and demands. Then we can employ and sanctify the loftiest poetry in chanting his praise, the noblest art in limning his person, and the profoundest logic in urging his claims upon men as the divine-human Saviour. There are many who are willing to admit and who earnestly affirm that Jesus Christ is the ideal Man of the human race. They are ready to declare that it was glorious thing that man was originally made in God, and that it was a still more condescending thing that God was made like man. The Christ was indeed the ideal man of the human race. He was the great exemplar, the perfect model, the sublime original, to be imitated by all true men and women. him, and in him only, the plant of humanity blossomed and bloomed into a perfect flower.

How Account for Jesus?

But how can we account for the perfection of humanity, if we deny the reality of his divinity? We ought, as students of literature and life, account for Jesus the Christ. We strive to account for Socrates and Plato, for David and Isaiah, for Paul and Luther, for Washington and Gladstone, for Lincoln and McKinley. Are we not under the strongest possible obligations to account for Jesus Christ? Men say that Jesus Christ was good, but that he was not God. Out of their own mouths these men convict themselves of inconsistency in their locutions and illogicality in their reasonings. If Jesus Christ be not God, he is not good. He is either an unpardonable egotist, or a hopeless lunatic, or he is the Christ of God, and God over all, blessed forever more. He claimed to be God, and if his claim be not true, how can he be good? The stream of his life flowed through the human race on a higher level, and rose to a vastly higher point, than any other stream known to human history or divine revelation. How shall we account for the height to which that stream rose? Water can never rise higher than its source. If that source were simply human, how can we account for the superhuman height which it reached? If we admit the account given in the Gospels of his virgin birth and divine origin, all his life is easily explicable.

The Sceptic and the Doubter

But if we deny his unique origin, we can not logically account for his unique life. A life begun as was never another life, we might expect to see continue as no other life continued. A naturally skeptical man finds it easier to admit the account of Christ's remarkable birth, than to attempt to explain his remarkable life, if he deny the remarkable birth. The unicity of his birth we would naturally expect to eventuate in the unicity of his life. His life can not be explained on any principle of heredity. We readily admit the royal element in his blood, although the fortunes of his family had fallen before his birth; but no law of heredity will account for the physical attractiveness, the mental superiority, and the moral purity of Jesus the Christ. Neither will environment account for his marvelous career and character. What was there in the peasant conditions of his family life to produce the uniqueness of his manhood? Neither will education account for the Christ. He was never in school, in the technical sense of that term, although he doubtless studied in the village synagogue; and yet he rose above all the limitations, traditions, and bigotries by which he was surrounded. It is doubtful if he ever sat at the feet of the greatest rabbis of the time. It is certain that he never studied at the feet of the philosophers of Greece and Rome, nor of the dreamy Orient. He never traveled, except possibly barely across the confines of Palestine, a country about the size of the State of New Hampshire. How came he to emancipate himself from the sectarianism and sectionalism of his country and century? How came he to be the contemporary of all the ages? How came he to utter in the Sermon on the Mount truths which socially and religiously the foremost thinkers of to-day can barely understand, and dare not fully apply to the solution of the problems of the hour? No mere human thinker has ever approached the Sermon on the Mount. But in pure spirituality of thought, our Lord surpassed it in his last address to his disciples. This address bears the ineffaceable marks of his supreme divinity and absolute deity. O ye critics, I ask you as a problem of literature and life to account for Jesus the Christ. I ask no favors for him. It is you that need the favors, if you oppose the Christ. I demand for him simple justice. "What think ye of the Christ?"

Dr. Geikie, in his Life of Christ, calls attention to the fact that the Jews confess great admiration for the character and words of Jesus; that the Mohammedan world gives him the high title of Messiah; that the myriad-minded Shakespeare paid him lovely

THE PAN-ANGLICAN CONGRESS

It Closes To-Day With a Mighty Thank-Offering of Men and Means for Gospel Service

DURING the past week, the Pan-Anglican Congress—a congress of the whole Anglican Church—has been in session in London. Its representatives come from at least two hundred and forty-eight dioceses in all parts of the world. Africa, China, Japan, the United States and Canada, England, Scotland, Ireland and Wales, India and the West Indies are represented. All representatives within the limits of the British Isles are paying members of the Congress; all beyond these limits are honorary delegates. Six accredited delegates are allowed from each diocese and there are thousands in actual attendance, including many notable men of the clergy and laity, and including also many women who participate and have their own auxiliary meetings and conferences. The fact that of the large number of dioceses represented, only thirty-seven are actually in England and Wales, shows how world-wide and comprehensive is the representation.

What may be called the setting of the Congress is superb. Beginning with a celebration of the Holy Communion at Westminster Abbey on the morning of June 15, and ending with a great service in St. Paul's Cathedral on June 24, the many meetings of the Congress between these dates will be held in Westminster Church House and Albert Hall. Sermons and addresses in all parts of London and England accompany and follow the Congress. Social side issues and the cooperation of many London clubs and societies broaden the scope of its influence. Indeed, the interests of the Congress temporarily dominate the life of London and that of all England also. The Congress engages the personal interest and leadership of the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishop of London and a host of English, American and Colonial Bishops, for whom the Lambeth Conference will follow in July.

Prominent among the numerous prelates from this country is the Right Reverend Doctor Tuttle, Bishop of Missouri and Presiding Bishop of the American Church. The contact of those ordinarily thousands of miles apart; the touch of many men of many minds and the assembling of scattered and diversified opinions; the comparison of worldwide experiences; the exhibition of the unity of the Anglican Church by the bringing together of such a representative multitude of many nationalities, so to speak, under one flag, one creed, one hope—these are the elements of the power of this great Congress.

Westminster Abbey

A bare category of themes for discussion shows that this is indeed an occasion of earnest thought, and of consideration by experts of matters that concern all sides of human life and experience. The Church and Human Society; Christian Truth and Other Intellectual Forces; the Church's Ministry; the Church's Duty to the Young; the Church's Missions in Non-Christian Lands; the Church's Missions in Christendom; the Anglican Communion, are the seven great themes capable of subdivision. Under these heads are to be considered the Sanctity of Marriage; Morality in Commercial and Social Life; Capital and Labor; Monopolies and Trusts;

Christianity and Socialism; Christian Revelation; Philosophy and Morality; Religion and Science; Religion and the Press; the Critical Study of the Bible; Vocation, Recruiting, Training of the Ministry; the Ministry of Women; the Ministration of Laymen, etc., etc. Such themes require vastly more than the inspiration and emotion of the moment. They demand careful preparation of both speakers and hearers. To this end they have been considered in public discourses and writings for the past four years at least. Some one has wittily charged the Congress with being dedicated to a heathen god. In sober earnest, it is dedicated to the one true God who rules in all the affairs of men; and to revealed truth, by which all human standards of right and wrong should be measured and squared.

The hopes and plans of the church for the spread of the Gospel throughout the world will be expressed with a new force by the Pan-Anglican Congress. Plans for the development of independent churches will be set far forward. New light will be thrown upon the most vital questions, and new confidence inspired for the solution of hard life-problems. So, while not technically to be called a missionary assembly, it will be such in the highest practical way.

At the closing service in St. Paul's Cathedral to-day a great thank-offering of money will be made, amounting doubtless to a very large sum, gathered from all parts of the world, the appropriation of which will be most carefully decided by the highest authority of the church. But more significant than this will be a thank-offering of men. A Bishop of England, Suffragan to the Bishop of Winchester, has offered himself to be one of ten men of his diocese, to go wherever needed and sent; and he calls upon other dioceses to make the same offering. Whereunto, indeed, will this grow? What shall be impossible in the advancement of God's kingdom and evangelizing of the world, if there be this revival of apostolic spirit and method, to overwhelm the self-seeking and expedience-worshiping limitations of modern times? One masterful thought should be in all our minds and hearts: for the glory of God and the spread of his everlasting kingdom.

reference, and that men like Galileo, Kepler, Bacon, Newton, and Milton set the name of Christ above every other name. He also reminds us that Jean Paul Richter, whom his countrymen call "Der Einzige," the unique, tells us that "the life of Christ concerns him who, being the holiest among the mighty, the mightiest among the holy, lifted with his pierced hands empires off their hinges, and turned the stream of centuries out of its channel, and still governs the ages." Spinoza, the great philosopher, son of Portuguese Jews, disciple of Descartes, calls Christ the symbol of divine wisdom. Schelling and Hegel speak of him as the union of the divine and human. The immortal Goethe, the acknowledged prince of German poets, and one of the most superbly accomplished men of the eighteenth century, says, "I esteem the Gospels to be thoroughly genuine, for there shines forth from them the reflected splendor of a sublimity, proceeding from the person of Jesus Christ, of so divine a kind as only the divine could ever have manifested on earth."

What thinkest thou of the Christ, O Jean Jacques Rousseau, with all the brilliancy of thy intellect, the singularity of thy character, and the enthusiasm of thy writings? Give place to the witness Rousseau; hear his testimony. Rousseau speaks: "How petty are the books of the philosophers, compared with the Gospels! Can it be that writings at once so sublime and so simple are the work of men? Can he whose life they tell be himself no more than a mere man?"

Yes, if the death of Socrates be that of a sage, the life and death of Jesus are those of a God. What thinkest thou of the Christ, burly, brusque, brave, and heroic Thomas Carlyle, with all thy marvellous reading, thy profound thinking, and thy contempt of cant and love of truth? Carlyle steps forward and speaks: "Jesus of Nazareth, our divinest symbol! Higher has the human thought not yet reached." Let us summon Dr. Channing, the cultured and eloquent preacher and writer, the foremost man among American Unitarians in his day. What thinkest thou, O Channing, of Jesus Christ?

He makes reply: "The character of Jesus Christ is wholly inexplicable on human principles."

A true conception of Christ's ideal humanity leads us to the assertion of his real divinity. We shall not, however, at this point spend time in splitting theological hairs. We may be able to pass the examination of a church council on our knowledge of divine sovereignty and human freedom, or on any of the "isms" of ancient or modern heterodoxy, and yet we may be spiritually dead. We may recite creeds by the yard, and yet be black in heart and vile in life. A dead orthodoxy may be worse than a live heterodoxy. Creeds may be as powerless over our lives as the multiplication table. We must know Jesus Christ as the vicarious sacrifice of sin, and as our personal Lord and Saviour. The atonement is the heart of theology. The cross is the centre of the universe. It is the pivot around which all the great events of history revolve. The historian and the philosopher, as truly as the theologian, must build their studios on Calvary.

Jesus Christ is the heart of the Bible. He is the Shiloh in Genesis; the I Am in Exodus; the Star and Sceptre in Numbers; the Rock of Deuteronomy; the Captain of the Lord's Host in Joshua, and the Redeemer in Job. He is David's Lord and Shepherd; in the Song of Songs he is the Beloved; in Isaiah he is the Wonderful Counselor, the Mighty God, the Everlasting Father, and the Prince of Peace. In Jeremiah he is the Lord our Righteousness. In Daniel he is the Messiah; in Zachariah he is the Branch; in Haggai he is the Desire of all Nations; in Malachi he is the Messenger of the Covenant and the Sun of Righteousness; and in the book of Revelation he is the Alpha and Omega and also the Morning Star.

I summon thee, O execrable Judas. Behold him flinging down the thirty pieces of silver before the chief priests and elders. Hear him speak in his agony of soul: "I have sinned in that I have betrayed the innocent blood." I summon thee, O Pontius Pilate, with thy immortality of shame in the creeds of the ages. The Roman procurator washes his hands. Strange sight! He speaks: "I am innocent of the blood of this just person." He speaks again: "I find no fault in this man." I summon John, the heroic Baptist. Hear his testimony: "Behold the Lamb of God, who taketh away the sin of the world." O loving and divine John, the Evangelist, what thinkest thou of the Christ? "He is the Vine, the Way, the Truth, the Light, and the Word, and the Word was God." I summon thee, O matchless Paul. What is thy testimony? "He is the image of the invisible God. . . . The blessed and only Potentate, the King of kings, the Lord of lords." I summon thee, Apostle Peter, once confessor, then denier, but afterward penitent witness and heroic martyr. What is thy testimony? "He is the Christ, the Son of the living God." I summon thee, O once doubting but always brave Thomas. Hear the testimony of this witness as he falls at the Master's feet and exclaims, "My Lord and my God!"

I summon thee, O Gladstone, noblest of statesmen, uncrowned king of the world, thou who didst come in contact with the throbbing life of the world, of politics, letters, and religions. What sayest thou concerning humanity's greatest need? "I am asked what a man should chiefly look to in his progress through life, as to the power that is to sustain him under trials and enable him manfully to confront his afflictions. The older I grow, the more confirmed I am in the belief that Jesus Christ is the only hope of humanity."

I summon thyself, O thou Christ of God, thou holiest of the holy, thou who art God of very God. What sayest thou of thyself? "Before Abraham was I am." "I and my Father are one." "He that hath seen me, hath seen the Father."

O men and women in our churches, I ask you all in his own glorious name and in his own solemn words, "What think ye of Christ?" I beseech you in the name of him before whose bar all must stand, that each one of you now fall at Jesus' feet, and utter with Thomas, out of penitent and believing hearts, this confession of faith and love, "My Lord and my God!"

A Legislative Hero

BY a vote of 26 to 25, the New York State Senate on June 11 passed the Anti-Race-Track Gambling bills, to the consternation of the gamblers' lobby, who had confidently predicted their defeat. The fate of the bills had practically rested with one man, Senator Otto G. Foelker of Brooklyn, who went from a sickroom, against the protests of his physician and the pleadings of his wife and his friends, to do his duty. They warned him that a railroad journey, so shortly after a serious surgical operation, might cost him his life; but to all he simply replied: "I am going."

Foelker's act was heroic. He risked his life to save the morals of the State. He stood ready to become a martyr, if need be, for principle's sake. His presence alone saved from defeat and carried to victory the measures that will rid the State of race-track gambling and vindicate the constitution, which the gamblers have trampled under foot. Others have fought well in the same battle, and Governor Hughes and the friends and supporters of the reform have earned the people's gratitude. But the popular love and admiration will be given to the man who stood ready, like Arnold von Winkelried at Sempach, to welcome death, if it only opened the clear path to victory.

Otto Foelker is of humble stock, but he has in him the stuff of which statesmen and heroes are made. The highest eminence in this republic has been scaled by such as he.

In God's House

IT is always with wonder and delight that we linger in a great conservatory, to see the trees and plants and flowers from other and distant climes. There we realize what a world of beauty lies beyond the place where we dwell. The cold winds of winter may beat without; but within is genial warmth and the sweet odor of flowers of strange and wondrous beauty. These all seem to have a voice and speak of another world, where is the tree of life with its twelve manner of fruits, which grow beside the river of God. They all speak to us of the flowers of that heavenly life which "eye hath not seen."

How beautiful should the church of God be! When a stranger enters seeking rest from sin, he should breathe an atmosphere filled with the sweet odor of holiness. He should come face to face with men whose lives and communion with God ever speak of a distant, sweeter, holier world. Alone we bend the head in prayer in the house of God and see the beauty of the Rose of Sharon, and its sweet odor refreshes our weary souls. The place becomes filled with the Divine Presence. We may see visions of God and of those fair trees which grow by the sacred riverside.

To Make 20,000 Happy

IN ONE of his delightful sketches, Dickens tells of a modest little charity founded by a big-hearted man, who endowed a quiet retreat where six poor travelers should be sheltered and hospitably entertained. It was a sort of pioneer Bowery Mission on a small scale, in the heart of London. It wasn't an enterprise to set the world aflame with admiration; but it is quite possible, in a small way, to do a great deal of good. Who knows how many worthy charities it has been the means of bringing into life? A few years ago, an old and wealthy New Yorker, dying, left his large fortune as a foundation to help the deserving poor and his millions are no doubt doing an excellent work to-day. Mrs. Sage's money too has its mission in true benevolence, for she has done many practical things with it besides endowing colleges and giving a mile of rhododendron trees to the public parks.

Now we learn of a Californian who announces his purpose of devoting his entire inheritance of ten million dollars to the work of making 20,000 persons happy. His own personal needs would not even require the income of his estate. His plan is a broad Samaritan one: he will help those who are struggling to help themselves. One might naturally suppose that this would exclude the chronically idle and the worthless, but our Californian will be a benefactor even to the bad. "I am going to help bad people as well as good," he declares.

"Churches and respectable folks care for the good people, but the bad have no one but the devil and the police. I want to give help to the intemperate, the ex-convict, the girl who has to hang her head, and the man who has made a failure of himself. Lots of us can resist everything except temptation, you know."

This is good Gospel logic, though the worldly-wise and the hypercritical may call him a fool for his pains. If our Californian succeeds in throwing even a single gleam of encouragement across the track of those who have made shipwreck of life, he will have accomplished more than if he built and endowed massive structures, reared statues and filled art galleries. He will have built for himself a temple of loving-kindness in the hearts of his fellowmen.

Traps for the Boys

ONE of the most astonishing disclosures of the peculiar tactics pursued by the liquor men in their campaign against sobriety is found in the following from the Rev. John F. Hill, Secretary of the Presbyterian Permanent Temperance Committee of Pittsburg, Pa. Mr. Hill writes:

The writer has before him a printed ticket handed him by a schoolboy in a neighboring town, who informs him that "Lots of the boys get these tickets. They are passed 'round.'" The card reads thus:

TO SHIPPING ROOM:
GIVE BEARER GLASSES BEER.
FROM OFFICE OF
THE BREWING CO.
W....., PA.

Of course, there can be but one object in giving these cards to the boys: it is to awaken within them the passion for drink. What are we to think of a business which deliberately plans to debase childhood and to prepare boys to become graduates of the saloon?

This is no exaggerated picture, drawn by "temperance fanatics," as the saloon men would declare it. It is cold, hard, brutal, un-American fact. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has seen the cards described by the Rev. Mr. Hill, and all he has stated is undeniably true. Nor is Pennsylvania the only State where such an outrageous propaganda of drunkenness is carried on. In Los Angeles (Calif.), according to one of the local journals, there is a club, supported by the liquor interest of course, whose purpose it is to teach boys to drink. In Chicago, Mr. Hill asserts, there are on a single street twenty saloons, each of which has a children's annex, where toys and juvenile books are spread to attract the little folks, and where "they are treated to sweetened wine."

A FLEETING OPPORTUNITY

LEST you forget one of the conditions imposed by our Special Subscription Offer printed in last week's issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD we again remind you that no subscription mailed to us after July 5th can be accepted at the greatly reduced rate now open to new subscribers.

What We Plan To Do

Here are the cardinal points: THE CHRISTIAN HERALD family already includes some 215,000 members—a great family that on more than a few occasions has made its tremendous influence felt throughout the land and the world at large.

Now to promote our share in the world's work, to make THE CHRISTIAN HERALD twice the power in the land that it is to-day, and to make it more attractive and interesting in every way to our readers, we are determined to do two things: first, increase our subscription list to at least 300,000 in the immediate future and ALSO raise the standard of the paper itself—contents, illustrations, quantity and quality.

Our Special Offer

We agree to send THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for eight successive months to any NEW subscriber at exactly half the regular subscription price, or, for 50 cents. This is far below the cost of production, but we are willing to go to the furthest extent that we can possibly afford in our effort to enlarge our family and improve and enrich our publication.

How You Can Help

We simply ask that you will take advantage of every opportunity during the next ten days to put in a good word for us with your friends and acquaintances and your many associates in Church or Sunday School who may know us only by name. Tell them the many reasons why YOU take THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and of the fleeting opportunity that still holds good to get an eight months' subscription for only 50 cents.

As these subscriptions run from July 1, 1908, to March 1, 1909, they include all the special issues during the year: July 4th, Labor Day, Thanksgiving, Christmas, New Year and Washington's Birthday Numbers—some of which alone are worth the price paid for an eight months' subscription.

Do Not Write Long Letters

When sending in your orders, simply write on a piece of paper:

Name of new subscriber.....
Street address of new subscriber.....
Post-office of new subscriber.....
County and State of new subscriber.....
Amount enclosed for this subscription.....
Name and address of sender to whom the reward is to be sent.....
Title of reward selected.....

You need not write a letter. We will understand what to do if you will give the particulars mentioned above and the remittance.

A Reward for Every New Subscriber

Finally, as a token of our appreciation of your efforts in this campaign, we will send you for every new subscription, any one of the six beautifully printed, handsomely bound books which you will find more fully described in our previous announcements.

An hour spent among your friends will surely enable you to get six new subscribers under this offer and thus make yourself possessor of a fine library of six books.

For full details see our issues of June 10 and 17. Address your subscriptions to

King and President

THE last week of May was a memorable one in the social and political life of London, and one which stirred France and England alike with feelings of enthusiastic pride and brotherly love. It was the occasion of the official visit of M. Fallières, President of the French Republic. President Fallières is one of those superb men of large mental and moral proportions, who command the admiration of their own people not only, but of other nations as well. While the grand reception was given to his nation through him, yet his splendid ability and personal charm added greatly to the heartiness of his reception. A leading English journal says: "Wherefore it is by a sound instinct of statesmanship that the French Parliament chooses such men as a Loubet or a Fallières to fill the presidential chair, and no Frenchman need despair of the Republic so long as France can find a succession of such men to fill it. A dynasty, if we may so call it, of modest but substantial merit."

From the time the President set his foot on the shore at Dover, till the hour he said farewell to England, his reception in the palaces and parades and public halls and expositions was the best that England could do. As he was leaving, one of the London papers said: "While France chooses men of such real worth to preside over her affairs, she may face the future with a light heart. He represents all that is best in the national character; the shrewdness, cheerfulness, patient determination and eloquence."

The chief significance of the visit, of course, was the binding closer together of the two nations in the Franco-British Alliance. In commenting on King Edward's speech at the reception of the President, a leading paper says: "The friendship between England and France is, in a sense, the keystone of the European political situation and a lasting guarantee of European peace. It serves at once to check ambition and to dispel suspicion; it carries the civilized world some few steps further on the hard road leading to freedom from the excessive burden of armaments and the unending preparation for war. It suggests, too, when we look back upon the comparative youthfulness of the Anglo-French friendship, that no differences between nations need be permanent, and that when the seed of complete understanding has been sown it needs but a little time to blossom and bud and fill the face of the earth with fruit." At this demonstration of national fraternity, the civilized world rejoices.

Let the nations be glad and sing for joy. (Psa. 67: 4.)

Largest Clock on Earth

Mayor Wittpen of Jersey City the other day touched an electric button that set in motion a clock on the roof of a well-known soap-factory, which is the largest timepiece in the world. The dial is thirty-eight feet across, the hour hand is fifteen feet long and the minute hand twenty feet long, and with its counterpoise weighs nearly a third of a ton, while the machinery that moves it weighs 2,000 pounds. At night the hands are outlined with incandescent lights, red lights marking each numeral and the incandescent lamps each minute mark. The tip end of the minute hand travels twenty-four inches every minute.

There have been many curious clocks in the history of the world, from the first one introduced into Europe, when the famous Eastern caliph, Haroun-al-Raschid, presented a wonderful clock to Charlemagne. In the dial of it were twelve small doors forming the divisions for the hours. Each door opened at the hour marked by the index and let out small brass balls, which, falling on a bell, struck the hours. The famous clock in the Cathedral of Strasburg is the standard of time for many of the cities of the world. It was built in 1439, and when Isaac Habrecht, its maker, died, it ran down and was dead for two hundred years, because no one knew how to make it go. It was started again in 1681. A figure of Time, in a niche on one side, strikes the quarter hours from twelve to one, and four figures—Childhood, Youth, Manhood and Old Age—pass slowly before him. In a niche on the other side is an angel turning an hour-glass.

But there is no clock in the world so large as the one just started, which looks out upon the Hudson River. It will tell the children when to go to school, the laboring man when to begin his work, the housekeeper when to prepare her meals, the ships and trains the time to start. If the beholders will look with keen enough eyes, they will discover Time measuring off the little spaces to them and an angel with an hour-glass in his hand, and they will be inspired to diligence and the right use of every opportunity and a preparation for the eternal life where time shall be no more.

And the angel sware by him that liveth forever and ever, that there should be time no longer. (Rev. 10: 6.)

Careers for Millionaires

Some of the leading publications are now discussing the question of careers for America's young millionaires. They point out that in older lands the men of great wealth have other duties imposed upon them besides hunting, dinners, and the thousand and one allurements of social pleasure and recreation. There are evidences on many sides that try's greatness. Had they used their great wealth selfishly, their names would soon have been forgotten.

And to whomsoever much is given, of him shall much be required. (Luke 12: 48, R.V.)

A Lincoln Tablet

Five hundred members of the Grand Army of the Republic and their friends visited the Hamburg-American liner President Lincoln, lying at her pier in Hoboken, recently, to witness the unveiling of a bronze memorial tablet given by the National organization of the G. A. R. in memory of the great American whose name the liner bears. The tablet, engraved with the words of Lincoln's Gettysburg address, was placed at the head of the main companionway of the upper promenade deck. Captain Hebbinghaus, naval attaché to the German embassy at Washington, spoke. "This memorial," he said, "will recall to innumerable children of both nations when crossing the seas the memory of President Lincoln, the strong-hearted, great-minded, simple-mannered martyr of the highest ideals cherished by mankind." Lieutenant-Commander W. S. Sims, U. S. N., spoke of the existing friendly conditions between Germany and America and the fleet of the Hamburg-American Line, which had brought over so many men and women from the Fatherland to become good citizens of the United States. He had no doubt that when the present steamship President Lincoln became too old for the Atlantic service, the company would put on another larger steamship to carry the tablet to and fro, and that our children's children might yet see the tablet carried across the ocean on the airship President Lincoln. Lincoln was so great in mind and heart that he is considered the property of the North and South land, and of all the nations of the earth. There is One whom Lincoln loved and copied who was the ideal one and is being known, and will become the property of the whole world.

Wherefore God also hath exalted him, and given him a name which is above every name. (Phil. 2: 9.)

Rescued Six

In a fire at 302 East One Hundred and Third Street, New York, Margaret Euler, a girl of sixteen, rescued six children from death by suffocation. They were Elizabeth, George, Anna and William, children in her own family, and Ida and Moe Hecht, who live in an apartment adjoining. The children saved range from four to ten years of age. The mother had gone out to work, leaving the smaller children in the care of Margaret, who, learning of the fire, hurried into the rooms where her helpless little brothers and sisters were asleep in bed. She dressed them one by one and rushed with them through the tenement to the front, where the fire escape is located. Seeing that her own little folks were safe, and hearing screams in the outside hall in the smoke, she ran back and rescued the little Hecht children. John Summers and Benjamin W. Louis, of Fire Patrol No. 4, carried the children, who were overcome with the smoke, down the ladder into Third Avenue. Margaret said: "I really wasn't scared, but was afraid my little brothers and sisters would choke, and so I hurried. After I had taken our children out I ran back to see if anybody was there, and found the two Hecht children." It gives zest to life and highest inspiration to human endeavor, to see such a beautiful illustration of heroism upon the part of this little girl. That child crowded the doings and destinies of a hundred ordinary lives into the few minutes' space in which she saved six precious lives. With all the selfishness of life, with its heated competitions, there are heroes and heroines everywhere, tucked away in the cellars and garrets of poverty and gracing the palaces of wealth. Spiritual conflagrations are threatening the lives of thousands of people. What necessity there is of haste in rescuing these perishing souls!

Be of good courage, and let us behave ourselves valiantly for our people. (1 Chron. 19: 13.)

President Fallieres and His Secretary at Work

King Edward and the President at St. James' Palace

the rich of this country are slowly awakening to a realization of their opportunities and responsibilities in this respect. Of course, it is reasonably urged, no people need expect to develop within a few short generations a national literature, art or architecture that can be contrasted with the gradual development of many centuries in older lands. But apart from national or community development, there is the great question of individual careers open to wealthy Americans. Instead of being mere devotees of pleasure and fashion, with their highest ambitions running to elegant tournouts and yachts, they might follow the notable example of men of abundant means who have taken up various useful callings in order that their lives might not be idle or unfruitful. There are many fields of activity and achievement open to such "favorites of fortune." Let them look about them and note how others, blessed with abundant means, have consecrated both life and fortune and made them a blessing to many. Some have been patrons of art, founding great collections and endowing them for posterity. Others have been devoted to science, to philosophy, to sociology, to philanthropy, to exploration, to invention, to diplomacy, and to many different forms of activity by which the race has been benefited. In learning to live for others, they built their own fame upon enduring foundations and contributed to their coun-

SOME STRANGE CHINESE BELIEFS

ONE soul here often seems enough for its possessor. But what would you do with three? That is the number ascribed to each man of China's millions. In life the Chinaman often imagines he has lost one or more of his souls, and he then hunts very hard for it, even digs for it in the expectation of finding it in the ground. A mother may be seen hunting for a lost soul of her child. Some other person's soul may trouble one—and the soul of one's ancestor is something a Chinaman never ignores.

In China a coffin is a very proper gift from a son to a parent. When a man is thought to be dying he is washed, put in his grave-clothes, then in his coffin, and taken into the hall of his house. Often this treatment hastens his death or kills him outright. Then a priest comes, who exhorts the soul to leave the body. This soul is the one that dwells in the ancestral tablet.

Huge paper birds, raised on long poles, are supposed to carry the second soul to heaven on the twenty-first day of mourning. Fifty days of mourning are observed while the body is kept in the house in a closely sealed coffin. During all these days the family go out into the street, and, kneeling down in front of the house, wail bitterly. For the use of the soul which still remains in the body and is buried with it all the relatives send food and spirit-money offerings to be placed in front of the coffin. The soul is to eat the spirit of the food.

Where shall the last soul—and the body—be buried? This can not be decided by any one. There are professors of fung-swei, or good luck, who are consulted on this and every other occasion in life. If not consulted, the soul would have no repose and might return to disturb every one. The professor finally decides the day and burial place that will most probably bring luck to the family.

Dr. Martin, in his Cycle of Cathay, says that as the wood of the coffin is very thick, while the nails are embedded in cement and packages of quicklime placed under and around the body, there is never any odor, though it should remain unburied two years, as not unfrequently happens. But some olfactories do not entirely agree with him! Many stories told about fung-swei show how all-prevailing is the belief of the necessity for its professors. The age of these stories can not be computed, for "while the Britons still wore skins the Chinese wore silks" and wrote books and were a cultivated people. None of our myths are as old as those Chinamen tell of emperors and subjects.

A great favorite Chinese myth that proves the value of the "good-luck" professors most conclusively, is the story of an emperor who lived about three thousand years ago. A man's father had died. The professors on being consulted said the body must be burned, the ashes put in a bag, the bag taken to the bottom of a certain lake and placed in the mouth of a stone dragon there. The first part was easily done, but no diver able to stay under water long enough could be found. After many weary months a man named Chow undertook the task. His own father had just died, and he thought that what would benefit one man would surely help another. Therefore his own father's body was burned, the ashes duly put in a bag, which he carefully secreted under his clothes, and with both bags he descended to the bottom of the lake. He found the dragon. It opened its mouth and he put the bag with his father's ashes in it. The mouth closed. He could not stay under water any longer, so he hung the other bag on the horn of the dragon. Then he returned to the surface. His grandson became Emperor of China. The other man's son also attained greatness in a less exalted office.

Offerings for each soul must be made at proper times. The soul in heaven has perhaps the queerest offerings. When the soul arrives in heaven a constable takes it before the Judge to be tried—for the Chinese imagine that everything on earth is carefully duplicated in heaven. So, as bribery is common on earth, they think the constable in heaven can be bribed, and if only they offer him enough money he will say he cannot find the soul, and it is not tried for its sins.

All the money used for the souls in heaven is made of paper and is burned. The gods know no better. This paper money is made of many different materials. I have, for example, ingots of silver-paper money; of gold-paper money; of paper ready to be made into ingots, and of ingots made of straw carefully twisted in long strings. Fancy paste-board boxes hold the money, one favorite box having a glass lid with six piles of silver-paper coins inside.

One girl at Shanghai had become a Christian while her mother was still a heathen. She begged her mother before she died not to burn the usual soul-money for her. When the neighbors came with their boxes of paper money the mother said to all: "My daughter was a Jesus person. I cannot use these for her."

If a man has been waited on in life, the Chinese believe that he will require servants in the other world. Hence they buy figures of servants for the purpose. These figures may be of any size, according to one's purse. The two I have are just about a foot high. One is a woman carrying a tray for tea. The other is a man who holds a pipe for tobacco—a pipe half as long as the figure.

As a man wears clothes on earth, he must have clothes in the other world. Therefore, paper garments are made. If their clothes are of a higher rank than was that of the deceased, the gods will think him of that rank and treat him accordingly. A mandarin's suit means that the dead person will be treated in heaven as a mandarin. The equipment of the soul includes also packages of paper representing cloth, that the garments may be made in the other world. Boots, shoes, stockings, summer and winter undergarments, all may be needed. So real is the feeling of the necessity of supplying these wants that a woman has been known to pull down her house to secure, from the sale of the materials that composed the same, money with which to keep her husband's soul warm.

It is estimated, moreover, that over forty millions of dollars in real money is yearly spent on the offerings for the dead. The making of the garments, especially, offers a profitable occupation to many persons. When Chinamen become Christians the question arises of discontinuing the only means of support. So it is obvious that ancestor worship and the three souls complicate matters very much in the Celestial Empire.

TALKS ON THE COOL VERANDA

The Superfluous Old

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

WHAT is to become of the ordinary respectable aged person, who, after a life of hard work and usefulness, is stranded on a barren shore of poverty? Not long ago, a daily newspaper stated the case of an aged unmarried woman who had been loyal to her family through her youth, but who after seventy found her only remaining relatives a widowed sister dependent on the earnings of her daughters, and a brother who was absorbed in pushing forward the education of his children. There are usually many ways in which an old lady can make herself useful in a home, provided she is neither deaf nor blind and has not a difficult disposition, but if she have no means and it is not convenient for kindred to receive her, most families hesitate to give her employment. There are many possibilities in the case of the old. They may be well to-day and ill to-morrow. Young and strong people do not like to give them orders. A sort of uncertainty hovers about them, and where there is no sweet love of child, brother or sister to encompass them like an atmosphere and shield their infirmities if they have them, their fate is precarious. The elderly lady in question found an asylum in the home of her widowed sister, but presently she had a stroke and lost her eyesight, and soon after came another stroke and then she lost her mind. The doctor said she might live in this condition for years. Her nieces felt themselves unable to carry the burden of her support, her brother decided that his first duties were to his own household. What refuge remained, until death should come to release her, to this unfortunate survivor of youth, health and strength?

It gives the average gentle reader a shock to realize that Will Carleton's famous ballad, "Over the Hills to the Poor-house," was not a mere figment of fancy. There are aged mothers and aged fathers who are regarded by their children as afflictions, and are hustled from one home to another without reference to their own wishes and comfort. Aged parents with liberal incomes are seldom considered superfluous, and it is only just to say that in the narrow quarters of the very poor, parents are generally looked after by their children with considerable kindness. It is rather in households where an apparent degree of comfort is maintained, both in town and country, that men and women in the later years of life are treated as if they were unwelcome. Grandfathers and grandmothers, aged aunts and uncles and other people whom nobody wants are established at times in those retreats for derelicts, homes with a capital H, where the indigent and worthy old folk find care and shelter until they die. In these homes, managed on one plan or another, the old people spend their time, sometimes cheerfully and amiably, sometimes with a good deal of bickering. Quarreling to them is the last remaining spice that makes monotony endurable. Upon entrance they pay the specified amount in some instances, while in others they put into the common treasury whatever little provision they have, always with the understanding that they shall receive medical attention in illness, food, warmth, and shelter, and at last a decent burial. To be sure, the residents in homes for the aged are not precisely objects of commiseration, yet no one can felicitate them on their situation. Somehow a large number of old people detached from their families and living together under an alien roof convey to the outsider an impression of folornness and loneliness.

To return to the proposition, what is to become of our superfluous old people, may a suggestion or two be pardoned? In the first place, the youngest and strongest of us is walking step by step the road that leads to old age. If it be at all practicable, something should be saved for the rainy day. Self-denial in youth and middle age may erect a barrier against want and dependence in the years of feebleness. Parents are far too ready to give up everything for children. Fathers and mothers have rights to their own lives, and should not too readily surrender these in favor of sons and daughters. An illustration in point was that of a man known to the writer, who had accumulated a large fortune by dint of sagacity and hard work. His only child married and he deeded to her and her husband everything that he possessed with an agreement that he was to receive a sufficient annuity until the end of his life. The annuity was paid only twice and the man who had possessed wealth faced penury, died in want and was buried by strangers.

The decent thing is for people of one blood to care for one another if they can. It ought to be regarded as a slur upon good breeding to have one's aged relatives partakers of charity. Still, something is to be said in behalf of young women who are straining every nerve to earn their own livelihood, and who, confronted by a dependent mother and an equally dependent aunt, decide that they can care for only one. The discussion is open to our readers. The editor of this page will be glad to hear from them, and to know what they think on a subject that may touch them closely before the end.

Vacation Work for Boys and Girls

MOVEMENT in the right direction is the effort to find work in the country during the summer vacation for high school pupils who can not afford to spend two months in idleness. No sooner had the Students' Aid Society of Manhattan announced its intention of looking out for positions on farms for city lads who were willing to work, than applications came in like a flood. Not hundreds, but thousands of ambitious boys begged for summer work. Merely to answer the correspondence incidental to the effort has been a tremendous task. A happy thought for several men who own large estates has been to undertake the planting of trees on barren hill-slopes, the work to be done by city boys under the direction of students from the Agricultural Department of Cornell University. Forestry is receiving a great deal of attention at the moment. The cutting down of vast tracts of woodland for purposes of commerce is denuding the land of its trees and must bring about results in climatic changes that will seriously interfere with health and safety in certain regions. When a timber belt disappears one barrier against destructive wind and hurricanes is removed. What will be the impoverished condition of this great country in years to come, if the wanton destruction of the forests proceeds and the planting of trees is neglected, no human foresight can predict. Our government is taking measures to plant trees in many localities, and forestry opens, as never before, an inviting and lucrative field for thoroughly educated men. In order to find a government position in this department a man must preferably be a college graduate and must have taken besides a special course at one of the great universities where instruction in forestry is given. Meanwhile, there is no reason why individual property owners should not do what they can for the benefit of the community and the nation. The owner of a princely domain who wishes to set out orchards of fruit or nut-bearing trees or to plant trees for shade in July and August may confer a lasting benefit on the young people who are growing up, if he will but give the boys a chance to work for him, letting them camp out, and thus helping them forward to vigorous manhood while also serving himself. The thing might easily be made a profitable business investment for all concerned, if care were taken in the selection of the boys and if a competent superintendent were engaged to manage their labor.

GOD, THE SUPREME RULER OF ALL

"SAMUEL told all the words of the Lord unto the people." How did Samuel come by the words of the Lord? Samuel had had open communication with God ever since that day when as a child God had spoken to him by name, and Samuel had answered, "Speak, Lord, for thy servant heareth." The words referred to in this instance were what God had spoken in reply to what Samuel had told God in regard to the people's request that he should give them a king.

"This will be the manner of the king that shall rule over you," oppressive in that he shall levy upon your sons to serve him in his army, and upon your daughters in that they shall do servile work for him in his court as confectioners and in his kitchen as cooks and bakers. "Grasping" also shall the king be in that he shall confiscate the best of your fields and olive yards and vineyards. And also in that he shall take your servants for his own, and, alas! a part of your flocks and herds.

"And ye shall cry out in that day because of your king." Samuel knew them better than they knew themselves, having been their judge "all the days of his life." He was now about seventy years old.

"And the Lord will not hear you in that day." They were thus forewarned. "Nevertheless." What a meaning in this word! Hardness of heart, soul blindness, alienation from God, wicked pride, ingratitude to God, for God had said to Samuel, "This is not against you but against me."

Samuel would gladly have had his sons succeed him in judging Israel, but they had proven themselves unworthy, and that was made an excuse by the people in asking for a king. But it was not all, for they frankly said they wanted to be like other nations with a grand leader as they went forth to battle. It has been suggested that possibly they may have been tired of having their prosperity depend upon their good character. "Hearken unto their voice." So said the Lord to Samuel. It was equivalent to saying, "Give them what they want and let them suffer the consequences." Then Samuel dispersed the crowd by sending every man to his own city.

Since then the "divinity that doth hedge a king" has been greatly reduced, largely through such prophetic teachings as those of Samuel. In Persia long centuries ago the following description was given of a king's daily movements: The perfume of Labyrinth was daily placed upon his head. He never stepped upon the ground. When he journeyed a chair of gold was carried that he might enter it upon leaving his chariot. When he walked in the gardens about his palace carpets of the most costly kind were placed before him. In all parts of the garden there were servants with chairs, waiting for him in case he should wish to rest. At night three hundred musicians sang low, sweet lullabys to him while he slept, and swung golden lamps as a charm for sleep. But kings are not now what they were then. Israel might not have desired the up-to-date sort of king that now goes about his realm very much as ordinary people do, save on state occasions. "The thousands of years between us and Persia have come in mercy and have empowered us to see in a king's heart or in a president's heart and deeds the full dignity of his office." And when a good ruler dies we mourn the absence of a soul not easy to be replaced. The ideal ruler of this Christian nation should be one—to quote the verse President Garfield kissed in his mother's Bible in taking the oath of office—"whose heart is in the hand of the Lord to turn it whithersoever he will." But the Bible has not only changed kings—it has in some lands displaced them. The story of Israel's first human king coming on the Sunday following "Independence Day," suggests a study of the divine foundations of our government, which has grown directly out of such prophetic teachings as those of Samuel.

This Is a Christian Nation

God is the Supreme Ruler—the Decalogue is the world's constitution. The codes of Justinian, Charlemagne, and Alfred, the "common law" of civilization, all rest on the Decalogue. The oath with which

*International Sunday School Lesson for July 5, 1908. Israel asks for a king. I Sam. 8:1-22. GOLDEN TEXT: "By me kings reign, and princes decree justice." Prov. 8:15.

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts*

all rulers in Christian lands enter upon their duties, kissing or touching the Bible, is in fact an oath of allegiance to God and his law. The saying in the Declaration of Independence that governments "derive their just powers from the consent of the governed" should be read with the further declaration in that document of "firm reliance upon Divine Providence." The Supreme Court, in a decision against the Louisiana Lottery, said: "The legislature can not barter away the public health or the public morals. The people themselves can not do it."

Patriotism is but another name for public sentiment, directed in this case not to one measure of public interest, but to the promotion of national welfare in its broadest sense. This is like a great head of water to be turned on any specific proposal for the public good. In the story of the selection of Saul to be Israel's king, Samuel pictures the intelligent patriot, who had been from boyhood loyal to God and to his country. A little boy, the son of missionary parents in China, had been thoroughly imbued with the American spirit through the teachings of his mother. At five years of age he was brought to the United States for the first time. As they were passing down the gangplank after the ship reached port the mother said: "There's your uncle!" The small boy replied in a spirited manner, "I want ular demand made by the Israelites for a king futes that statement. It is pointed out that N was popular in Rome; that the monster Philip was no less popular in Spain, and that Louis XI was called "the well beloved." All along the course history the voice of the people has cried out, "Crown him!" and the next day, "Kill him!" Plainly the voice of the people is often wrong. The best sort education for the people at such a time as this is consider some of our country's needs, and how they can be met.

A Higher Ideal

In naming our country's needs we place first, higher ideal of government. The Bible declares "The powers that be are ordained of God." That ought not to seem a strange doctrine in what our Supreme Court has called "a Christian nation." But when the writer stood with Rev. Dr. W. J. Robinson in the Pennsylvania House of Representatives, in defense of the Sabbath law, and he, with the solemnity of a bishop addressing a company of young ministers, reminded the legislators before him that they were civil "ministers," "ordained" of God, "called" to serve him and humanity by applying the law of Christ to civil affairs, it was manifestly to many of the politicians, and even to some of the Christians present, a novel view of politics. But when a certain senator declared the opposite doctrine, that "politics owes no allegiance to the Decalogue and the Golden Rule," the people speedily retired him from politics to prove that the law of Christ had not been so retired. It was logical that such a senator should shrink to a prize fight reporter. That Governor had caught the true spirit of the incarnation, the idea that exalted office is but opportunity for greater service, when he said, replying to a young man's profuse thanks for painstaking help in a matter of public service, "When I became Governor I was but covenanted to be the most helpful man in the State." The social settlements in which men of culture and wealth give, not their money but themselves to lift up the less favored by the grace of neighborly fellowship and service—they, too, are glimpses of Bethlehem.

Christian Citizenship

Another need of our country—a step towards realizing the higher ideal of government—is a better citizenship, which must be a Christian citizenship. That indefinite thing called "good citizenship" is not enough in these trying times. In the nation's capital, a generation or more ago, they started to build a monument to the father of his country, but when they had built only one-third of its height they found they had laid too weak a foundation and that if they added any more weight the whole would sink into the sand. And so for a generation the monument remained incomplete, a monument of somebody's incompetence. At last General Casey was set to redeem the mistake. Stone by stone he took out the inadequate foundation and replaced it piece by piece with a broader, stronger base, and then added to the shaft the remaining two-thirds, and finally brought forth the shining cap-stone with rejoicing, crying, "Grace, grace, unto it!" The structure of our national life must likewise have an adequate foundation.

Another need of our country, the outcome of Christian citizenship, is Christian statesmanship. Let me recur to that same monument of Washington, as seen from the most picturesque point of view, in the former office of the President, through an arched window right back of the desk, through which the President must look as he came from his private rooms to take up his daily duties. Each President saw there daily, as if framed in that arched window, a picture of what a President ought to be, of what the first President was, in the monument which, like him it celebrates, is simple and lofty and strong. New York reared a centennial arch in honor of Washington, and selecting from all his writings a single sentence to put upon it, adopted these words, in which Washington rebuked the substitution of expediency for right:

"LET US RAISE A STANDARD TO WHICH THE WISE AND THE HONEST CAN REPAIR. THE EVENT IS IN THE HAND OF GOD."

to see George Washington first." To all of us George Washington is "first in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen."

In Revolutionary times a company of Americans were gathered for worship one Sabbath morning in a church on Long Island. In walked a company of British soldiers and commanded them to sing "God save the king." The worshipers replied by joining in strong, full voices in the hymn:

Come, thou Almighty King,
Help us thy name to sing.

We quote from Washington's "Farewell Address" to show what our hero of liberty thought about the ruling of his nation by the Almighty King:

"Of all the dispositions and habits which lead to political prosperity, religion and morality are indispensable supports. . . . Let it be simply asked, where is the security for property, for reputation, for life, if the sense of religious obligation desert the oaths which are the instruments of investigation in courts of justice? And let us with caution indulge the supposition that morality can be maintained without religion. Whatever may be conceded to the influence of refined education on minds of peculiar structure, reason and experience both forbid us to expect that national morality can prevail in exclusion of religious principle."

It is a common saying that the voice of the people is the voice of God—"Vox populi, vox Dei." The pop-

BUT wasn't Margaret satisfied with what you did for the Whalens?" asked Dr. Spencer. "Yes," said Mrs. Kendall, "but there were still the others. Harry, that child has the whole Alley on her heart. I'm at my wits' end to know what to do. You heard her this afternoon—she didn't want to ride home because Patty must walk in New York. She looks askance at the frosting on her cake, and questions her right to wear anything but rags. Harry, what can I do?"

The man was silent.

"I don't know, dear," he said slowly, at last. "We must think—and think hard. Hers is not a common case. There is no precedent to determine our course. Small girls of five that have been reared in luxury are not often thrust into the streets and sweatshops of a great city and there forced to spend four years of their life—thank God! That those four years should have had a tremendous influence is certain. She can't be the same girl she would have been had she spent those years at her mother's knee. One thing is sure, however, seems to me. In her present nervous condition, if there is such a thing as getting her mind off those four years of her life and everything connected with it, it should be done."

The doctor paused, and at that instant a step sounded on the graveled driveway. A moment later a boy's face flashed into the light that streamed through the open door.

"Why, Bobby, is that you?" cried Mrs. Kendall.

"Yes, ma'am, it's me, please. Did Mag—I mean, Margaret—come home, please?"

"Yes, she came to-night."

Bobby hesitated. He stood first on one foot, then on the other. At last, very slowly, he dragged his right hand from behind his back.

"I been makin' it for her," he said, presenting a small but very elaborate basket composed of peachstones. "Meb-be if she ain't—er—are not awake, you'll give it to her in the mornin'. Er—thank ye. Much obliged. Good evenin', ma'am." And he turned and fled down the walk.

For a time there was silence on the veranda. Mrs. Kendall was turning the basket over and over in her hands. Suddenly she raised her head.

"You are right, Harry," she sighed. "Her mind must be taken off those four years of her life, and off everything connected with it; everything and—everybody."

"Yes," echoed the doctor; "everything and—everybody. Er—let me see his basket, please."

Four days later Mrs. Kendall and her daughter left Houghtonsville for a month's stay in the White Mountains. From the rear window of a certain law office in town a boy of fourteen disconsolately watched the long train that was rapidly bearing them out of sight.

"An' I hain't seen her but once since I give her the basket," he was muttering; "an' then I couldn't speak to her—her mother whisked her off so quick. Plague take that basket—wish't I'd never seen it! An' I worked so hard over it, 'cause she said she liked 'em made out o' peachstones! She said she did!"

"'Bobby! Why, Bobby!' said Margaret in surprise"

CHAPTER X

IT WAS the day before Christmas. For eight weeks Margaret had been at Elmhurst, Miss Dole's select school in the Berkshires. School—Miss Dole's school—had been something of a surprise to Margaret; and Margaret had been decidedly a surprise to the school. Margaret was not used to young misses who fared sumptuously every day, and who yet complained because a favorite ice cream or a pet kind of cake was not always forthcoming; and Miss Dole's pupils were not used to a little girl who questioned their right to be well fed and well clothed, and who supplemented this questioning with distressing stories of other little girls who had little to wear and less to eat, day after day, and week after week.

Margaret had not gone to Elmhurst without a struggle on the part of her mother. To Mrs. Kendall it seemed cruel to be separated so soon from the little daughter who had but just been restored to her hungry arms after four long years of almost hopeless waiting. On the other hand, there were Margaret's own interests to be thought of. School, certainly, was a necessity, unless there should be a governess at home; and of this last Mrs. Kendall did not approve. She particularly wished Margaret to have the companionship of happy, well-bred girls of her own age. The Houghtonsville public school was hardly the place, in Mrs. Kendall's opinion, for a little maid with Margaret's somewhat peculiar ideas as to matters and things. There was Bobby, too—Bobby, the constant reminder in word and deed of the city streets and misery that Mrs. Kendall particularly wished forgotten. Yes, there certainly was Bobby to be thought of—and to be avoided. It was because of all this, therefore, that Margaret had been sent to Elmhurst. She had gone there straight from the great hotel in the mountains, where she and her mother had been spending a few weeks; so she had not seen Houghtonsville since September. It was the Christmas vacation now, and she was going back—back to the house with the stone lions and the big playroom where had lain for so long the little woolly dog of her babyhood.

It was not of the stone lions nor the playroom that Margaret was thinking, however; it was of something much more important and more—delightful, the girls said. At all events, it was wonderfully exciting, and promised all sorts of charming possibilities in the way of music, pretty clothes and good things to eat—again according to the girls.

It was a wedding.

Margaret's idea of marriage had undergone a decided change in the last few weeks. The envious delight of the girls over the fact that she was to be so intimately connected with a wedding, together with their absorbing interest in every detail, had been far more convincing than all of Mrs. Kendall's anxious teachings: marriage might not be such a calamity, after all.

It had come as somewhat of a shock to Margaret—this envious delight of her companions. She had looked upon her mother's marriage as something to be deplored; something to be tolerated, to be sure, since for some unaccountable reason her mother seemed to want it; but, nevertheless, an evil. There was the contract, to be sure, and the doctor had signed it without a murmur; but Margaret doubted the efficacy of even that at times—it would take something more than a contract, certainly, if the doctor should prove to be anything like Mike Whalen for a husband.

The doctor would not be like Mike Whalen, however—so the girls said. They had never seen any husbands that were like him, for that matter. They knew nothing whatever about husbands that shook and beat their wives and banged them around. All this they declared unhesitatingly, and with no little indignation, in response to Margaret's somewhat doubting questions. There were the story-books, too. The girls all had them, and each book was full of fair ladies and brave knights, and of beautiful princesses who married the king—and who wanted to marry him, too, and who would have felt very bad if they could not have married him!

In the face of so overwhelming an array of evidence, Margaret almost lost her fears—marriage might be very desirable, after all. And so it was a very happy little girl that left Elmhurst on the day before Christmas and, in care of one of the teachers, journeyed toward Houghtonsville, where were waiting the playroom, the great stone lions and the wonderful wedding, to say nothing of the dear loving mother herself.

It was not quite the same Margaret that had left Houghtonsville a few months before. Even those short weeks had not been without their influence.

Margaret, in accordance with Mrs. Kendall's urgent request, had been the these hungry lions to hurt us! Mr. Wodehouse went to one of the boys who was on the outside of the circle of those sleeping round the fires, and asked him if he were not afraid. He said, "No, Umfundisi." He said, "Did you not hear the lions?" "Yes, Umfundisi." "Then why were you not afraid? If the lions had come, you would probably have been the first one to be taken." He smiled and pointed upwards: he was in God's keeping.

On September 9 we had a restful, quiet night, camped in a beautiful place under a large spreading tree by a noble river. The chief visited us, and Mr. Wodehouse gave him a blanket. I was sitting in my tent reading when some women from the kraal over the river, having heard a white woman had arrived, came to visit me. I did not go out at once, so they sent word to me that they had come to see me, and wanted me to come out and play. The women were coming to see me all day. They had never seen a white woman before. Everything about me and everything I did was a great amusement to them. I was doing some crochet work which astonished them very much. They wanted to know what it was for. It was very difficult to tell them, as they would not know anything about doyleys and tray cloths, but Mr. Greeley explained. My white hair seemed to afford them a great deal to talk about. Toward dusk, the last party of women took their departure. I sent them away with the usual farewell "Chienda heinyu," (Go your way.) They responded, "We will come and play again to-morrow."

At Mukondo's kraal we found that every drop of water has to be brought a mile in large earthen pots on the heads of the women. We had to send our boys with every kind of utensil we could find to fetch water. While they were gone, one of the native women brought me as a present a large pot of water. It was a beautiful thing for her to do, and so spontaneous; we had not asked for water. It weighed at least fifty pounds, and she had carried that on her head for a mile!

Chief Mukondo's five sons are intelligent boys. They have built five huts on the outskirts of their father's kraal, with proper doors, the planks for which they prepared themselves. They have verandas, and even orchids growing on the posts of the verandas. One that is not familiar with the people cannot tell how much this means, as the heathen huts are mere hovels, with a hole to creep in, and they never think of ornamentation of any kind. These five brothers have built their huts near together in a straight row, and have marked out little gardens in front. They are teaching the children of the kraal to read. We were much surprised to see, in the hands of a little heathen boy, Step by Step, and to hear him read words, when we knew there was no missionary near. A service was held and four boys came over from the mines, three of them sons of the chief. When the invitation was given for Christians to rise, two of the chief's sons rose, and when the appeal was made to the unconverted, five came forward, three of our own boys, a friend of the chief's sons and another son of the chief, so that out of his five sons four are Christians.

When we resumed our journey, we kept setting fire to the grass to frighten away the wild beasts. One night I did not sleep much. I was listening all night, and toward morning a hyena came close to our tent, filling our hearts with terror with its hideous yell. My poor little piccaninny was so frightened, he got up and sat close to the fire. From babyhood the little native children are told stories about the cruel hyena, so that its cry fills them with terror. We then went to King Zikey's kraal, where we put up our tents for the next night. It was a restful night. Mr. Wodehouse gave the king a blanket in the morning. He had been opposed to his people being taught, but he told us that if the Native Commissioner gave consent, he was willing.

Next night it blew a hurricane, and we were afraid of our tents being blown down, so we did not sleep much. The heat by day was extreme, or as one of the native men put it, "the sun is very big." We reached Gowana's kraal at 4 P.M. and decided to camp there over Sunday. There are some very large rocks there and as it was still very warm, we were delighted to find a beautifully cool place in the cleft of one of the great rocks. It was a narrow passage which went back into the rock about twenty feet. The women came round me as usual, full of curiosity, as I am the first white woman that has ever passed through their country. They are always interested to know how many children I have, and when they are told I have three grandchildren, they are delighted and clap their hands. These women all seem prouder to be a grandmother than a mother, and you seldom see an old woman without a baby on her back.

Next day a great crowd of women came to visit me and to ask me "if I played." They stayed a long time and quizzed everything in my tent and everything was commented on and laughed at. Such a chattering, of which I could not understand a word!

We were interested here in a native forge, where the natives were making their assegais. I was amused at the bellows they were using, which was a whole goat-skin, sewed up, and inflated with wind by pressing up and down, the wind being forced through a hollow piece of wood to make the fire hot.

We continued our journey, camping next on a mountain near a stream, in a grove of wild loquots, with no kraal near. The boys brought in large trunks of trees for the camp fires, each contributing one piece for the fire in front of the tents. Our cook prepared dinner, which consisted of a roast guinea fowl, sweet potatoes, pumpkin and rice. For the guinea fowl we are indebted to our hunter; the potatoes, pumpkin and rice are native grown and bought of the people in the kraals. There have been so many guinea fowls shot on the way that we have scarcely had any other kind of meat and are getting rather tired of this luxury. We came over some steep places coming over the mountain; at one time I was swung over a precipice, as the boys made a turn in the path. On leaving our camp, and as we neared the Muzezi River, we saw a number of parrots. What a screeching they make! The next few days were cold and rainy. When we started out again we reached the Sabi River without incident and camped for the night. One of our hunters brought to camp a large antelope he had shot.

Reaching Makomwe Station at last, it was a real luxury to sleep in a comfortable bed. Next morning there was the first native wedding in the new church. We were surprised to see the bride come out in what I suppose was borrowed finery—a thin white muslin dress, a veil with orange blossoms and a dark skirt underneath, hung down a finger's length below her dress. She came walking with another girl to church, who carried over the bride's head a white cotton umbrella. She arrived first at the church and sat down and waited for the bridegroom. Presently he came with a large bouquet of orange blossoms in his button-hole, and a collar very much the worse for wear, and tied with string. After the wedding, the boys carried a bench to a flat piece of ground above the mission house, where the bride and bridegroom had to seat themselves, while all the men and women stood round them, clapping their hands and dancing. They kept it up for hours without cessation. We left to continue our journey, and as we passed the wedding group, the women had just brought large trenchers of oofoo, which is a meal looking, when cooked, the color of chocolate. There were also cooked goat and fowls. These were set down on the ground in front of the married couple; then all joined in the wedding feast.

We did not reach our camp till after dark. We had to pass through some wild country where the lions are, and we were very glad to reach Nyande's kraal at 7 P.M., where we just took a biscuit and a cup of tea and went to bed.

Sunday was spent at Muradzika's mission station. It sounded good to hear the bell calling the people to early prayers. A large congregation attended, and after the service, numbers came forward, some for the first time seeking Jesus. One boy, who had been one of our carriers all the trip, said, with his face shining, "I heard the Word, and I came to Jesus."

We reached home about noon next day. It had been altogether a very trying journey, but God has been with us and kept us from harm in the midst of danger. We entered many open doors. The whole of Mashonaland seems prepared to receive the Gospel. Oh that the hearts of God's children may respond to the needy call, to send forth many more who shall take the Gospel of light to those who are now sitting in darkness!

A GREAT CAMPAIGN FOR SOULS

THE last twelve months have been notable in the revival work of the Rev. William Edward Biederwolf, evangelist, and his associates. His director of personal work is Howard E. Taylor, of Philadelphia, and his musical director is Homer Rodeheaver. Paul J. Gilbert, the famous tenor soloist who accompanied Torrey and Alexander on their world tour, has been associated with Dr. Biederwolf for a portion of the year.

These men, with other assistance, have conducted some wonderful union revivals during the past season. In September, 1907, the party went to Jewell, Kansas. The people were in earnest, well organized and good workers, and the result was a revival that stirred the entire region round about, and was followed by many conversions.

October was spent in Lawrence, Kan., where great meetings were held. The closing days were marked by wonderful power and spiritual results. In Smith Centre was held another notable revival. The churches had been actively preparing, and had been much in prayer. Ninety-one confessed Christ the first Sunday. The wave of religious fervor swept the surrounding counties. People drove for miles to the meetings. There were upwards of a thousand public confessions of Christ, among the number being the sheriff of the county, the judge of the Probate Court, the county clerk, the mayor, chief of police, nearly every lawyer in the city, a congressman, three bankers, several doctors and many prominent business men.

Then followed a most successful meeting at Ottawa, Kan., where upwards of seven hundred made public profession. Next, at Amsterdam, N. Y., a series of meetings was held with equally remarkable spiritual results. This was followed by meetings in the great auditorium in Reading, Pa., culminating in a mighty revival. Hundreds of men and women who had been living nominal Christian lives were born anew in the spirit of Christ, and re-dedicated themselves to his service.

March and April Dr. Biederwolf took a prominent part in the simultaneous campaign in Philadelphia. The evangelist and his associates are now in Creston, Iowa, where a series of remarkable meetings are going on. Audiences of 2,500 are gathering nightly, and a great spiritual harvest has begun. Next September, the Kansas Forward Movement for Evangelistic Work, of which undertaking Dr. Biederwolf is the originator and director, will begin, and he will probably spend the year in that State. The Rapid Spread of Esperanto

BY EDMOND PRIVAT

NO ONE, who has not studied the subject, can imagine the rapid extension of the Esperanto movement in this country. After traveling for four months through the Eastern and Middle States, and hearing a great deal from the Western, I am convinced that Esperanto is a thousand times more widespread in the United States than its own students believe. Everywhere, in cities and villages, little circles have been formed, and societies have been founded for the study of this international language.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has about six thousand Esperanto students, the largest Esperanto class in the world. A number of other publications have their own Esperanto Associations. Besides the "Amerika Esperanta Asocio," started by Boston Esperantists two years ago, a number of State Associations have been formed to unite local societies. Yet all this includes only the registered Esperantists that we know of. But what a number of Esperantists who have not joined any society, of students who have not started official circles? We can only estimate by calculating the tremendous quantity of Esperanto text-books sought by the publishers in the past ten months.

This is the strongest impression of my trip through America; but I did not study only what is now existing. I tried to sow the good seed everywhere I went. I have delivered 165 lectures to about sixty thousand people altogether. Everywhere I have paid special attention to the high schools, for I have always found them very enthusiastic. They are becoming strong centres of Esperanto.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is doing fine work in encouraging the young in the study of Zamenhof's language. They need it and it needs them, and I have been very glad indeed to be able to give my part of inspiration to the active propaganda so successfully conducted by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD throughout the whole country. The Philadelphia students kept me busy in their city during the four weeks of February. Beside two very successful public courses, a special committee had arranged for me thirty-one lectures. Many groups have been started there among business men, and in the different quarters of the city special circles have been started among Italians, Poles, and Swedes, and Esperanto is going to be useful to them. While I was there, a riot occurred that ended sadly. The mayor of the city told me himself that diversity of language was at the bottom of it, for Italian workmen misunderstood remarks made to them in English by their American and Russian friends.

In Washington I had the opportunity of talking about our work with President Roosevelt and Vice-President Fairbanks. I found Major-General Duvall, of the United States Army, very favorable to Esperanto, and he requested me to lecture about it to the officers at the Army War College.

In Illinois I visited many high schools. I also lectured at the Illinois State University, and at the Northwestern University, in Evanston.

In Columbus, I spoke before the Senate of Ohio, which was discussing a bill for the introduction of Esperanto as an elective study into the high schools. I have been told since that the bill has passed. This is an excellent example given by that legislative body that ought to be followed throughout the country. After lecturing in Toledo I departed for Canada, and in Toronto I had two very busy days. I had two lectures with big audiences, one of which was the University. I spoke also in some schools, and in one of the large business colleges the president decided immediately to have classes in Esperanto. My impression of the eight months I have passed in this country is very encouraging, for the Esperanto movement is growing here with a wonderful rapidity.

Since the first article that I wrote for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD I have received so many letters from its readers, that I have not even been able to answer them all. I beg to be excused, for it was quite impossible. But the Esperantists whom I have asked to help me in replying were competent men and I hope that everybody has been satisfied. To a few letters, all asking the same question, I am going to answer right here: How to start an Esperanto Club? Have first of all a class or a studying circle, and after a few lessons, when the pupils begin to write and talk a little, organize and name your club in the way the majority likes best. Then write to my friend, Arthur Baker, 186 Fortieth Street, Chicago, who will put you in relation with other clubs and give you further information.

The greatest event in the history of our movement in America will be the national Esperanto Convention to be held July 21, 22, 23, and 24 next at Chautauqua, New York. The great Chautauqua Institution, which is the most powerful centre of popular education in the United States, has taken a very great interest in our cause, and has invited the Esperantists of this country to meet as its guests this summer. Hundreds of Esperantists have already promised to come, some even from Mexico and Canada. It is the duty of every good friend of the cause to be there. The American Esperantists are going to have there not only pleasant meetings, banquets and excursions, but interesting lectures and useful discussions.

This is going to be an excellent opportunity for using orally the Esperanto language and taking good decisions for the establishment or improving of a national Esperantist organization.

There will be also at Chautauqua, from the 3d to the 25th of July, a complete series of elementary and advanced classes in Esperanto, with special training courses, and diplomas will be awarded at the National Conference. For all information about the conference or the classes, write to Professor Benedict Papot, 1038 Jackson Boulevard, Chicago, who is their chief organizer.

I received to-day a letter from Dr. Zamenhof, from which I extract the best lines: "I hope that the Chautauqua Conference will be fruitful, that it will have an important significance for Esperantism in America, will give a strong push forward to our movement and will prepare the ground for the future glorious Universal Congress of Esperantists in America."

Such a letter ought to induce every one to come to Chautauqua and help by his presence the invitation to the Kvina Universala Kongreso to come to this country next year.

Answered Prayers

Mrs. C. H. H., Pennsylvania. "I want to tell the world that God does answer prayers to those that love and trust him. He has answered mine."

An Ohio Reader. "I wish to say that God does hear and answer prayer. I have had three prayers answered in the last few weeks."

S. C., Maryland. "I am in great trouble, and see no way out of it, except the good Father help me. Will your readers pray for me?"

Mrs. E. S. O., Pennsylvania. "I wish to acknowledge that God has answered my prayer in behalf of my dear daughter who has been quite ill."

Mrs. W. H. P., Pennsylvania. "I want to acknowledge God's goodness to me in answering prayer. He will never forsake us if we remain faithful."

Reader, Oklahoma. "I promised God if he would answer my prayers I would tell it to the world. He has answered according to his promise. Praise be to his great and holy name."

S. E. R., Idaho. "For the benefit of doubting ones, I want to add my testimony to prayers being answered. When trouble comes there is no friend like the lowly Jesus."

Walking in the Light

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

WHAT is it to walk in the light as He is in the light? Surely it is to walk, moment by moment, without a cloud of any kind between God and us, not because of our righteousness, for we have none, but because of God's grace, the blood of Jesus Christ which is cleansing us all the time from all sin; to walk every moment with God between us and sin, instead of with sin between us and God. Again, it is to live in openness and transparency: "All things when they are reproved are made manifest by the light; for everything that is made manifest is light" (Eph. 5: 13, R. V.) That which need not be hidden from God, need not be hidden from man. All parents know that when a child has some hidden thing upon his mind, it is sure to be something evil. That which is right, and true, and good comes out at once. And so with God's children—when they are in true fellowship with God, their life before man becomes very simple, very open; there is nothing to hide, no man's face to fear. "Walk as children of light" (Eph. 5: 8). Walking is not standing still, but going on from place to place, from light to light, the conscience being educated by the Holy Ghost.

"If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us." Like many other passages of Scripture, these words apply to the unsaved and unsanctified, and possess a deeper meaning for those who are walking in the light. If a sinner ignores or denies his sin, instead of confessing it and seeking pardon through faith in Jesus Christ, it is very evident he is self-deceived, and "the truth is not in him." When a believer who is under the power of sin that dwelleth in him claims that, because he is a child of God, it is not sin in him, he is fearfully self-deceived.

If a believer talks of his standing, his sitting with Christ in heavenly places, etc., while all the time his spirit is full of animosity and un-Christian-like bitterness, he deceives himself, and the truth is not in him. Christ did not come to minimize, but to take away our sins; and in him is no sin" (I. John, 3: 5).

But there are those who have been conscious that they did not walk in fellowship with God; they had "fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness"; sin did have dominion over them, but they have come to him who once "forgave all that debt," for pardon, and for cleansing too. They have come to God to ask that the very thoughts of their hearts may be cleansed by the inspiration of his Spirit; they have accepted Jesus to dwell in and to keep them, and they have had the blessed joy of proving how his precious blood does cleanse. The love of drink, of dress, of praise, of novels, etc., has been so cleansed that it has become a thing of the past, because Jesus has come in to take its place, and they can say, "Now it is no more I that live, but Christ that dwelleth in me." Can, then, these words be applicable to such: "If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us?" We think so. The sins which are cleansed cannot be cleansed and dwelling in us at the same time, and thus, whatever sins we have confessed, and God has cleansed, are cleansed and taken away; they no longer have dominion over us, thank God. But as he educates our conscience, he teaches us more of what he sees to be sin.

FAMILY OF FIVE

All Drank Coffee From Infancy.

It is a common thing in this country to see whole families growing up with nervous systems weakened by coffee drinking.

That is because many parents do not realize that coffee contains a drug—caffeine—which causes the trouble.

"There are five children in my family," writes an Iowa mother, "all of whom drank coffee from infancy up to two years ago."

"My husband and I had heart trouble and were advised to quit coffee. We did so and began to use Postum. We now are doing without medicine and are entirely relieved of heart trouble."

(Caffeine causes heart trouble when continually used as in coffee drinking.)

"Our eleven-year-old boy had a weak digestion from birth, and yet always craved and was given coffee. When we changed to Postum he liked it and we gave him all he wanted. He has been restored to health by Postum and still likes it."

"Long live the discoverer of Postum!" Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Read "The Road to Wellville," in pgs. "There's a Reason."

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

Parolado de Prezidanto Lincoln ĉe Gettysburg

Antaŭ kvar dudekoj kaj sep jaroj niaj praavoj naskiĝis sur tiu ĉi kontinento novan nacion, elpensitan en libereco kaj dediĉitan al la propozicio ke ĉiuj homoj estas kreitaj egaluloj. Nune ni estas okupataj pri granda interŝtata milito, provante ĉu tiu nacio aŭ la nacio tiel elpensita kaj tiel dediĉita povas longe daŭri. Ni renkontiĝas sur grandega batal-kampo de tiu milito. Ni estas kunvenintaj por dediĉi parton de tio kiel eternan ripozejon de tiuj kiuj tie ĉi oferis siajn vivojn por ke tiu ĉi nacio povu vivi. Estas tute dece kaj konvene ke ni faru ĉi-tion. Sed en pligranda senco ni ne povas dediĉi, ni ne povas Diendoni, ni ne povas sanktigi tiun ĉi teron. La bravaj homoj, vivantaj kaj mortintaj, kiu tie ĉi baraktis, ĝin eldeĉis multe superantan povon por aldoni aŭ depreni. La mondo nemulte rimarkos nek longe rememoros kion ni tie ĉi diras; sed ĝi neniam povos forgesi tion kion ili tie ĉi faris. Prefere estas por ni, la vivantoj, esti dediĉitaj al la neplenumata laborado kiun ili estas ĝisnune tiel noble faradintaj. Estas pli bone por ni esti tie ĉi dediĉitaj al la grandega tasko restanta antaŭ ni, ke de tiuj ĉi honorataj mortintoj ni ricevu pligrandan sindonecon al tiu afero pro kiu ili tie ĉi oferis la lastan plenan mezuron da sindoneco: ke ni tie ĉi alte decidu ke la mortintoj ne estu mortintaj vane ke la nacio povu, per helpo de Dio, havi novan naskiĝon de libereco, kaj ke la regado de la popolo, per la popolo kaj por la popolo ne elpereu el la mondo.

Hon. William Jennings Bryan on Preaching

I DESIRE my minister to preach every Sunday the simple Gospel. The "old, old story" never wearies the average congregation, if it comes from a devout mind with preparation in the message. My ideal sermon is one which has an appeal to the unconverted and a spiritual uplift for the Christian. I want my minister to be abreast of the times on all new theological questions and research, but I do not want him to bring them into the pulpit. I have formed certain fixed views of Christ, his Gospel and the inspiration of the Bible from a careful reading of that Book of books and of the shorter catechism, and it will not make me a better Christian or profit my spiritual life to unsettle these views by a discussion in the pulpit of new theories of Christ and the Holy Scriptures. Finally, I want my minister to act upon the belief that Christ's Gospel is the surest cure of all social and political evils, and that his best method of promoting temperance, social morality and good citizenship, is to bring men into the church. In a word, I want my minister to emphasize in his life work the declaration of the most successful preacher, Paul: "It pleased God by the foolishness of preaching to save them that believe."

The Tempest

HE shall give his angels charge

Over thee in all thy ways.

Though the thunders roar at large,

Though the lightning round me plays,

Like a child I lay my head

In sweet sleep upon my bed.

Though the terror comes so close,

It shall have no power to smite;

It shall deepen my repose,

Turn the darkness into light,

Touch of angels' hands is sweet;

Not a stone shall hurt my feet.

All thy waves and billows go

Over me to press me down

Into arms so strong, I know

They will never let me drown.

Ah, my God, how good thy will!

I will nestle and be still.

pecial charge of every teacher at Elmurst; and every teacher knew the story of the little girl's life, as well as just what they all had now to battle against. Everything that was good and beautiful was kept constantly before her eyes, and so far as was possible everything that was the reverse of all this was kept from her sight, and from being discussed in her presence. She learned of wonderful countries across the sea, and of the people who lived in them. She studied about high mountains and great rivers, and she was shown pictures of kings and queens and palaces. Systematically and persistently she was led along a way that did not know the Alley, and that did not recognize that there was in the world any human creature who was poor, or sick, or hungry.

It is little wonder, then, that she came to question less and less the luxury all about her; that she wore the pretty dresses and dainty shoes, and ate the food provided, with a resignation that was strangely like content; and that she talked less and less of the twins and the Alley.

CHAPTER XI

CHRISTMAS was a wonderful day at Five Oaks; certainly to Margaret. First there was the joy of skipping, bare-toed, across the room to where the long black stockings hung from the mantel. In the ray dawn of the early morning its bulging knobiness looked delightfully mysterious; and never were presents half so entrancing as those drawn from its black depths by Margaret's nail, eager fingers.

Later in the morning came the sleigh ride behind the doctor's span of bays, and then there was the delicious dinner followed by the games and the frolics and the quiet hour with mother. Still later the house began to fill with guests, and then came the wedding, with Mrs. Kendall all in soft gray, and looking radiantly happy on the doctor's arm.

It was a simple ceremony and soon over, and then came the long line of beaming friends and neighbors to wish the bride and groom joy and godspeed. Margaret, standing a little apart by the diningroom door, felt a sudden pull at her sleeve. She turned quickly and looked straight into Bobby McGinnis' eyes.

"Bobby, why, Bobby!" she welcomed joyously; but Bobby put his finger to his lips.

"Sh-h!" he cautioned; then, peremptorily, "Come." And he led the way through the deserted diningroom to a little room off the side-hall where the loom made his presence almost indistinguishable. "There!" he sighed in relief. "I fetched ye, didn't I?"

Margaret frowned. "But, Bobby," she remonstrated, "why—what are you doing out here, all in the dark?"

"Seein' you."

"Seeing me! But I was in there, where 'twas light and pretty, and you could see me lots better there."

"Yes, but I wasn't wanted there," retorted Bobby, grimly; then he added: "Twa'n't my party, ye see, an' I wa'n't invited. But I wanted ter see e—an' I did, too."

Margaret was silent.

"Mebbe ye want ter go back now erself," observed Bobby, gloomily. "Tain't so pretty here, I'll own."

Margaret did want to go back, and he almost said so, but something silenced the words on her lips.

"Oh, I'll stay, 'course," she murmured, shifting about uneasily on her little white-slipped feet.

Bobby roused himself.

"Here, take a chair," he proposed, pushing toward her a low stool; "an' I'll set here on the winder sill. Nice night; ain't it?"

"Yes, 'tis." Margaret sat down, carefully spreading her skirts.

There was a long silence. Through the half-open door came a shaft of light and the sound of distant voices. Bobby was biting his finger nails, and Margaret was wondering just how she could get back to the drawingroom without hurting the feelings of her unbidden guest. At last the boy spoke.

"Mebbe when we're grown up we'll get married, too," he blurted out, saying the one thing he had intended not to say. He bit his tongue angrily, but the next minute he almost fell off the windowsill in his amazement—the little girl had sprung to her feet and clapped her hands.

"Bobby, could we?" she cried. "Sure!" rejoined Bobby with easy nonchalance. "Why not?"

"And there'd be flowers and music and lots of people to see us?"

"Heaps!" promised Bobby.

"Oh-h!" sighed Margaret ecstatically. "And then we'll go traveling 'way over to London and Paris and Egypt and see the Alps."

"Huh?" The voice of the prospective young bridegroom sounded a little uncertain.

"We'll go traveling to see things, you know," reiterated Margaret. "There is such a lot of things I want to see."

"Oh, yes, we'll go traveling," assured Bobby, promptly, wondering all the while if he could remember just where his mother's geography was. He should have need of it after he got home that night.

"I think maybe now I'll go back," said Margaret, with sudden stiffness. "They might be looking for me. Good-by."

"Oh, I say, Maggie," called Bobby, eagerly, "when folks is engaged they— But only the swish of white skirts answered him, and there was nothing for him to do but disconsolately to let himself out the side door.

"And I'm going to get married, too," said Margaret to her mother half an hour later.

"You're going to get married!"

"Yes; to Bobby, you know."

The newly-made bride sat down suddenly, and threw a quick look at her husband.

"To Bobby!" she exclaimed. "Why, when—where—Bobby wasn't here."

"No," smiled Margaret. "He said he wasn't invited, but he came. We fixed it all up a little while ago. We're going to London and Paris and Egypt and see the Alps."

CHAPTER XII

THE great diningroom at Belcourt, the old Spencer homestead, was perhaps the pleasantest room in the house. The house itself crowned the highest hill that overlooked the town; and its diningroom windows, and the veranda without, commanded a view of the river for miles, just where the valley was the greenest and the most beautiful. On the other side of the veranda which ran around three sides of the house, one might see the town with its myriad roofs and tall chimneys; but although these same tall chimneys represented the wealth that made possible the great Spencer estate, yet it was the side of the veranda overlooking the green valley that was the most popular with the family. It was said, to be sure, that old Jacob Spencer, who built the house, and who laid the foundation for the Spencer millions, had preferred the side that overlooked the town; and that he spent long hours gazing over the visible results of his thrift and enterprise. But old Jacob was dead now, and his son's sons reigned in his stead; and his son's sons, no matter how much they might value the whiz and whir and smoke of the town, preferred, when at rest, to gaze upon green hills and far-reaching meadows.

A Painted Floor Is the Best Kitchen Floor

The secret of a cheery, cleanly kitchen is a bright, spotless floor. Floor coverings grow dingy and wear out quickly—scrubbed floors are unattractive and a great care.

The ideal kitchen floor is a painted one.

Granite Floor Paint, Acme Quality, makes a hard, durable, lustrous finish, easy to clean, hard to wear out. Any one can apply it—it's all ready to brush on, and it will dry over night.

ACME QUALITY

is a name for every housekeeper to remember. It covers Paints, Enamels, Stains and Varnishes for every purpose. ROSES OF JUNE

(See Cover Page)

FROM the days of the troubadours and the wandering minstrels with their lutes and harps, June and its roses have ever been popular themes for poems and songs. In the poetry of flowers more verses have probably been devoted to extolling the beauties of the rose's snow-white or pink or crimson petals than to any other flower. The rose by some has been used as the symbol of love, others have said that its thorns have taught the lesson of the sterner facts of life which always lie so near to that which is beautiful and sweet. Few people there are who have not some favorite quotation for which the rose has been the poet's inspiration. It is an interesting fact that some of the best verses to June's flower are by authors whose very names have been forgotten, though the flowers they loved and plucked in wayside hedges or by castle moats in days long gone, still blossom with the warm breath of summer, and nature lovers quote the rhythmic lines and wonder what manner of men those poets were whose lines are followed by the word anonymous.

The little poem given below is by one of these unknown poets and is most expressive of the charm of the rose and its season:

White with the whiteness of the snow,
Pink with the faintest rosy glow,
They blossom on their sprays;
They glad the borders with their bloom
And sweeten with their rich perfume
The mossy garden-ways.
The dew that from their brimming leaves
Drips down, the mignonette receives
And sweeter grows thereby;
The tall June lilies stand near
In raiment white and gold, and here
The purple pansies lie.

The poet Bryant sang in A Scene on the Banks of the Hudson:

Loveliest of lovely things are they
On earth that soonest pass away:
The rose that lives its little hour
Is prized beyond the sculptured flower.

Our Shorthand Classes

TO BE trained to earn a livelihood and to take an active, independent part in the battle of life, should be the ambition of every American. The boy or girl who is "growing up" always looks forward hopefully to the time when a life vocation is to be chosen.

There are few businesses at the present time that offer so many inducements, and yet which are so easily acquired, as stenography. Everywhere there is a demand for competent stenographers of both sexes, to fill positions as clerks, secretaries, amanuenses, correspondents in banks, stores, mercantile houses, publishers' offices, and in manufactories, wholesale and retail houses, shippers and importers, counting-rooms, and trading concerns. No office is now without its shorthand staff. No man of business, in these days, thinks of disposing of his mail without the aid of a trusty stenographer.

To meet this universally growing demand, shorthand schools, charging the pupil from $12 to $20 per course, have been opened in different parts of the country. To many, these schools are out of reach, and to many more, their course is an unattainable luxury. In view of these facts, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has completed arrangements which will place a Complete Shorthand Course within the reach of every reader of this journal who desires to take advantage of this opportunity to equip himself or herself for a life vocation. A Correspondence Course of Standard Shorthand has been prepared by a certificated teacher, under the personal direction of one of the editorial staff of this paper who is himself a stenographer of long experience. This Course will be personally conducted by mail, each student receiving twenty-four graded lessons, the whole constituting a complete Correspondence Course, designed to equip the student for work. These lessons are simple and self-explanatory. With the exception of a charge of one dollar to cover costs of printing, engraving, postage, and stationery, the whole Course is absolutely free. There is no other expense whatsoever.

To those who are ambitious, and who are endeavoring to make their way under difficulties, it is the opportunity of a lifetime to have the means of making a living literally "at their finger ends." Young folks and grown folks of either sex could not spend their summer leisure to better purpose or with equal certainty of advantage.

Names and addresses of all who desire to take the Correspondence Course should be forwarded at once, with the enrolment fee of $1, to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 100 Bible House, New York City.

Who Will Help?

AS PASTOR of the American church in Berlin, Germany, during the last fifteen years, I have had many opportunities of helping my fellow countrymen in times of distress. Knowing how readily the good readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD respond to every real case of human need, I venture to draw their attention to a case of the worthiest character, where a series of misfortunes has fallen upon a mother and daughter. They are American ladies of the highest character; in America they belong to the Baptist Church and during the five years of their residence in Berlin they have been members naturally of an American church. The daughter, who is an M.A. of one of our foremost universities (magna cum laude), came to Berlin to take a Ph.D. She was just on the point of attaining her object when the earthquake at San Francisco completely cut off all their income. Our benevolent fund furnished sufficient money to enable the lady to finish her work, but unfortunately the mother broke a limb and the whole round sum we had given was wiped out by the expenses attendant on this accident.

The young lady is a brilliant student and will easily attain her degree in August, provided she can obtain the $250 necessary for the printing of her thesis and the other expenses. When she attains her degree, we will furnish the passage money to send mother and daughter home, where no doubt so able a young lady, with such a degree—the object of her life ambition—would easily obtain a position and thus be delivered from a distress that has moved my heart as it has rarely been moved.

I am sure that such a response will be made as will be doubly blessed to those who give, and to those whose high self-respect and wonderful independence have been so sorely tried by these distressing trials.

REV. J. F. DICKIE,

Pastor of the American Church in Berlin.

[Any contributions from readers of this journal who may be interested in this worthy case, may be sent to Dr. Louis Klopsch, editor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, who will personally acknowledge them and forward them to Dr. Dickie in Berlin.]

Grape-Nuts a Perfectly Balanced Food.

No chemist's analysis of Grape-Nuts can begin to show the real value of the food—the practical value as shown by personal experience.

It is a food that is perfectly balanced, supplies the needed elements of brain and nerves in all stages of life from the infant, through the strenuous times of active middle life, and is a comfort and support in old age.

"For two years I have used Grape-Nuts with milk and a little cream, for breakfast. I am comfortably hungry for my dinner at noon."

"I use little meat, plenty of vegetables and fruit, in season, for the noon meal, and if tired at tea time, take Grape-Nuts alone and feel perfectly nourished."

"Nerve and brain power, and memory are much improved since using Grape-Nuts. I am over sixty and weigh 155 lbs. My son and husband, seeing how I had improved, are now using Grape-Nuts."

"My son, who is a traveling man, eats nothing for breakfast but Grape-Nuts and a glass of milk. An aunt, over 70, seems fully nourished on Grape-Nuts and cream."

"There's a reason."

Christian Citizenship*

THE good citizen is the unit of national character. Moral, law-abiding, self-controlled, industrious, he must look beyond the mere material idea of national progress and prosperity, and reverently recognize in all things the guiding hand of Him who created and who governs the universe.

As in the individual, so in the nation, spiritual vision is essential to continued development and the attainment of the best type of national life and character. Indications of the absence of this national spirituality are unmistakably present when rulers and magistrates become venal, when rich men act like lawless mercenaries, robbing and oppressing the poor, and when the popular goal toward which the multitude strives is wealth instead of character.

Historians have frequently declared that when the people of any country are given over to worldliness, to the neglect of religion, disaster follows. The great American panics of 1837, 1857 and 1873 were preceded by over-speculation, a mania for money-making and worldly indulgence.

Rome, with its heathen philosophies, and the notorious extravagance and profligate self-indulgence of its ruling class, forgot God. The great nation which had conquered the world, was in its decay. Its citizens were given over to utter worldliness and the State was spiritually and morally bankrupt. Leading men, while noting the terrible danger, were powerless to avert it. "What folly is it to renew life after death!" wrote Pliny, while the pagan mind fell back to gross materialism and pantheism. A few sighed for a guide to truth. "We will wait for one," said Plato, "be it a god or a god-inspired man, to teach us our religious duties and to take away the darkness from our eyes." But there was no vision and Rome went down.

Christian citizenship implies a well-ordered life, whose duties are performed with a cheerfulness inspired by the sense of divine guidance and approval. During the Terror in France, an infidel said to a Christian peasant threateningly: "I will have all your steeples pulled down, that you may no longer have any object by which you may be reminded of your old superstitions." "But," replied the aged peasant reverently, "you cannot help leaving us the stars." In individual or national peril, the "vision" or sense of God's nearness and interest in human affairs gives comfort and assurance.

More than once has a national convulsion been averted by patriotic men of spiritual vision. In London, during the great Chartist agitation, an army of workingmen prepared to march on Parliament with a petition in behalf of the poor. Troops armed and with shotted cannon lined the principal streets. Everybody apprehended a sanguinary riot. At this juncture two godly men, Kingsley and Maurice, saved the situation. They placarded all the streets overnight with bills calling upon the workers to use no violence, but to trust to the righteousness of their cause. The workers read and were convinced, and riot was averted.

There is a close relationship between the religious spirit or life of a nation, and that nation's greatness and its endurance. Not only must it have spiritual vision in its higher official walks, but it must be clear to the people that their rulers are men who act as in God's sight in all the affairs of the State and the community, legislative, civic and industrial. The real test of the genuineness is when it becomes their duty, even at the risk of loss of position and influence, to fight notorious evils, which are debauching the community.

Holy Aspirations*

IT HAS been said, whether true or not, that man is the only living creature on earth that possesses ambition. Tradition tells that this was the sin of the angels who rebelled, and it caused their expulsion from heaven. But the ambition which fills the heart of the true child of God is not to revolt against the divine will, but to live and act in perfect accord with it. We long, pray and strive for a deeper consecration, a closer walk with God and a more perfect understanding of his will. David's song in the wilderness of Judah expresses the feelings of the believer who finds the Lord an ever-ready helper and sure dependence.

This holy zeal and longing never goes unsatisfied. In his own way—and in the best way—God fulfills all our aspirations after righteousness. "How did you learn to read?" asked a missionary in surprise of a poor crippled New Zealand native who had never been to a school. "I picked up out of the rubbish all the bits of printed paper I could find," he replied. "Sometimes I got a leaf of the Bible or of a Prayer Book and these pieces I sewed together. Then I would point to a word and ask my brother to tell me its meaning. This I did until I could read a verse and then a whole chapter." "And do you love God's word?" "It is my pillow!" was the radiant answer.

An intense longing for service dominates all other desires. "Lord, send me! Lord, use me!" are words often upon the lips. Cynical talk of over-zeal need alarm nobody. "I think it better," said an Indian convert to a white trader, "that the pot should boil over than not boil at all."

In his youth, Patrick Henry showed no promise of future greatness. He married at 18, went to farming, and next became a lawyer. When the famous dispute between the clergy and legislature of Virginia took place, Henry's zeal for the former won him the appellation of "The Orator of Nature." It was this newly awakened zeal, revealing certain unexpected qualities of heart and brain, which enabled Patrick Henry afterward by his famous speech before the Continental Congress, to give the first tremendous impulse to the Revolution. It was a consecrated appeal to the God of justice and liberty which proved to be prophetic.

William Fletcher, of Madely, the friend of John Wesley, was consumed with the desire for service. His life was one of self-sacrifice. He labored among the rough colliery employees and iron puddlers and every Sunday morning, bell in hand, went around his parish summoning the people. Met with scoffs and jeers at first, after a time he won their hearts and his church was filled to overflowing. He preached even when dying. "I have only to step from my pulpit to my bed," he smilingly explained. At his last communion service, he was carried from the church to his bed, which he never left again alive. His zeal and passion for souls are a glorious example to the world.

There is a great and abiding joy in the heart that keeps near to God. A pagan showed his idols to Augustine, saying boastfully: "Here is my god. Where is thine?" Then he pointed upward to the sun and said further: "There is another of my gods. Where are thine?" "I showed him not my God," wrote Augustine, "for he had not eyes to see him; nor could he see the joy in my heart." This inward joy is not a worldly product, but a spiritual, and is a constant source of refreshment, since it springs from the fountain of all enduring happiness.

SCHOOL OF THE VESTAL VIRGINS

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in reviewing Ridpath's History of the World, says: "We mark the marvelous influence of Christianity upon the world's progress. He would be a blind reader of history indeed who did not discern, throughout all, the influence of a great Omnipotent hand, guiding and developing all things." The celebrated painting shown herewith from RIDPATH'S HISTORY illustrates a RELIGIOUS custom of the Romans. Ridpath takes the reader back 6,000 years before the time of CHRIST and gives the history of every religion and shows the slow and toilsome progress of man through the centuries, gradually emerging out of PAGANISM and SUPERSTITION into the light of CHRISTIANITY and PROGRESS. PRESIDENT WILLIAM MCKINLEY said:

"I am familiar with the merits of Ridpath's History of the World, and cordially commend it to the scholar as well as to the plain people generally."

PROF. WARREN, Pres't Boston University, said:

"I should be glad to see it placed in the library of every young person in the United States, and even in the English-speaking world. In families where there are bright children it will render excellent service to the cause of popular intelligence."

PROF. LONG, Supt. Public Schools, St. Louis, said:

"I unhesitatingly commend Dr. Ridpath's History of the World as the ablest work on that subject which I have ever examined. The engravings, maps and charts are alone worth the entire cost of the set."

BISHOP VINCENT, Chancellor of Chautauqua, said:

"Ridpath's History is in clear and agreeable style, comprehensive in treatment, readable type and admirable illustrations. This set of books is a permanent college chair of general history in one's own house."

THE BOSTON POST said:

"John Clark Ridpath is above all things an historian. His historical works are accepted as standards in schools and colleges, as well as in business houses and homes. His style is simple, his manner charming."

RIDPATH'S enviable position as an historian is due to his wonderfully beautiful style, a style no other historian has ever equaled. He pictures the great historical events as though they were happening before your eyes; he carries you with him to see the battles of old; to meet kings and queens and warriors; to sit in the Roman senate; to march against Saladin and his dark-skinned followers; to sail the southern seas with Drake; to circumnavigate the globe with Magellan; to watch that thin line of Greek spearmen work havoc with the Persian hordes on the field of Marathon; to know Napoleon as you know Roosevelt.

RIDPATH in your home means you need never spend a lonely evening. You can associate with the world's heroes; you can cross the Rubicon with Cæsar, after which Rome was free no more. You can sit at the feet of Socrates, the loftiest genius of the ancient world. You can kneel at the shrine of Lincoln, "the greatest character of all time, the gentlest memory of our world." It is ennobling to commune with these children of destiny. To be associated with great men is to be great one's self, and you will add to your store of knowledge which is power, and to the richness of your life.

RIDPATH takes you back to the dawn of history, long before the pyramids of Egypt were built; down through the romantic troubled times of Chaldea's grandeur and Assyria's magnificence; of Babylonia's wealth and luxury; of Grecian and Roman splendor; of Mohammedan culture and refinement; of French elegance and British power; of American patriotism and religious freedom, to the dawn of yesterday. He covers every race, every nation, every time, and holds you spellbound by his wonderful eloquence. Nothing more interesting, absorbing and inspiring was ever written by man.

RIDPATH throws the mantel of personality over the old heroes of history. Alexander is there—patriot, warrior, statesman, diplomat, crowning the glory of Grecian history. Xerxes, from his mountain platform, sees Themistocles, with three hundred and fifty Greek ships, smash his Persian fleet of over a thousand sail, and help to mould the language in which this paragraph is written. Rome perches Nero upon the greatest throne on earth, and so sets up a poor madman's name to stand for countless centuries as the synonym of savage cruelty; Napoleon fights Waterloo again under your very eyes, and reels before the iron fact that at last the end of his gilded dream has come. Bismarck is there—gruff, overbearing, a giant pugilist in the diplomatic ring, laughing with grim disdain at France, which says "You shall not." Washington is there, "four-square to all the winds," grave, thoughtful, proof against the wiles of British strategy and the poisoned darts of false friends; clear-seeing over the heads of his fellow-countrymen, and on into another century—the most colossal world-figure of his time!

Questions and Answers

B. H., St. Louis, Mo. What relation was Solomon's wife (mentioned in the third chapter of I. Kings) to Pharaoh, King of Egypt in Moses' time? Was there more than one King Pharaoh in Egypt?

Pharaoh was not a man's name, but a title, like Sultan, or Emperor. There were many Pharaohs or rulers during the long period of Egypt's existence as a great power in the ancient world. The name of this particular Pharaoh, whose daughter Solomon espoused, was supposed to have been Vaphres, although several commentators say he was Psusennes. This was over 400 years after the death of Moses.

B. M., Pittsfield, N. H. Can a person be saved without having a change of heart or being born again? The Bible says that "whosoever believeth on Christ shall not perish, but have everlasting life"; but it also says that those who are not born again shall "not see the kingdom of God."

The Scripture is very explicit. See John, 3: 3-7; I. Peter, 1: 23 and 2: 2. The operation of the Holy Spirit upon the inner man results in the production of a spiritual nature; and it is this spiritual creation, this new birth, or being born afresh, which is indispensable. It is the test of true conversion.

G. P., Valencia, Kan. Did David intend to convey in Psalm 37: 25 an invariable rule or only his observation?

He is speaking of the ideal character, and the text justifies the use of the words "utterly forsaken." He means "permanently" or "continuously." David himself had been compelled in his temporary destitution to beg sustenance from Nabal.

R. D., Rome, Ga. 1. I have heard that the Chinese tea which we get here has been used before; that the leaves are dried out after being used, and shipped away to the outside "barbarians." What truth is there in the statement? 2. Have the better class of Chinese to any extent stopped bandaging their daughters' feet?

1. The tea shipped here from China is good and sound and is not treated in the manner you describe. We have heard stories of tea being refaced and treated here, but they are probably groundless. 2. In some parts of China foot binding is not so prevalent among the educated class, but it is still a national custom.

W. T. H., Kalispell, Mont. I have been a subscriber and reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for over twelve years. I have never seen an article or statement in it during all that period that I could not heartily endorse, until in the May 27 issue, on page 435, under "Finns Against Socialism." In the article referred to Anarchy and Socialism are used interchangeably as synonymous terms.

The article in question simply gives the action of the Finnish Committee as they themselves report it, and the construction also is theirs. The terms certainly are not synonymous. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S definition may be gathered from its editorials.

G. W. S., Worcester, Mass. 1. Why does the Chinese rule China instead of the Portuguese? Is there any blood relation between the royal house of Portugal and that of England, that the King and Queen of Portugal should be so prominent at all great gatherings in the court of King Edward? 3. How many Johns are there connected with the name of Hopkins as applied to the institution of learning bearing the name of Johns Hopkins?

1. The Dowager Empress is "the power behind the throne." All of the edicts, etc., are issued in the name of her son the Emperor, and to him all ministers of foreign countries are sent. The Empress rules by her influence over her son. She has no legal status as ruler. 2. No near relationship, at least, but the two Kings were always strong friends. 3. One, Johns Hopkins, born 1795 in Anne Arundel County, Maryland. He died in 1873. He founded the university in Baltimore, and the hospital, both of which bear his name. The s on the first name does not mean a plural number, but is part of the name itself.

H. M. B., Springfield, Mass. 1. I heard it stated that there were States in which aliens unable to understand a word of English could vote in three months from landing. 2. How is this to be harmonized with the naturalization laws of the United States?

1. There are five States in which an alien may vote after one year's residence and having declared his intention of becoming a citizen. There are three in which an alien may vote after six months' residence. Unfortunately only in a very few States must the voters show they can speak, read or write English. 2. The question as to who may vote is regulated by the States themselves and in some States have been planted, and pigs slaughtered, and foundations of temples and churches laid. There has been no limit to the claims of the superstitious. However, science is fast doing away with these fancies. The moon's phases and changes are as regular as the rising and going down of suns and planets, and can be calculated as easily. SAMUEL PHELPS LELAND.

C. F., Topeka, Kan. What is the total wealth of the United States?

The estimate for 1907 was $116,000,000,000.

A. R., Englewood, N. J. Is excessive eating of beef, mutton, etc., advisable any time, but especially in the hot summer?

One who wishes to preserve health should eat sparingly of animal food at all times, but especially in hot weather. Dr. Kintzing in his recent book on Long Life and How to Attain It, writes, "a horde of nomads." For their gross and sensual appetites and their rebellions against the divine will they were kept in the wilderness, in order that, with a new and obedient generation, the foundation of the new Jewish nation in Palestine could be soundly laid.

Many letters of appreciation are reaching us, commending the course of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in the victorious campaign for the restoration of the motto, "In God We Trust," on the national coinage. A letter from Austin, Tex., bearing sixty-seven signatures, says:

Your earnest efforts of the past few months to restore the inscription, "In God We Trust," to the coins of the nation, deserve the thanks of a grateful people. We, the undersigned residents of Austin, the capital city of Texas, congratulate THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and desire to express our appreciation to the distinguished members of the House and Senate at Washington who so ably and eloquently spoke in behalf of the measure, and with persistence, zeal, and ardor urged its passage. The good people of the country were aroused to action, and under your skilful leadership, success has been attained. Under divine providence, may the dear, familiar motto remain on the coin for all time, proclaiming that, as a Christian nation, "In God We Trust."

W. D. S., Chillicothe, Mo. There is no disposition in any quarter to exclude desirable immigrants. On the contrary, they are always welcome. We are aware of the lack of labor in many sections of the country. The whole question is so large that it is engaging the attention of the Federal authorities and of the States also. It is largely a question of distribution, and calls for broad, statesmanlike treatment.

Mrs. L. E. L., Benton Harbor, Mich. Were there any colored people in Bible times?

Certainly. The Syrians themselves were olive-skinned and the Ethiopians almost black. The men of Cush, Mizraim, and other countries of that latitude were dark-skinned and those of the Sinaitic peninsula and Egypt also. There was then, as now, a strong admixture of negroes in the Orient.

Y. E. P., Pittsfield, Me. The British India government has a fund for use in famine emergencies, and some of the provinces also have local funds for the same purpose. Taxes are usually remitted in famine times. You have probably read an exaggerated account of the burdens imposed upon the farming classes of India.

J. C. F., Mediapolis, Ia. The United States has given to the Philippines American schools, improved sanitation, better and juster administration, good laws, a native legislature and many other benefits. We are training the islanders for future self-government, the national legislature being a step in this direction. Our missionaries are giving them the Gospel to replace their ancient Roman idol-worship.

The Grave of the Famous Ringer of Liberty Bell Discovered

A SHORT time ago the sexton of Old Pine Street Presbyterian Church at Fourth and Pine Streets, Philadelphia, Pa., found among the crumbling tombstones that had lain neglected in the churchyard, a headstone of which the inscription had become almost obliterated by age and dirt. He cleaned the moss and lichen from the stone, and was surprised to find it bore the name of the famous bell-ringer of Revolutionary days, William Hurry, who tolled the Liberty Bell at the time of the signing of the fateful Declaration of Independence. Hurry was at that time the caretaker of Independence Hall. When he was gathered to his fathers his remains were buried in the Old Pine Street Church, but inquiry later failed to disclose the whereabouts of the grave. The news of the discovery was communicated to the Grand Army Association, and arrangements were made for the decoration of the restored grave of the bell-ringer on last Memorial Day.

A girl is legally of age at twenty-one in New York State.

W. L., Norwich, Conn. When it comes to "the wet moon" and "the dry moon," is not that founded in superstition like the belief that the moon is the cause of lunacy? Does not the quadrature of the moon show that the dip of the new moon is due wholly to its relation to the sun, and that it is as regular in its dip year in and year out as the sun is in its movements? We talk about moonshine—what are the moon's phases but sunshine?

Ignorance and superstition have always attributed to the moon great influence upon the climate of the earth, and even the power to shape the course of human conduct, and the destiny of nations. Armies have been marched in certain phases of the moon; as crops

D. W., Easton, Pa. Why did it require forty years for the children of Israel to journey from the land of bondage to the Promised Land? About how many miles did they traverse in their wanderings? Under the most favorable circumstances about how long should it have taken them and about how many miles?

Because of their disobedience, their stay in the wilderness of Sinai was prolonged until the entire generation of those who left Egypt (with the exception of Caleb and Joshua) had passed away. Ordinarily, the journey might have been made in much less time, but such was not the divine purpose. Modern travelers have traversed the wilderness in a few months; but their journeys can not be compared to those of the Israelites, whose wanderings were sometimes almost circuitous and who camped in certain places for protracted periods. When they left Egypt they were, as one commentator

HOW THEY KEPT THE FOURTH

TWO MEMORABLE FOURTHS

BY REAR-ADMIRAL ROBLEY D. EVANS

MY MEMORY distinctly grasps two celebrations that are now matters of history. They certainly for spectacular effects lead all the rest in the list of my Fourth of July experiences.

The first one occurred at Kiel and was a part of the ceremonies attendant upon the opening of the Kiel Canal. The second I witnessed at the close of the Spanish war, upon the annihilation of the Spanish fleet. Upon the first occasion I was in command of the New York, and as she was the first of our new vessels to be shown abroad, and the occurrence was a showy and important one, arrangements were made to electrically illuminate the ship and give as fine a display of fireworks as possible. I had an "expert" plan a display that astonished all who witnessed the spectacle at Kiel. This expert supplied me with the fireworks before I left America, and I was at a loss to know what to do with all the set pieces and supplies of bombs and rockets. After every available place below had been filled there were still quantities to stow away. I had to put them in big boxes, which were lashed on deck, covered with canvas and painted, and I certainly found these fireworks a source of anxiety. If they got wet, there would be no display at the proper time; if a careless spark should reach them, well, there surely would be no fireworks at Kiel from our ship.

When we reached Kiel we found a Fourth of July effect in the harbor. The German fleet was drawn up in two long lines, and each ship manned her rigging and cheered us as we came in, and the New York fired one hundred and fifty guns before we reached our buoy. The New York was neutral ground and the only ship where all nations could meet with a liberty not possible on other ships, because we had no alliances and were not looking for them. The French and Russian fleets met outside the harbor and came in together; but the English squadron made the best appearance. At the banquet, at which twelve hundred of the most distinguished men in Europe were guests, there was a show of fireworks on an island in the lake, which had been arranged by the German fleet. All the ships had been doing something in the way of fireworks; but it had leaked out some way that the Yankees had something up their sleeves, and all stopped their fireworks to watch us when we began.

such bursts of bombs and rockets and mines as never before had been seen on a ship, and we finally finished with another set piece, the American shield at one end, the German double eagle at the other, and "Good-night" between them. The German papers were profuse in their praise, but my feeling was one of thankfulness that it was over without accident.

Another spectacular Fourth I remember with feelings of awe. It occurred off Cuba. After the annihilation of the Spanish fleet on the 3d of July, the day following we dressed ship, fired salutes and celebrated as befitting the occasion; but along toward midnight of the Fourth, the Spanish cruiser Reina Mercedes came outside the harbor. The Texas and Massachusetts opened fire upon her at once, and for the first time in the history of the world a battle was fought under powerful search-lights. The search-light beams made the Spanish cruiser look like a ship in a picture and the rest of our ships withheld our fire, but looked on. We could see the shells tearing through her sides and bursting all about her, until she sank to the bottom not far from the Merimac. It was truly the most spectacular Fourth of my life. Along with the report of the engagement of July 3, I submitted the following words to Admiral Sampson: "I can not express my admiration for my magnificent crew; so long as the enemy showed his flag they fought like American seamen; but when the flag came down, they were as gentle and tender as American women."

Governor Swanson's Speech in a Mountaineer's Log Cabin

Our first was a set piece, eighty feet long, suspended between our military posts—a portrait of President Cleveland at one end and of the Emperor at the other, and between them the legend in German script: "America sends heartfelt congratulations to Germany on the opening of the North Sea Canal." Thousands of people broke into a great roar of cheers as this message blazed out. These cheers were repeated from ship to ship and echoed from thousands ashore. Then the show went on with

Rev. Chas. M. Sheldon, D.D.*

The Rule of the Kingdom

TEXT—COL. 3: 17—"And whatsoever ye do, in word or in deed, do all in the name of the Lord Jesus, giving thanks to God the Father through him."

IT IS AN old question, as old as life itself, and yet it is new to every generation: "Is life worth living?" The Christian undertakes to answer this old question by saying, Yes, if one has the right definition of life. Some kinds of life are not worth living, but the life abundant, which Christ came to give men, is worth living. So the Christian says life is worth living if, first, it is a life of testimony-bearing. "Ye are my witnesses," said Christ; torch-bearers of the truth. It surely must be counted cowardly and weak in any human being who has received any light on the pathway of life to refuse to give it to others. Nearly ten thousand people committed suicide in the United States last year. Some of them, if not all of them, were convinced no doubt that they had good reason for taking their lives. They were despondent and despairing. They had given up every hope of joy in life. They had lost their reason, as we say, or were on the verge of doing so, and to them life was not worth living; but the Christian always says that life is worth the living as long as one has any torch of light to hold up.

Life a Discipline

The Christian says again that life is worth living if it is regarded as discipline. Even pain and sorrow, hardship and defeat, temptation and obstacles, all are, or may be, discipline. Everything in the world which is used by man is disciplined. The largest diamond ever found by man is the Cullinan diamond. It was found by accident on the surface of a dump in South Africa. It weighs nearly two pounds. Its value is approximated at something like three million dollars. The owners have not been able to sell it, and the Boer government has voted to buy it and present it to King Edward. Before he can wear it in his crown it will have to be cut and polished and reduced to one-half or one-third its original size, and subjected to the searching test of the lapidary. Although the largest diamond in the world, it is in its present form absolutely worthless as a gem, even for a king, until it is disciplined. The clothes we wear go through a process of discipline before we can wear them. The wool is hackled and torn and twisted; the cloth is pulled and rolled. The food we eat goes through some disciplinary process. It is subjected to heat or cold or some process of rolling, crushing or grinding before it is fit for food. Building material of which our houses are made must be sawed and hewn and cut before it is of any use. Shall the human life be less subject to discipline? To one who has this philosophy of life, which is truly Christian, life is worth living. To one who shrinks from the disciplinary forces of existence life is dreary or painful.

Again, the Christian says that life is worth living if it is regarded as service. As long as there is a being who needs you life is worth living. Among the most useful people in the United States are the school teachers. They are generally unadvertised, unknown, poorly paid, and in many instances much criticised. Large numbers of them become weary and discouraged. Not one of them, however, need feel useless as long as one groping mind depends upon him for intellectual growth or for moral impulse. From any point of view life becomes redeemed the moment we insert into it the inspiration of helpfulness. It is difficult to conceive of any human being who has sunk so low that some one does not look to him for some kind of help, and as long as this is true of any human life it is a life worth while. It is no more than fair to say that the selfish life of humanity is not worth living. It would better be cut off, but the heroism of daily sharing with others that which they need, and which we have, is a heroism which redeems life from the commonplace.

Life Eternal

The Christian not only says life is worth living if it is witness-bearing, discipline, and service, but life is worth living, also, because it is eternal. The great English preacher, Robertson, used to say that even if there was no future and no God; no punishment for wrong-doing and no reward for right-doing, even then he thought it would be better to be brave than to be cowardly, better to be pure than impure, better to be truthful than false. And undoubtedly it would be; but when we believe, as Christians do, that human life is everlasting, that there is punishment for evil and reward for good, that there is a God who is an eternal Father, and a Saviour who is a real Redeemer, then life becomes really worth while, and all the mistakes and troubles and short-comings of this earthly life are counted to be of little moment by the side of the things which await the spirit in the world which lies beyond.

The Divine Example

And another reason why life is worth living is because Christ has lived our life. He found it worth while. His life was not a failure. He came into a world worse than ours—in some respects infinitely worse. He was hopeful and optimistic; he had the joy of his Father. Because Christ lived our life and showed us how to live, he has made it worth while.

If now we accept the Christian philosophy in the optimistic spirit of Him who was not defeated by evil, but overcame the world, we are ready to accept this rule of the Kingdom. If life is worth while how shall we live it?

The rule of the Kingdom is straight and plain. "Whatsoever ye do in word or deed, do all in the name of the Lord Jesus." The emphasis for this rule of conduct in the Kingdom of God is on the little word all; and in the face of this rule the man of the world says, first: "This can not be done." He says, "You can not mix business and religion and politics. They were not made to mix. Business is business; religion is religion; the Golden Rule will not apply to money-making, barter, commerce and the whirl of the political arena. They are two separate things."

In the second place the man of the world says, "If you try it you can not make it pay." This is the insinuation of the old god of this world. The largest steamships the world has ever known have been recently launched, and have been fixed up with luxurious bars where liquor is sold to travelers. It is a pity that those who made and planned these wonders of construction did not advertise to the world like this: The largest steamships ever made by man are going to be temperance steamships. They will never contain a drop of intoxicating drink, nor will gambling be allowed on board. If this were done these steamers would be loaded on every trip. There are enough Christian people traveling now who would prefer that kind of a vessel, but capital is so worldly yet that it hesitates to obey this rule of the Kingdom, and is fearful it will lose money if it departs from an old custom. The same insinuation is offered on every side to the young man who says that he intends to conduct his business on the rule of the Kingdom. "It will not pay," he is told. You must yield to the pressure of the world and do things that are not exactly spiritually minded, because if you do not you will fail financially.

The Rule of the Kingdom

And in the third place the man of the world says that if you live according to this rule of the Kingdom you can not have a good time. You will have to give up a great deal. You will be deprived of pleasure. As if all the pleasure of the world were the property of the devil! It is an astonishing exhibition of narrowness on the part of the men and women of the world that they have defined pleasure by two or three things. Men and women are born in this world and live long lives and die without ever looking through a microscope or telescope. They know nothing about chemistry or botany, art, music or science. Their little lives revolve around the ballroom or gambling-room or amusement hall. They have gradually narrowed down their pleasures to these two or three things, and have shut out all of God's beautiful world which they have never understood, which, in fact, they have never seen. There is no pleasure which is right for a human being to have which a Christian can not enjoy. He is to give up nothing except the wrong things of life. Yet the man of the world insists upon it that if this rule is applied the joy of life will be rubbed out.

In answer to these insinuations of the man of the world the Christian says, the rule of the Kingdom to do all things to the glory of God is the only safe rule. The dual existence which many men try live is always dangerous. After a temperance meeting recently held in Birmingham, England, in which the business of the brewers was declared by the temperance speakers to be a source of danger to the life of Great Britain, the brewers in public meeting expressed themselves with much indignation. They said, "Are we not public benefactors? Do we not give largely to churches and hospitals? Are we not good citizens?" It is difficult to understand how human being can so blind himself to the facts in the case, how this inconsistency can arise, how men can during the week manufacture that which poison body, mind and spirit, and then on Sunday go to the house of God and count themselves good Christians. This inconsistency, however, is the result of the attempt to make two rules work in the life. The one is the rule of the marketplace; the other is the rule of Christ. The result is always contention and trouble, and we in this country would not now be facing the great problem of commercial selfishness, and the passing of laws against combinations of capital if men engaged in large enterprises had ordered their business by the rule of the Kingdom.

Applied Christianity

In the second place the Christian says this rule of the Kingdom to do everything in the name of the Lord Jesus reveals the greatness and dignity of the Kingdom of God. God is interested in everything men do. It is not only when men put up a church or cathedral or found a missionary society that God is interested. He is interested when men build railroads or steamships. He is interested when they plan parks and lay out gardens. He is interested when they sow the field with grain and reap the harvest. He is interested when they build their houses, and when they go down into the earth for metals. In fact, all that men's hands find to do is of intense interest to God, and all he wants is that human beings should do it in the name of his Son.

Third: the Christian says in answer to the man of the world, This rule of the Kingdom can be obeyed. Men are obeying it in business. Outside the city of Birmingham is Bourneville, a model village maintained by George Cadbury, the famous English Quaker, the owner of the London Daily News. From that great newspaper all betting news and liquor advertisements have been eliminated. It is the cleanest paper in that respect among all the dailies of Great Britain. In this village of Bourneville, the people who work, thousands of them, take their turn to come into a large public hall several mornings in the week, where they have a short praise and prayer service before they go to their work. There is a spirit of good-will and kindness and brotherhood in the institution. There is a fine cricket ground for the men; gymnasium for the women; recreation grounds for all. Back of the houses are gardens for fruit and vegetables. It is a sweet, wholesome life of labor, redeemed from the grime of a great city and the drudgery of toil without any of the beauty of life. It is a bit of the Kingdom put into the manual labor of men and it sweetens the lives of thousands of people as they waken in the morning and anticipate the day's work. As fast as railroads have introduced the Young Men's Christian Association they have put a little of the Kingdom into themselves. It is a monstrous thing to say that this rule of the Kingdom can not apply to any part of life. All the trouble we have in our commercial and political life is due to the fact that we have not applied this rule. We are having trouble, commercially and politically, all the time because the rule of the Kingdom is not applied. We could establish heaven on earth by the introduction of this rule everywhere. Because we do not do it we suffer as a people and we shall continue to suffer as a world until we do all things in obedience to this rule of Christ.

Obedience a Duty

Fourth: the Christian says, if this rule of the Kingdom is the only safe rule of life, and if the rule reveals the greatness of the Kingdom of God, and if the rule can be obeyed, then it should be obeyed. The transgression of this principle means ruin to human life in its daily activity. The great injustice of man to man, the unequal laws relating to the holding of property, in all cases where there is injustice, can be traced back to the selfishness of men

IN THE HIMALAYAN HIGHLANDS

YOUR kind letter and your welcome gift came like a fresh breeze, to drive away all sorts of sorrows from my heart, which has of late been rather heavy. I am nearly alone just now, holding this, I believe, the highest mission station in the world. My colleague, who was looking after our hospital, got blood poisoning some months ago and had to go to a lower station, some four days' journey from here. My family, too, I had to send away for some time, because living at this height (11,600 feet above sea level) is not easily borne by Europeans, and now it happens unfortunately that I, as the superintendent of this Mission to the Himalayas, have to arrange for the whole work at our five stations, when half the staff is ill and unable to work. I can tell you it really did me good to get such a cheering letter, showing me that God's people are remembering our work even though they are on the other side of the earth.

We were to have a General Mission Conference this year in our Mission, a thing which is not so easily arranged for when each station is separated from the others by passes up to 18,000 feet high. Owing to the break-down of three of our small staff of workers, we had to abandon that idea.

About the death of Dr. Shawe last year in May I wrote and told you, but my letter must have been lost, because some time ago you wrote again to Dr. Shawe inclosing a check, which I returned to you. Now we have secured, with God's help, another medical man, Dr. A. Bauer from Germany, to have charge of this hospital. We hope he will join us here next spring. The loss of Dr. Shawe was a heavy one for us all, not only on account of the excellent example of a faithful servant of the Master, but especially because he was the only Englishman in our circle, and he kept our friends in England and America informed of the work that is going on here. My own English is acquired mostly in conversation with a few "globe trotters" and such like people. Some of these people are very interesting indeed, for example Dr. Sven Hedin, who has passed through here several times and whom we expect shortly if he has survived his latest expedition into Tibet.

But to tell you a little more of our work here. We have been issuing a paper, The Ladak Herald, for several years, which was suddenly stopped by the Kashmir government without apparent reason. Now this paper, after six months of writing to all sorts of influential people, was at last released and since March I am printing it again. The contents never could have reached in any other way, I know read every copy of our paper.

Dr. Peter Tells of His Work at the Highest Mission Station

In one of the monasteries lived for many years a man who is supposed to be an incarnation of Buddha. He was immured in a cell for twelve years. He came out only the other day, without seeing or speaking to anybody. He is the god of the people. We could not go and preach to him; we could not bring him books or tracts, but our paper he got regularly by his monks, and once when he could not get a copy in the market, his servant offered four annas (i. e., sixteen times the proper price) for a copy. How this man came out of the cell full of curiosity to see the world! I sent him word I would show him how our paper was printed and was instantly admitted before him, although all the monks hate the idea of a Christian seeing their living idol. I had a good talk with him, and was able to give the Gospels into his own hand. He promised me to read them carefully and I believe he will do it.

I had a remarkable sign how God guides us when we are doing his work. I wanted to show that man something and I came upon a box full of stores to make acetylene gas, which a traveler once had left me. I had never seen the working of an acetylene gas lantern, but had read about it. Having no lamp, I made two holes in an old tin box, filled it with the stores and put the whole into water. Plenty of gas was developed and it burned excellently. This man was most astonished that these stores would not burn, if not made wet first.

Coming home, I tried the same experiment again, but, though trying it twice, I was nearly blown up, as this lamp, made of tin, would not burn, but always exploded. Now, if it had done so in the presence of this "holy man" and his monks, they would have thought I had come to murder him, and it might have gone bad with me. This "incarnation" even went so far as to promise to see me in my house. Anybody here in Leh would gladly pay 100 rupees for such an honor. I hope God will lead me to find the right word for him when he comes.

I inclose a copy of a photograph of the castle where I had this interview.

Again thanking you for your kind interest in our work, I am,

It is a small paper, appearing monthly, but it finds its way into hands that would never buy a Gospel or tract; and each copy is read carefully over and over again. It does us good service as a pioneer, and to disprove all sorts of superstitions. One person, whom we

A REVIVAL TOUR OF THE WORLD

DURING the next two years Rev. J. Wilbur Chapman and Evangelist Charles M. Alexander plan to conduct revival meetings in England, America, and Australia, including a tour of the world. This summer Dr. Chapman's work will be chiefly in connection with the Winona Bible Conference, of which he is the founder and director, and which meets August 16 to 26 at Winona Lake, Indiana.

Mr. and Mrs. Charles M. Alexander will go to England, returning to this country in time to take part in the Northfield Bible Conference, and later in that at Winona Lake. In October Dr. Chapman and Mr. Alexander, and their associates, go to England to conduct several missions in large cities. They have been invited to conduct a union mission in Chicago in January, 1909, and will probably accept the invitation. Following this will be a united campaign in New York in February next. The evangelists expect to leave this country in March, 1909, to conduct an extended campaign through Australia, New Zealand, and Tasmania, and to make a tour of the world.

During the recent session of the Presbyterian General Assembly in Kansas City, Dr. Chapman and Mr. Alexander held a large evangelistic meeting in Convention Hall. About 6,000 people were present, including nearly 1,000 ministers, missionaries, and elders from all parts of the United States.

The choir, led by Mr. Alexander, contained about 1,000 voices. Hundreds of those present stood up to make a full surrender of their lives to God. The following day Mr. Alexander again led the singing at a great labor mass meeting when Governor Joseph Folk of Missouri, and Charles Stelzle, the minister and writer on labor problems, were among the speakers.

Hannah G. Cotting, of Richmond, Ill., was called recently to the better land. She was born in Vermont in 1830, and came to Illinois seven years later. She had been a member of the Methodist Church for over fifty years, and had long been a subscriber to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Her mother, who survives, is 103 years old.

A FLAXEN-HEADED, sturdy-limbed little lad scurried through the reading room of the Library of Congress on the Saturday before the Chicago Convention, and grabbed the skirts of a slight, graceful woman, whose arms were filled with books and who seemed to be hurrying to avoid recognition. Her large dark eyes smiled down at the boy as he tucked his hand confidently under her elbow and as they pushed out the handsome bronze doors of the great granite building he said gleefully:

"There, mother! we've found the very books we want, and we'll have a jolly Saturday reading 'em, won't we?"

"Who are they?" asked one of a group of sight-seers who were taking in the beauties of the building and who were evidently strangers in Washington.

"That, madam," said the keeper of the umbrella stand with swelling importance over his familiarity with those in the seats of the mighty, "that is Mrs. William Howard Taft and her little boy—the wife and son of the Secretary of War."

"Well, I hope that she is as nice a mother as she looks to be!" ejaculated the stranger, hurrying to the doors to have another peep at the rapidly retreating figures.

Mrs. Taft is devotedly fond of her big ing of it three years afterward when the family took up their residence in Washington, "we weren't in his way at all. The children were an actual help, and our family life was an object lesson the natives needed."

The eldest son, Robert Alphonso, at that time a lad of twelve, was placed in one of the public schools which Governor Taft had established all over the islands, and which have proven such wonderful agencies in bringing about reformation in the archipelago. Little Helen Heron Taft, then a wee lassie of nine, was put in a school in Manila, while Charles Phelps, the baby of the family, had kindergarten lessons at home. When Robert Taft returned to this country he found that he had not lost a single day in his studies and entered his classes exactly as he would have done if he had carried on his work in the schools of Washington or Cincinnati.

The big Secretary and his wife won all hearts in house are two fine Korean cabinets of mahogany which were presented to Governor Taft by the constabulary at Seoul. Upon the table in the library is a handsome case of inlaid wood, holding an elaborately embossed volume bearing engraved sentiments of esteem from the native citizens of Manila. The great dining-table is made of wood grown on the Island of Luzon, the sideboard and table are teak, and the walls of the hall are covered with rare Chinese embroideries. The entire house is filled with most interesting souvenirs.

On the morning the Chicago Convention met a letter was placed in Secretary Taft's hands. When he read it he smiled, and his smile is the most contagious imaginable. "It must be some more good news from Chicago," said a discerning friend. But it was not. The letter told him that his daughter, Helen, who was graduated from the Baldwin School a week or two ago, had won the Pennsylvania scholarship for the best entrance examination to Bryn Mawr College. Incidentally, this scholarship carries three hundred dollars; and while that of itself is an item—for the Tafts are not people of wealth—it was not that which made the Secretary smile. husband and trio of interesting children, and does not believe that anything in the world should be as important to her as their well-being and happiness. When Secretary Taft, then senior United States Circuit Judge of the Sixth Circuit, decided that he must go to the Philippines to help his "little brown brothers" (as he calls the Filipinos) establish a civil government, Mrs. Taft immediately decided that she and the children should go too. Her father, Mr. John W. Heron of Cincinnati, tried to persuade her not to go, picturing to her the baneful climate and the hardships to be encountered. "And you'll only be in your husband's way," he wound up.

"But you know, really," said Mrs. Taft in speak-the Philippines. Their open hospitality and keen interest in all that pertained to the betterment of the islands made them the beloved of high and low alike. Their Washington home is crowded with magnificent presents which the warm-hearted Filipinos pressed upon them. The furnishings in their parlors, library and dining room are interesting in the extreme. There are exquisite teak-wood pieces, one of which is a carved cabinet that of itself would waken the envy of a connoisseur, the shelves of which are filled with rare curios. In the hall of the of her father's eye, and it delights him beyond measure that she inherits his love for books and is developing into a student. She is a fine, wholesome, unaffected girl with her father's deep expressive eyes and fair complexion, while from her mother she inherits her crown of soft brown hair.

Robert is a sophomore at Yale. He couldn't, he just could not stay in New Haven while the Republican Convention was in session at Chicago last week, so he "cut an ex." to make the train which brought him to the Western city in time to see the opening of the great show. He'll have that examination to make up by hard work in September. When young Robert becomes too much absorbed

A Close Range View of the War Secretary

With the good times of college life the big Secretary tells him about one time when he was in college way back in the seventies. He was a splendid young fellow physically, weighing over two hundred pounds, and his chums were determined to run him for athletics. He liked it, but when his lesson reports came back to his worthy sire, who had held two cabinet positions under Grant, he told his son in no uncertain tones that he was not in college to make an athlete. He told it to him so convincingly that William Taft dropped excessive athletics and came out second in a class of one hundred and twenty at his graduation.

Mrs. Taft is a cultured, womanly woman, and should she become mistress of the White House, she will make a worthy successor of Mrs. Roosevelt. She is a delightful hostess in her own home, and as a happy grace of manner in meeting strangers which goes far toward making a woman popular in public life. She is not a club-woman and belongs to but few organizations of any kind. Her greatest pleasure and recreation is music. In her girlhood she was a brilliant pianist, and although she does not keep up her music as she did then, she is a skilled player yet. She was one of the most promising graduates of the Cincinnati College of Music, in the days when the Cincinnati institution vied with the Boston Conservatory. She was first president and one of the organizers of the Cincinnati Orchestra Association. Until she came to Washington to live, she cared but little for society life. She has always hailed with delight the time of year when she could go with her family to Murray Bay or the summer, where they could live far more simply than is possible at the capital.

On the day before the nomination at Chicago a light, graceful woman flitted into the War Department and passed swiftly up to the rooms of the Secretary. In his inner office a long distance telephone wire made direct connections with the Convention Hall at Chicago. All day long she sat in the inner office, as much interested as the big Secretary, who, amidst all the excitement, only left his work at his desk occasionally to listen to "the latest." Early Thursday morning she came again, and if she was weary, or a bit heart-sick over the suspense, there was nothing in her bright face to betray it to the eyes of her watchful husband. But when the word came over that long wire, late in the afternoon, "Taft is the standard bearer of his party," it was the slight, graceful little woman who was the first to congratulate her husband upon his nomination.

Mr. Taft Nominated at Chicago

EVERY American takes an interest in the great political conventions which meet for the purpose of nominating candidates for president and vice-president this year. Chicago, during the recent gathering of the Republican hosts, was the Mecca for thousands of visitors and the press of the country gave the convention the first place in their columns. The delegates met in the great Coliseum building, a picture of which was printed in the last issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

The main floor was reserved for the delegates, who numbered nearly a thousand, the place of each State being marked by a banner on the aisle. On the platform were places for the officers of the convention and at one side was a section for the national committeemen. The galleries were open to the public. The convention was opened at noon on Tuesday, the sixteenth, but long before ten, lines of people were making their way toward the convention hall in order to secure points of vantage from which to see the entrance of the different delegations, politicians and prominent statesmen. The convention hall was soon filled with animated spectators and presented a magnificent spectacle. There were a great many ladies in the galleries and their bright summer dresses added much to the effectiveness of the picture. A large number of foreign diplomats had come on from Washington and were in a special section. Among them were the French ambassador, M. Jusserand, and the Right Honorable James Bryce, British ambassador, and their wives, and Wu-Ting-Fang, the Chinese Minister.

Just before twelve a big purple banner was carried into the hall by the Ohio delegation. On the banner was a large portrait of William H. Taft. Right behind the banner was a man in a gray hat who was pointed out as Charles P. Taft, brother of the Secretary of War. The band played a few bars, and then Hon. Harry New brought down his gavel on the table, and the great convention was opened for work. Prayer was offered by the chaplain, Senator Burrows was appointed temporary chairman, and made what is known as the "keynote speech." The various committees were appointed, those on credentials and on resolutions being the most important.

Wednesday was a day of great activity. While several delegations were supporting loyally their "favorite sons," there did not seem to be much doubt in the minds of the delegates that Mr. Taft would be the party's choice for standard bearer unless President Roosevelt could be induced to run again. This the President most emphatically declined to do. The committee on credentials, after an all-night session, made their report sustaining the National Committee, but ordering four delegates for Arizona, Hawaii and New Mexico for future conventions. Senator Lodge, of Massachusetts, made the principal speech of the convention. It was a most scholarly and powerful address and at times carried the delegates away with enthusiasm. When he referred to President Roosevelt, floor and galleries broke out into a remarkable demonstration. The cheering lasted just forty-seven minutes. It would for a moment subside and then break out again with a deafening roar. It was the longest demonstration of its kind in the record of American conventions. Senator Lodge stated emphatically that Roosevelt did not wish for a third term and as they knew that the Senator made this statement at the President's request, it left the field open for other candidates. Much discussion was caused by the proposed anti-injunction plank, and it was inserted in the platform in a much modified form.

The candidates put in nomination on Thursday were William H. Taft, of Ohio, Senator Knox, of Pennsylvania, Governor Hughes, of New York, Cannon, of Illinois, Vice-President Fairbanks, of Indiana, Senator La Follette of Wisconsin, and Senator Foraker of Ohio. When the vote was called for only one ballot was necessary. Mr. Taft received the nomination, having 702 votes. Senator Knox came second, Governor Hughes third, and Speaker Cannon fourth.

The last day of the convention was made interesting by the contest for the nomination for the office of Vice-President. Vice-President Fairbanks twice refused the nomination, not caring to run again. The result was in doubt until the ballots were counted. The nomination went to New York State, Congressman Sherman, of Utica, being chosen on the first ballot.

HOW WE GOT OUR FLAG (SEE COVER PAGE)

LOVE of country seems to find its natural outward expression in reverence and love for the country's flag. The youngest child in the public school raises his hand respectfully to his forehead in "the Salute to the Flag," veterans and patriotic citizens lift their hats as it is carried by, guns crash their greeting and farewell as the colors stream in the wind from the staff of an entering or departing man-of-war, and troops in our garrisons stand at attention as it is raised to the morning breeze and lowered as the sun goes down.

The flag in its present form was not known in the early days of the American War for Independence and many different banners were carried by the troops from the different colonies, most of them being devices or adaptations of designs known for many years in the colonial forces. In the early days of the colonies they used sometimes the flag of England, sometimes the coat-of-arms of the colony was painted on the banners used by the troops. The oldest historic flag preserved in this country is that of the famous "Three County Troop" of Massachusetts Bay Colony. The standard bore on the field an arm in armor bearing aloft a naked sword. Around the edge was a silver fringe. The flag was made in London about 1652 on an order from Massachusetts, and the makers' bill for materials and work is yet in existence. This banner was carried proudly at the head of the buff-coated, steel-capped cavaliers of the troop for many years. Then it was put away in an attic, where it reposed in peace until the morning of "the Lexington Alarm," April 19, 1775. The banner was then taken down and carried into the fray. Again the banner returned to the attic, later to be rescued and placed among the treasured relics of a local museum.

In 1685, in the days of Governor Andros, the United Colonies of New England began using as their flag the red cross of St. George on a white field, the cross occupying the whole flag. In its centre was a gold crown over the cypher of the sovereign, King James. In 1707, the colonies adopted the Union flag along with great Britain.

After the outbreak of the war with the mother country various mottoes were placed beneath the colonial coats-of-arms on the standards carried by the various regiments. The rattlesnake began to be adopted as a device, the snake usually having thirteen rattles to represent the thirteen colonies. At Bunker Hill the patriots undoubtedly carried a blue flag with a pine tree on a white square next the staff. Trumbull, the Revolutionary artist, makes this flag a prominent feature of his great painting of the battle. He served in the war himself, knew many of the officers and men who were at Bunker Hill and most of the faces are actual portraits. He, without doubt, heard from these men just what kind of a flag was carried, and, as many of the veterans saw the picture, they would recognize any discrepancy if it existed.

The flag raised at Cambridge, Mass., where the American army was assembled in 1776, was the first approaching our present standard. On the square next the staff was the Union Jack, as the colonists had not then determined to throw off their allegiance to Great Britain. The main field was composed of thirteen red and white stripes to represent the thirteen colonies. This flag served for a while, but Congress felt it was inappropriate after independence had been declared and many new designs were submitted. Washington, John Ross and Robert Morris designed a banner which met the approval of Congress when shown to them in the early summer of 1777. The field was of thirteen red and white bars as before, but the square next the staff was blue and on it were thirteen stars. There has been much written as to where this design and color scheme came from. Any one who has ever seen the coat-of-arms of the Washington family can have no doubt that it furnished the idea. The coat-of-arms has a field across the top on which are three stars; the lower two-thirds is made up of red and white stripes. In fact, the present shield of the coat-of-arms of the United States is that of the Washingtons with more stars added to represent all of the States and the bars raised to thirteen in number. The making of the nation's flag was entrusted to a patriotic widow named Betsy Ross, who lived in a quaint old house in the Quaker City. Her heart was in the work, but she little thought as her nimble fingers pushed the needle through the white and crimson folds and sewed on the white stars that she was earning for herself a place in the history of her country and that her home would be preserved as a place of patriotic pilgrimage long after her own earthly pilgrimage was ended.

On the day appointed Washington and his two compatriots entered the parlor of the Betsy Ross house to inspect the new flag. Carefully she took out the colors from the cabinet, and as the three men faced her she carefully unfolded the flag to their delighted gaze; all felt that at last the right design had been chosen which would represent the whole country. In a few months the Stars and Stripes were flying at the head of every regiment, the same flag we know and love, except that more stars have joined the constellation on the unsullied field of blue.

At Chicago

THE quadrennial custom of expending the pent-up national enthusiasm at our great political conventions is one that seems to be difficult for foreigners to understand. The recent Chicago Convention, which nominated Taft and Sherman for President and Vice-President, was a notable illustration. Twelve thousand persons cheered themselves hoarse for forty-seven minutes as an expression of admiration for a retiring President, while about to nominate his successor. Yet this new time-record for prolonged enthusiasm did not carry the convention "off its feet," nor did the leaders at any moment lose control of the great gathering, which in many respects was one of the most impressive and majestic sights ever witnessed in American politics. The enthusiasm was merely letting off superfluous steam at the safety valve, and was a very necessary prelude to the real business of the occasion.

How such an assemblage as that in Chicago or the one which is to follow shortly in Denver, strikes a foreigner, may be gathered from a remark of Prof. Bryce, the British Ambassador, and one of the most distinguished men of our time. He pronounced the Chicago Convention a magnificent spectacle impossible in any other country on the face of the globe, and an object-lesson to Europe of the free and independent manner in which Americans choose their rulers and direct the management of their national affairs.

When the Denver Convention meets, we will once again have the brilliant audience, set like the scenes of a play, the marching of the hosts of delegates with their waving guidons, the fervid oratory, the excitement, and "the thunder of the captains and the shouting" that lately made Chicago the temporary focus of the continent. And then, when the nominations are all completed, and the country has somewhat settled down, the people themselves will quietly take up the problem that is to be solved in November at the polls. While the excitement and distractions of a Presidential election are unsettling to business, our people as a whole accept them with characteristic good nature, as an inseparable feature of our political system, and a safety valve for popular feeling which it would be unwise to try to reform or abolish.

National Ideals

IS THE Declaration of Independence outgrown? So at least it would appear from many indications. It is now seldom read on the Fourth of July, as was once the all but universal custom. It is apparently much less frequently published, and one may look for it in vain through many a private library, and many a volume of American history. Frequently a patronizing reference is made in current articles and addresses to its more familiar phrases, and it is slightly referred to in conversation, as when a school principal recently declared to the writer that one of its statements, badly misquoted by the way, "makes us smile in these days."

Now, it is a fair question whether this state of things does not arise as much from thoughtlessness as from deliberate discrediting of the ideals which the Declaration expresses. As an economic treatise, or as a lawyer's brief, the introductory paragraphs of our famous Bill of Rights may be open to criticism; but as an expression of ideal principles, set before the people to be more and more fully realized as circumstances may make it possible, these same statements become most admirable.

It is in this light that the Declaration ought to be viewed, and so constantly referred to and its ideals cherished; for it is all too easy for a nation to lose its idealism. Lincoln, who was a great lover of the Declaration of Independence, spoke of it as "setting a standard for free society which should be familiar to all, and revered by all; constantly looked to, constantly labored for, . . . and constantly spreading and deepening its influence, and augmenting the happiness and value of life to all people of all colors everywhere." If this be true, how carefully should the facts be kept before the people and the spirit expressed by Lincoln be cultivated in the rising generation!

There is that about such an expression of our national ideals which appeals with special force to those who wish to think of this as still a Christian nation. They are glad to be reminded that the men who promulgated the Declaration of Independence were, for the most part, men of deep-lying Christian principles, and to believe that when these men set their hands to this historic document it was with a purpose consistent with the loftiest Christian idealism. Americans in amply sufficient number will still be found loving to dream of a perfect democracy, with essential equality for all men under the Stars and Stripes. They feel that though there may be many practical difficulties to overcome, the dear hope of American freedom, for which so much has been suffered, is still worthy to be cherished. They wish to believe that in "the land of the free" the inherent worth of every individual will ultimately be recognized, and no man counted subject to any other, except in the sense that each is subject to the good of all.

Fourteen Golden Years

ONE of the features of the national holiday week, in which thousands of our readers are enthusiastically interested, is the annual opening of our Children's Home at Mont-Lawn on the Hudson. To mark its fourteenth anniversary, a new and spacious dormitory—the largest on the grounds—has been erected, and the numerous friends who will be present at the Fourth of July exercises will view a scene both beautiful and inspiring. There is only one Children's earthly Paradise, and that is Mont-Lawn.

Since our Children's Home was first opened, an aggregate of twenty-six thousand poor children have spent a ten days' summer vacation there. Of this great army of little ones, it is no exaggeration to say that the greater part never had a holiday outing before, while many of them had never seen a tree or a flower. The country was to them an unknown land, the joys and attractions of which, when discovered, delighted them beyond expression. Those sad little hearts, out in the fields and woods, made sweet companionship with the birds and the blossoms. Roses came back to wan cheeks, pale with the life of the tenement, and the sparkle of innocent mirth kindled the eyes. A new and beautiful world was unfolded to them—a world filled with kindness and goodness and gentle spiritual influences. Thousands of the children have grown to manhood and womanhood in those intervening years. They look back with gratitude upon the happy days they spent at Mont-Lawn.

With the co-operation of our readers, we hope to send three thousand little lads and lasses to the Home this summer. We cordially invite all who wish to have a share in this beautiful benevolence to unite with us in this effort. A full description of our Mont-Lawn Home will be found on another page.

THREE DAYS OF GRACE

(ON ACCOUNT OF THE HOLIDAY)

IN PREVIOUS announcements we have said that our Special Subscription Offer would close July 5. However, we now wonder if we consulted your convenience in the matter as much as we should have done, for we forgot to take in consideration the fact that the date set falls on Sunday—and the Sunday immediately following Independence Day.

So many people go away over the Fourth, or are particularly busy at this time in their own home that we have decided to extend our offer three days, that is, until Wednesday, July 8. In other words, we add three days of grace to our proposition in order to help you to help us, and so as not to crowd you for time if you have determined to win one or more of the rewards which we promise to send for new subscriptions. For full details see our issues of June 10 and 17. Remember that every new subscription mailed to us on or before July 8 will be accepted at the greatly reduced rate at present open to new subscribers.

Now that the time is short we would urge all friends of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to do all they can to help us bring up our subscription list to 300,000 and so enable us to raise the standard of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and make it in every particular the most attractive weekly family magazine published.

Surely the offer we ask you to present to your friends—an eight months' subscription to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD at the greatly reduced price of fifty cents—will attract new subscribers with very little persuasion or argument on your part, and the rewards which we offer you are really more liberal than we can afford.

New subscriptions will run from July 1, 1908, to March 1, 1909—which includes practically all the special issues of the year—and if you will take every opportunity in the next seven days to put in a good word for us among your friends you can very easily make yourself the possessor of a fine library of six superb books, and enjoy the consciousness that you have started an influence for good, the ultimate extent of which no man can measure.

Do Not Write Long Letters

When sending in your orders, simply write on a piece of paper:

Name of new subscriber
Street address of new subscriber
Post-office of new subscriber
County and State of new subscriber
Amount enclosed for this subscription
Name and address of sender to whom the reward is to be sent
Title of reward selected

You need not write a letter. We will understand what to do if you will send the particulars mentioned above with the remittance.

Address, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD,

THE BIBLE and the NEWSPAPER

Safety for the Children

IN THIS altruistic age, when the human heart is so sensitive to every pain and danger, the question of the saving of physical life is a very important one and a healthful public sentiment is being crystallized into valuable devices and appropriate laws for the protection of life and limb. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, learning that there had been a new fire-escape invented for school children, reaching from the street to the windows of the building, wrote through its editor to the firm of J. E. Phillips & Co., at Sterling, Ill., about the matter and received the following answer:

This photograph of our fire-escape was taken expressly for you. I am so much interested in humanity that I wish everyone to see it. If we are the means of saving the lives of any one we will think our mission well paid. The fire-escape cost over $3,000 when built. It was designed by an architect in Chicago, with the help of our school board. It can empty the building of 600 scholars in thirty-seven seconds. It is made of steel and is self-supporting. Fire drill is practised often.

A new fireproof arrangement is to be installed in sixty-five school buildings of New York City. "After a thorough inspection of public school buildings, members of the Board of Education have decided to do what work is required to make sixty-five buildings at least partly fireproof. It is necessary to do this to meet requirements of the Building and Fire Departments. Acting on the recommendation of Alexander W. Ross, in charge of the Brooklyn Building Bureau of the Board of Education, the officials have approved a new system of concrete construction for stairs and hallways. This material can be placed in a short time, and the cost is not excessive. To build steel and stone stairs and fire-escapes in sixty-five schools would cost more than $2,000,000, and the department was unable to obtain such a large appropriation. The results will be as satisfactory by using concrete, and the cost will be about one-tenth. In several schools the new stairways have been built and the officials expressed surprise and gratification at the results. Floors adjoining public stairs, wooden corridors and the stairs have been replaced with reinforced concrete. This work can be done in any building in two or three days and therefore does not upset the regular work. Children could be marched into these halls and left there in safety, Mr. Ross said, even while the rooms were burning. The corridors could withstand any amount of heat and great weight. Before school opens next fall all the old buildings will have been made fireproof."

Our Christian civilization has no better illustration than in the great care which is being taken of the bodies, minds and souls of the children. In olden times, when war was the principal glory of men and nations, the question was how to make good strong machines to march and fight well. The dwarfed and maimed and feeble were killed as a mercy to the individual and favor to the State; but Christ came to teach the world better,—that its first and largest obligation was to childhood; and by the manner in which he spoke of them and by the way in which he treated them, he emphasized the duty of his followers to children. The church has her most hopeful enterprises in the moral instruction and spiritual tuition of the young. The church owes much of her present success to the improved appliances used for the escape of children from all forms of moral and spiritual danger.

Take this child away, and nurse it for me, and I will give thee thy wages. (Ex. 2 : 9.)

A Desirable Immigrant

Hyman Fenster, a Hungarian boy only thirteen years of age, captured the scholarship of the Child Labor Committee at Public School No. 110, New York City. The strange part of this record is that this boy, three months ago, came to this country unable to speak a word of the English language, and in such an incredibly short time he made such progress in the study of the language that he won this prize, for which many older English-speaking children were competing. While many undesirable people come to us from foreign shores, it is our glory as a nation that we have so many persons coming to us who give us excellent material out of which to make a splendid civilization and a prosperous church. Our common school system is a potential factor in Americanizing our foreign-born population. Our school system is a little republic in a Republic, where the rich man's children and the poor man's children may start out with equal chances in the race of life; and it so often happens in our free country, that the highest prizes of life are secured by the children of poverty and obscurity.

Wisdom is the principal thing; therefore get wisdom: and with all thy getting get understanding. (Prov. 4 : 7.)

Tolstoy on Immortality

Victor Hugo, a little while before he died, gave a dinner at his home. At the table were five atheists and five believers. One of the atheists said: "To believe in God is to believe in nothing." Hugo's eyes flashed fire as he responded: "To believe in God is to believe in everything; in one's soul and in eternal life. I feel the symptoms of immortality in my own bosom. My bodily strength is abating, but I breathe the fragrance of the roses as I did when I was a boy, and my heart thrills with melody as it did when I was a young man. The snow is on my head but the flowers of summer are in my heart. The clock of my life at death will strike twelve, to begin with one in an eternal day." The eightieth birthday of Count Tolstoy will be celebrated this summer and the other day a friend wrote him a letter offering birthday congratulations. In his answer he expresses the most clear and positive faith in the reality of the life which is to come. He says: "All our life, from birth to death—is it not, with all its dreams, itself a dream? Our earthly life is one of the dreams of another and more real life. Death in youth is as when a man is awakened before he has slept full measure. Death in old age is as when a man wakes of his own accord after good sleep. I believe with all my soul in what I say. I feel—I know with certainty—that in dying I shall be happy, that I shall enter a world more real." In these days of dull materialism and agnosticism, it is a wonderfully inspiring example to hear old men of so widespread influence speak so hopefully and joyously of the other life, on whose threshold they stand. Christ hath brought life and immortality to light.

Verily I say unto you, if a man keep my saying, he shall never see death. (John 8 : 51.)

The Prodigal's Reception

A man married a young widow with a small son. Her former husband had left her $10,000 in his will. The man said: "I will take care of you and we will lay away that $10,000 for your boy." Two other sons were born to them. The stepson was educated and taught habits of business. At twenty-one years of age he asked for the money his father had left. He was told that instead of being $10,000, it had been invested for him and was now $50,000. He was asked to let the money stay in the business and to become a partner with his stepfather. The young man refused, took his $50,000, fell into bad habits and lost it all and came home in rags, a tramp. His stepfather met him at the train, took him to the barbershop and clothier and presented him to his mother at the house as a gentleman. The nicest room in the house was assigned him and he was told that was his permanent home. He was also told by his stepfather that he was to be taken into the business firm composed of the father and the two half-brothers. This was more than he could stand. He began to weep at his ingratitude and at the love which had been lavished upon him. He devoted himself to business, was devoted to his stepfather and was as loyal to his interests as his own sons. This picture, though it seems overdrawn, is one of the real life. The stepfather had a good disposition naturally, but his magnanimous treatment of the prodigal was out of his sincere affection for his wife. There were few ties of love that bound him to the bad boy, only the love of his faithful wife. He loved the boy for the sake of his mother. Our Father loves his children and receives the prodigals returning to him for their own sake and the sake of his Son who died for them, and treats them, in his affection, as though they had never sinned against him.

Bring forth the best robe, and put it on him; and put a ring on his hand, and shoes on his feet. (Luke 15 : 22.)

Killed His Wife

William Campbell killed his wife at their home, 360 East Ninetieth Street, New York, under most distressing circumstances. Campbell, who is a bricklayer, was out of work, and the wife said to her eldest daughter, Loretta, who is a dressmaker, "Poor dad needs a little heartening," and prepared for him a sumptuous meal. So she baked a chocolate cake and made a salad and bought a big thick steak—luxuries which generally were reserved for Sunday or for a birthday of one or the other of the family. She put the best china on the table, and had it prettily arranged so that the husband, returning from his unsuccessful quest for work, might see it as soon as he came into the flat. "My, my, Carrie, what's going on?" he inquired smilingly as he entered. "Only a little surprise, William," she told him. "A sort of a holiday spread for a change." The family had come to the table. The son George, who was the main support of the family, twitted his father on his intemperate habits. The father angrily threw a plate at George, who raised a chair to strike his father, when his father, seizing a carving knife, ran upon the son, stabbing him in the arm. The mother cried to both of them as loud as she could to desist, and, seeing the father's hand raised with the knife to strike the boy, she rushed, throwing her arms around the neck of her husband to save both of them from harm, when the thrust that was supposed to be aimed at the boy pierced the neck of his wife, killing her. As the children gathered around the coffin of the mother, George said, "It was drink that did it. Father was a good man when he was sober, but whisky changed him. He killed our mother and we are broken-hearted, but we must do what we can for him. It was not he, but the demon he took in the whisky, that committed this awful crime." "Yes," agreed the other children simply. "Whisky did it." Such tragedies are becoming so numerous that they appear in the daily prints as the ordinary transactions of everyday life. On the walls of the sorrowing home, on the plate of the coffin, on the tombstone at the grave, let it be written: "Whisky did it."

At the last it biteth like a serpent, and stingeth like an adder. (Prov. 23 : 32.)

Mont-Lawn's Fourteenth Golden Year

Our Children's Paradise Celebrates Its Anniversary by Christening "Sunbeam Cottage," Its New Dormitory.

THE fourteenth season at Mont-Lawn is now joyously under way, and never in this long succession of life-giving, joy-bringing summers has this "Children's Paradise" been so beautiful, or so well equipped to receive and care for its little guests. The same dear, delightful Mont-Lawn, yet larger and better.

A new cottage has been added—the most spacious on the grounds; a wide, roomy and picturesque building of gray stone and shingles, where two large, airy and white-curtained dormitories, with seventy-six new cots, accommodate seventy-six little children every ten days, making six hundred in all, during the summer.

Last season the Home entertained about 2,500 children; this year, with our larger accommodations, we will be able to open our doors to over 3,000 little city waifs and give them the inestimable benefits of a ten days' outing in God's own country.

A notable innovation this season consists of 600 new outing suits for boys and girls, made of the prettiest and most durable wash-goods, one of which is given to every arrival, so that all may romp to their heart's content and every little youngster fall down as many times as he or she thinks necessary, without fear of "spoiling" the clothes that mother mended up and washed and ironed to take away. For with instinctive motherly pride every effort is generally put forth to make the children's shabby clothes as presentable as possible before they leave for the "country." Now they can take their "good clothes" home again unrumpled, and those who come to us in veritable rags and patches will have torn clothes neatly mended, or, if necessary, be fitted out anew from head to foot before they leave.

How can we tell you of the good—the all-round good—physical, spiritual and moral—that a ten days' sojourn at Mont-Lawn does for the poor children of the tenements? We who have always known the country from our childhood days, how can we hope to understand what it means to these little street waifs—many of whom have never seen the sun rise and set—to be turned loose for the first time in their poverty-stricken and often squalid lives into the green fields and under the shady orchard trees on the beautiful twenty-six acres of Mont-Lawn? The only idea that many of them have ever had of the green grass is a hot square in some one of the lesser parks of the city, with always a policeman nearby to warn them to "keep off."

Could you go with them from Tarrytown over the beautiful Hudson to Nyack, ride with them from the Ferry to the Home, and hear them shout when they catch the first sight of the meadows and the winding road; see the looks of rapture that overspread the faces of the frailer ones and hear some little tot as she sees a cluster of buttercups, or daisies, or wild carrot, asking, "O teacher, what are them? Oh, can't I get out and pick just one? Oh, lemme go and have one—please!"—then there would be no need of this appeal in their behalf. Could you spend a day with them, from the joyous getting up time to the quiet hour when, tired with the kind of tired that puts new life into growing boys and girls, they repeat the evening prayer before they fall asleep—then indeed we would never have to ask for a single dollar to support the Home.

Not all of the children who come to Mont-Lawn are sickly, emaciated or ragged; many there are, alas! to whom these words apply, and nearly all are tired—wary not from work at school but from the burdens of home life laid all too soon on their frail, young shoulders. Many are "little mothers" and "little fathers" and bread-winners while yet they ought to be at their lessons. But again, thank God, there are bright, sturdy little fellows and plump rosy-cheeked girls who come to us. Yet right here lies one of the very reasons why they need Mont-Lawn; they are full of what doctors call "healthy animal spirits." The burning, evil-smelling, crowded streets and alleys afford the only outlet for this enthusiasm, and too often the atmosphere of the streets is not only evil-smelling but evil-breeding. "As the twig is bent, the tree is inclined." Shall we leave them, then, the summer long, to these influences wafted on the sultry breezes that blow through the slums of the city? Or shall we take them for a while where every bit of bubbling-over, childish energy can find a healthful outlet, where every freshening influence of nature is at work upbuilding mind and body and soul, and where every one and everything works together for the good of the little children?

The secret of the success of Mont-Lawn is written on the Lodge where all can see it as they drive through the entrance, for above this in letters of gold is inscribed, "I LOVE GOD AND LITTLE CHILDREN." Hundreds of children in every direction and love everywhere! The little children can not help loving one another here, for where love reigns as it does at Mont-Lawn, the cross word and selfish thought have no place. Children forget to quarrel, for the spirit of love and consideration for others is contagious. No one can escape it, not even the casual visitor.

There are many features that combine to make a visit to "The Children's Paradise"—a Children's Paradise in every sense of the word—a memorable occasion to its friends, and we wish indeed that all those who have so generously contributed to it might come and see for themselves how and why and where the beautiful work is being carried on. A deep sense of peace and rest is couched in the shadows of the great spreading trees; the continual inspiration of the broad, shining river just beyond in the valley, the verdant green of sloping lawns, the picturesque Children's Temple beyond the Lodge, and finally the homelikeness of every cottage, and the quiet, old-fashioned dignity of the Homestead that fairly radiates hospitality—these things all enter into that brooding spirit of the place that lays hold on you from the moment you enter the grounds.

"What do they do all day long, and how do you manage to keep them out of mischief?" are some of the questions people ask us. "Do?" Why, the days are all too short; there is so much to see, so many places to investigate, so many games to play. There is for one thing the splendid swimming pool where all except the smallest children have their daily bath—boys in the morning, girls in the afternoon, or vice versa. Nor are the baby brothers and sisters not old enough for this luxury left out of consideration. Behind the cottages is the paddling brook—a joy forever! Not a real brook this time, but an improvised brook, where water runs in at one end and out the other all day long. And how the children do love to get in with their bare little feet and splash and paddle. Then there is the out-doo gymnasium, a fine resort when some group of children are wondering "what to do next." Every hour spent there means just so much benefit to little bodies that in most cases are sorely in need of just such exercise.

Further on are the swings—and what child does not love to "let the old cat die?" For the little youngsters there is also the ever new sand-pile—for children love sand as instinctively as they love candy.

The call for dinner is given at 12 o'clock and you may be sure that every child on the place immediately responds. In the shortest time imaginable the line is formed and they march over to the big dining pavilion where table after table is laden with heaping plates of pure, wholesome food; vegetables, too, from our own farm. Every one has all that is wanted. An average of 125 quarts of milk a day and from two to three barrels of bread cut up for each meal may convey some idea of what catering means in the kitchen at Mont-Lawn. We give them the best the land affords for ten whole days. But just think for a moment! The memory of these ten days of plenty has got to last for 355 days to come before the Children's Home opens again next year. The joy of that week and a half must carry them through many a long, hot week to follow and dreary, cold weeks in winter before the days of the "Children's Paradise" will come around again—if indeed they are so fortunate as to go a second time. Picture the contrast, if you can, between eating from this bountiful table out in the open air, and the scanty meals these little ones will return to in some hot, crowded kitchen in a stifling tenement.

Then after dinner, perhaps a long walk with one or more of the teachers into the woods and across the fields; or it may be a real drive—think of what that means—"a real drive" over the beautiful hills about Nyack, or to the nearby "Hook Mountain" and "Rockland Lake"—a revelation at every bend of the road, and one long succession of exclamations and shouts of glee.

Better still, if the day is Saturday—the gala day at Mont-Lawn—Dr. Klopsch comes up and special games are played; the bean game, the cane game and the races. Then the children go fairly wild in their glee and almost run over Dr. Klopsch in their eagerness to get at him in view of all the joy and fun his coming means.

Then there are stories when little girls grow a bit weary of boisterous play. How eagerly they listen! And these fascinating stories come in beautifully at bedtime, too, when the lesson of unselfishness and kindness that every one embodies is absorbed by little minds in just the right mood to drink in their meaning. It all sounds small enough to us who naturally associate the beautiful Bible stories and fairy tales and time-old children's games with all little ones. But remember that to many of these children they are new; they are wonderful. These children have been starving for them all along, poor little things, though they didn't know it, for no one at home has time to bother about such things; the sterner realities of life press relentlessly on father and mother and often on little bread-winners themselves.

Marching in for Dinner

Nor are rainy days unprovided for. The floor above the dining pavilion is a big, splendid playroom that can be closed in with blinds when necessary, and here all the games that children love make rainy days as joyous as the sunny ones.

Finally, at the close of every day, rain or shine, there is the sunset chapel service. Marching in two long lines the children enter the beautiful Temple—and truly the most ideal house of worship for children that one could imagine. Attractive, inviting from every view on the outside, it is still more so within, with its double rows of quartered oak pews and leaded cathedral windows lining both sides. Running the entire width at the back are the great windows where in rich colors glows the beloved pictures of the Saviour with the little children eagerly crowding about him for the blessing of his smile and the sacred touch of his tender hand. Impressive at every weekday service, the Children's Temple becomes far more so on Sundays. Then visitors from the village come in crowds and Dr. Klopsch, the children's friend, conducts the services. On a recent occasion Admiral Sigsbee and Gen. O. O. Howard were melted to tears when they heard the children sing.

And is this gracious influence indelibly impressed on the children or is it short-lived? Do they go back to the city leaving behind them all the teachings of Mont-Lawn? We know that the influence lasts. They carry with them, often for years, some lingering after-glow of the love, peace and sunshine that wrapped them from head to foot like a clean, sweet, wholesome garment during their outing there. Every once in a while a young man or woman, thrifty and well dressed, comes to tell us that the spirit of Mont-Lawn first awakened wholesome ambition to play a part worth while in the world's work. During the winter months we are constantly reminded by Settlement workers and the mothers of the great East Side that the uplifting influence of the ten ever-rememberable days is still with the children as they sing over and over again the sweet old hymns dear to the heart of every child who knows them, and which they first learned and loved at Mont-Lawn, never to be forgotten.

"The cry of the children." It is coming to us from all corners of the metropolis with its four million inhabitants. It is pitiful, and irresistibly appealing. The past winter has been a particularly hard one and much of this extra privation and hardship has fallen on the children. Many of them are half sick, most of them are tired and care-worn, all of them are anxiously hoping, praying for a chance to go into the country for a few blessed days. You who are mothers know the wants and needs of these little ones and we know you will help us if you can. To you who have never known the blessing of motherhood this is a God-given opportunity to care for one of the Master's little ones. You who are fathers and older brothers know the temptations that beset growing boys of the streets, most of whom lose their childhood with their short knickerbockers. Must we not all of us stretch forth our stronger hands to these boys and girls who are old before their time, to the "little mothers" and "little fathers" of the tenements, and give them what we can of health and life and light and the rightful joys of childhood? Can we let them go through the summer without knowing what God's beautiful country means?

Take the Children to the Country

Take the children to the country; take them into purer air, Where the fields are starred with beauty and the world is fresh and fair. They who never saw the sun set, they who never saw it rise— Never saw the wondrous beauty of the rainbow in the skies.

They are old while yet in childhood, weary, careworn girls and boys, Bearing all too soon life's burdens, young, without their childish joys;

The New Cottage at Mont-Lawn

Give them days of blessed sunshine; give them food enough to spare; Give them all of nature's tonics, in the pure, life-giving air.

Let them see the fresh, green meadows, see the forest and the sky; Let them feel the strong, clear breezes of the river flowing by. Tell them how a loving Father counts them dearer far than gold; Tell them how the gentle Shepherd calls them early to his fold.

We who guard our own dear children as the apple of our eye, Shall we see God's other children left to suffer, pine and die? Left to those who'll teach them evil, and their youthful feet beguile, Till their pure and holy fancies fade amid surroundings vile?

"Feed my lambs!" The Master said it. When we meet him by and by, What account have we to render, if we pass them idly by?

"Inasmuch!" O blessed Master, seeking still to follow thee, We would hear thy voice proclaiming, "Lo, ye did it unto me."

Pittsfield, Me.

What Your Gift Will Do

Three Dollars pays for putting perfect happiness into one child's heart for ten bright summer days; it includes transportation, care, medical examination, wear and tear of a clean fresh suit, abundant meals each day, with all the joys of the country.

Twenty-one dollars endows one snowy cot all summer long, with the patron's name at its head. Could twenty-one dollars elsewhere invested yield such dividends?

Five hundred dollars, in bequest or donation, will perpetually endow a cot in memory of some loved one, and give health and love and kindness, year after year, to an endless succession of little waifs.

Contributions will be thankfully received and acknowledged in the columns of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. All money orders, checks, etc., should be made payable to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York.

The Welcome Dr. Klopsch Receives When He Comes to Mont-Lawn

Ready for the Glorious Fourth at Mont-Lawn

NEVER since the Children's Home at Mont-Lawn was founded—fourteen years ago—has the place looked so beautiful. Nature has been more bountiful than usual, for her robes of green seem fuller and fresher, as one looks at the circling hills and over the stretch of forest lying between the Home and the Hudson. The air is filled with the sweetest perfume and vocal with the songs of many birds, who fearlessly alight upon lawn-railings and low swaying vines, so near that one might almost touch their little glossy heads with an outstretched hand. Flowers, vines and birds everywhere!

Grand old hills and sparkling river in the distance unite to make a scene which many a world-wide traveler has pronounced the most beautiful he has ever seen. No wonder the children are clamoring to come! It is like a wonderful story from fairyland to those who come for the first time, but a reality, dear as life itself, to those who have once known the hospitality of Mont-Lawn.

As the Fourth of July—the day of all others—approaches, the Home and its surroundings are alive with preparations not only to welcome the children to a good old-fashioned celebration, but to see that nothing is left undone for real comfort when the day is done.

There will be the usual games and exercises on the lawn, the flag drill and march, music by band, and singing of patriotic airs by the children.

Speakers will address the little ones gathered in the Temple; speeches by men who are not only interested in this great work, but who have the happy faculty of interesting and holding the attention of children.

The dining pavilion, clean and shining in its new coat of paint, presents, perhaps, the most enticing invitation to the little guests. Long white-covered tables are to be set with an abundance of sweet, wholesome food, with various "extras" inseparable from the day we celebrate. Fire-works in the evening hold a close second place in childish enjoyment. A careful selection has been made; nothing of a dangerous composition, nothing with the slightest menace to the little ones is allowed, and careful hands "set them off" as soon as dusk will warrant their brilliant colors showing against the evening shades.

The out-door gymnasiums, having been overhauled and put in the best order, are ready for the merry girls and boys, who take turns in swings and "merry-go-rounds."

Favorite nooks, familiar to some of the little guests where they have passed many a pleasant hour on former visits, are awaiting the return of old friends and the advent of new. Matrons, teachers and their assistants, William the "chef" and his helpers, and all the staff of workers, are sparing no effort to make July 4, 1908, the greatest and most enjoyable day THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S Home has ever seen. And when it is all over and silence broods over all, will come the most lovely scene of all. Three hundred tired little forms will be nestling in the whitest of beds. Six hundred sleepy eyes will close as the "sand-man" makes his rounds, busy little hands and feet, now still, and soft, even breathing will tell of a restfulness never to be found in a hot tenement home, where close rooms are crowded with little ones, tossing in uneasy slumber to awaken on the morrow unrefreshed.

Is it not worth while to be the means of sending even one child to this lovely holiday home for ten beautiful days and peaceful nights?

The cost is trifling compared with the great good accomplished. Three dollars only gives a little tenement boy or girl a ten days' outing, while twenty-one dollars endows a bed for the season, giving seven children ten days each. The new dormitory gives opportunity for seventy-six additional small guests to be entertained, and also the privilege for seventy-six additional kind hearts to contribute to the good work of rescuing poor city children from the most baleful of all influences, the nurture and admonition of the city streets.

All contributions to be sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York City. "The children are calling."

Every kind hand stretched forth to help will give to the donor an added interest in the "Story of the Fourth at Mont-Lawn," which we shall give our readers next week.

WHAT IT MEANS TO BE A KING

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts*

"SAMUEL called the people together unto the Lord to Mizpeh." It was a slightly place, on a hill which rose six hundred feet above the surrounding valley; well suited for a coronation.

"Thus saith the Lord God of Israel." Samuel voiced the message of God to the waiting people. God did not say, "This is the honored king in whom I am well pleased; hear ye him," as he afterwards spoke of Christ at his baptism and on the Mount of Transfiguration, as his beloved Son.

"Ye have this day rejected your God." Have we not a right to think that God was pained by the rejection? He has a mind like our own, only greater in degree. Are we not pained when a friend drops us? a familiar friend who turns his heel against us? Have you ever felt this pain? Now you know something about how God feels when those who should love and serve him turn aside.

"Present yourselves before the Lord by your tribes and by your thousands." Samuel was ready to make the best of the situation because it was God's wish that it should be so. Contrary to his own wishes and feelings Samuel set the people in order that their king might be selected. An inferior man in Samuel's place would have said, "I do not like to do it," "I cannot do it." "An' what's liking got to do with it, when it's the right thing to be done?" says Lisbeth in Adam Bede. It was the right thing for Samuel to help Israel select a king because God had said, "Let them have their way."

Saul Made King

"The tribe of Benjamin was taken," which means there was a selection by sacred lot. Then that tribe was gathered about Samuel and the lot was again cast, and the family of Matri was designated as that which should furnish the king. But when man after man was made to appear the king was not found.

"They inquired of the Lord further." God was there but invisible.

"He hath hid himself among the stuff." God was invisible to the people, but they were visible to him; he even saw the king elect in hiding. Strange we should ever try to do anything out of God's sight.

"God save the king!" So cried the people when Saul had been brought from his hiding, and placed by Samuel before the people as their chosen king. They delighted in him because he was a head and shoulders taller than any other man in Israel—a giant. How mistaken they were in taking his true measure!

"Then Samuel told the people the manner of the kingdom." He set before them the relation of their newly established king to the Eternal King, God over all, and he wrote the laws of God in a book lest the king should forget, and lest they too should forget. Perhaps Samuel copied the law of the king in Deut. 17: 14-24, for it was commanded that whenever a king should be chosen, the king himself should write a copy of the law, that he might keep it always with him to read therein all the days of his life. But Samuel did it for Saul.

"There went with him a band of men whose hearts God had touched." They accompanied King Saul to his home, acting as the king's body-guard or guard of honor. While loyal to their king they were none the less loyal to God.

"How shall this man save us?" These words were the only discord in that crowning day. They were spoken by the children of Belial, not because, as one might think at first, they were superior to the occasion, but quite the contrary. They were a vicious element in Israel, "agin' the government," as we say in modern times.

"What concord hath Christ with Belial?" In this expression made by the apostle Paul we see Belial personified as the prince of licentiousness and corruption.

"But he held his peace." The first act of the new king was a wise one. To ignore evil-minded people is one of the best ways to overcome them.

Illustration and Application

Some of the truths this lesson suggests are: 1. God is the supreme Lord, and his law the supreme law of every individual and of every land. 2. A human king is but an image of God, and as idols likely to take the place of God in men's thoughts. 3. Only as a human officer is Godlike and leads men toward God is he true to his opportunity. 4. A good man is more kingly than an ungodly ruler. 5. All the good are to be crowned by and by as "kings and priests unto God."

daunted reply, "that you pitied me; but as for me, I pity you, who have given utterance to such words as 'I shall be compelled.' These are unkingly words, and I say to you, in royal phrase, that neither the Guises nor all your people, nor yourself, are able to compel an humble manufacturer of earthenware to bend his knee before statues."

A king should come to his office in the spirit in which artists like Tissot and Dannecker have sought to image Christ. Dannecker, the German sculptor, occupied eight years upon a marble statue of Christ. When he had labored two years the work was apparently done. He called into his studio a little girl, and, directing her attention to the statue, asked her, "Who is that?" She replied, "A great man." The artist turned away rebuked. He had failed. He began anew, and after several years had passed, he again invited a child into his studio and repeated the inquiry, "Who is that?" This time he was not disappointed.

Samuel Places Saul Before the People as Their Chosen King

A book entitled The Czar tells of a Russian officer taken prisoner by the French. They got an iron and branded him on his hand with an "N." When he asked what it meant they said, "It means that you now belong, body and soul, to our Emperor, Napoleon." The soldier, seizing an axe, severed his hand from the wrist, and said, "Take what belongs to you; I am for the Czar and belong wholly to him." Whether fact or fiction, the story pictures the entire consecration, the whole-souled loyalty, that Jesus claimed for himself when he said, "If thy right hand offend thee, cut it off." If there be anything as dear as a right hand that bears Satan's mark and binds us to him instead of Christ, that we must fearlessly cut away.

The French king, Henry III, said to Palissy, the Huguenot potter, one day, that he should be compelled to give him up to his enemies unless he should change his religion. "You have often said to me, sire," was the un-measure, is presented in the story of poor woman who stood at the window of a king's conservatory looking at cluster of grapes, which she longed have for her sick child. She went home to her spinning-wheel, earned half a dollar, and offered it to the gardener for the grapes. He waved his hand and ordered her away. She returned to her cottage, snatched the blanket from her bed and pawned it and once more asked the gardener to sell her the grapes, offering him a dollar. He spoke furiously to her, and was turning her out, when the princess came in, heard the man's passion, saw the woman's tears and asked what was wrong. When the story was told she said, "My dear woman, you have made a mistake. My father is not a merchant, but a king; his business is not to sell but to give." So saying she plucked the cluster from the vine and dropped it into the woman's apron. The story may well have been invented to picture salvation as something we do not earn, but receive as a free gift from the divine King.

Crowns for All

And now we are ready to put into this cluster of kingly stories those that remind us that God offers kingship to every man, a measure of it in this world in self-control, in social influence, in the power of knowledge, in the ballot; but a perfect kingship in the life to come. A distinguished man had an extraordinary mark of honor sent him by his prince as he lay on his deathbed. "Alas!" said he, looking coldly upon it, "this is a fine thing here in this country; but I am going to a country where it will be of no service to me." A minister once entered an almshouse, of which an aged couple were the inmates. Beside a little round table, opposite the fire, sat the husband, and, as he was very deaf, his visitor shouted in his ear, "Well, Wisby, what are you doing?" "Waiting, sir." "For what?" "For the appearing of my Lord." "And what makes you wish for his appearing?" "Because I expect great things. He has promised a crown of righteousness to all that love his appearing."

God give us men! A time like this demands Strong minds, great hearts, true faith and ready hands:
Men whom the lust of lucre does not kill;
Men whom the spoils of office cannot buy;
Men who possess opinions and a will;
Men who have honor; men who will not lie;
Men who can stand before a demagogue
And damn his treacherous flatteries without winking;
Tall men, sun-crowned, who live above the fog
In public duty and in private thinking;
For while the rabble, with their thumb-worn creeds,
Their large profession and their little deeds,
Mingle in selfish strife, lo! Freedom weeps;
Wrong rules the land and waiting Justice sleeps!
J. G. HOLLAND.

Three hundred new voters, gathered in the historic Faneuil Hall, Boston, recently, took the freeman's oath of 1634: "I do solemnly bind myself that I will give my vote and suffrage as I shall judge in mine own conscience may best conduce to the public weal, so help me God."

A certain clergyman on a Sabbath before election, with one candidate for judge a member of his church, and the children of the other candidate members of his congregation, was so recklessly courageous as to pray that righteousness might win the election. The candidate who was present left the church in anger and never returned.

A Morning Prayer

Delivered at the opening session of the Methodist Conference.

FATHER of man, lift our eyes to a world vision. Thou hast redeemed all the earth. Thy gospel fits all races. Thou hast promised that every knee shall bow. Enlarge our plans. Widen our sympathies. Build up our faith. Invigorate our efforts. Enthuse us with optimism. Bring us to our largest possibilities.

We thank thee for the indwelling Spirit. We thank thee for light on life's path. We thank thee for joy even in duty's way. We thank thee for a God-assigned task. We thank thee for an important part in the world's work. We thank thee for strength that comes with the hour's need. Refresh us with a fresh vision of thy face. Make all the day cheerful by thy presence in our hearts. Amen.

ONE WOMAN'S WORK IN SYRIA

Gossip Beside the Well

Settlement Boys

In the Kindergarten

TO ENTER a Syrian town in which missionaries for fifty years have tried in vain to gain a footing, to disarm prejudice in a district of Maronites, Moslems, and Greeks, to found a settlement in the face of keenest opposition for the sake of teaching Christianity and the modern methods of living to people who are sadly in need of this enlightenment—these are the achievements of Miss Caroline M. Holmes, who, only three years ago, began her unique work in Jebail.

The story of Miss Holmes's work is an interesting one. With a missionary experience of eleven years in Tripoli, Syria, as a foundation, which gave her a knowledge of the people and the language, she felt herself called to the Lord's work in Jebail, where she began her educational endeavors independent of Mission Board or other support. With no one but a Syrian cook for company, she fearlessly entered the town, rented a house, in which there were no windows, and despite the fact that she was later informed that smallpox had raged there, she went ahead, sending to Beirut for vaccine with which she inoculated herself, and ignoring the feeling that she knew existed against all Protestant foreigners.

Miss Caroline M. Holmes

As soon as her little domicile was habitable she "sat," as the Syrians say, awaiting developments, and the result was that the people, overcoming their first prejudice by a spirit of hospitality and curiosity, began to call upon her. Gradually the numbers increased until they came by hundreds! From morning till night for a whole month, guests arrived, leaving scarcely time enough for meals.

Then Miss Holmes announced that she was about to open a school. So cordial had her visitors seemed that she imagined the road black with children flocking eagerly to the fountain of learning. But alas! no children's footfalls were heard and no merry faces pleaded for admission. At last, however, there was a timid knock, and opening the door, Miss Holmes saw the smiling eyes of a little girl. She was the daughter of the Syrian agent for an American company, who had braved the hierarchy of the Maronite Church and had sent his little girl to be instructed in English, sewing and other useful branches.

In three or four weeks eight other children made a cautious appearance, and at the end of the summer, when a public examination was held, behold these little tots marching bravely, with the measured tread of veritable soldiers, into the room, singing, "Brightly Gleams Our Banner." By this time, each little girl was the proud possessor of a dress made by her own hands under the direction of Miss Holmes, and when one of their number recited the story of the motions of the earth, a Syrian man in the audience was heard to remark, "To think of a girl knowing about such things!"

By Lillian M. Purdy

When the school re-opened the following fall, they were housed in better quarters. Boys were also received and the growth was so apparent that persecutions began from the Roman Catholic hierarchy. A bull of excommunication was issued to all who sent children to the school or traded with parents of these children—and many of the Maronites withdrew—to return later on.

At this juncture, a child was lost and suspicion fell upon the Settlement. The child had been last seen playing at the front gate of the Settlement and the impression was that she had been kidnapped. Without regard to the custom of respecting the rights of foreigners by never entering their portals unbidden, the infuriated people rushed wildly into the Settlement house. Miss Holmes, comprehending the situation, took no exception to this, but wisely opened doors at their request and gave them the freedom of the house. They searched in closets and cupboards, murmuring complaints and casting menacing glances, but they finally dispersed, only half satisfied, however; and when the child was found hours afterward, four miles from home, and it was known that she had simply strayed away, the disturbance subsided.

Just after this, the Maronite Patriarch ordered the expulsion of Miss Holmes from the town. But the people demurred. No one would take the initiative step. Then the owner of the house was ordered to expel his tenant, using force if necessary. But there was a written lease and he knew that the moment he attempted such measures he faced the United States Consul. He was then compelled to refuse a re-lease on the property.

In the meantime, the largest and handsomest residence in the town became vacant through the bankruptcy of the owner. For months Miss Holmes and her Syrian assistant, Miss Fareedey el Aakle, who was imbued with quite as much of the missionary spirit as was her leader, had prayed for a house, and when the brother of the owner finally called to request Miss Holmes to translate a letter, she requested the privilege of renting the house, which they could not grant owing to some technicality of the law.

By this time the lease had expired and already three weeks had passed beyond the stipulated time of the contract. It was then that Miss Holmes and the faithful Miss Fareedey held a season of earnest prayer. They asked God definitely for a house that day. And, in response to their earnest supplications, within half an hour a knock came at the door—and there was the agent for the receiver offering the beautiful home! By sunset, the keys were in Miss Holmes' hands, and in a few days the school was settled in its new home. Inspired by the spiritual significance of this direct answer to prayer and the new impetus given to the work by the fresh surroundings, the school seemed to take on added vigor and importance, and the Mohammedans began to attend.

In the autumn of 1906 a boarding department was opened for girls and small boys, and sixteen pupils responded, the number having since increased to twenty-five, with an attendance of one hundred students in all, including the day pupils. A night school was also established for men, Miss Holmes teaching them in all the practical subjects relating to business and trade. The teaching force of the school has grown from one to three, with a resident Syrian preacher. For there are two Sunday services, a Sunday School, the beginning of a church, and bi-weekly evening meetings, after which is a season of prayer, when all take part.

Aside from the spiritual phase of the work, it has been the aim of Miss Holmes from the start to emphasize the industrial side of the Settlement work, and the remarkable examples of the sewing she has exhibited in New York give evidence of the success achieved. Both boys and girls are in sewing classes. Persian rug making, Irish laces and fine embroidery, carried on in connection with the sewing, will before long make the Settlement self-supporting.

Surely the generous spirit with which the undertaking is now being met should lend encouragement and inspiration. For, when the children themselves are anxious to make sacrifices, there is little reason for complaint. Think of their denying themselves oranges and sweets at the table to purchase wool for the first Persian rug! Such, indeed, was done by the Circle of the King's Children. And the King's Daughters erected the first loom at their own expense, while the King's Sons have started a little confectionery store in the school, with the purpose of devoting the proceeds to the establishment of a men's reading room in the market place. Are not such endeavors the fulfillment of the Lord's work?

The Executive Committee of the Settlement, composed of Rev. Henry Harris Jessup, D.D., Chairman; Rev. Prof. George E. Post, M.D., LL.D., Rev. William S. Nelson, D.D., Rev. Prof. William H. Hall, Prof. Franklin T. Moore, M.D., Secretary; Edward G. Freyer, Esq., Treasurer, finally decided that the time had come to have the work financed, and they sent Miss Holmes to America for this purpose. Thus far, in her visit of only two months, she has received a baby grand piano, a Morris chair, and numerous other gifts. And she will be grateful for other contributions, which may be sent directly to her or to Mr. E. G. Freyer, American Press, Beirut, Syria.

AMONG THE WORKERS

—THE FOURTEENTH ARBITRATION CONFERENCE closed at Lake Mohonk recently. Three hundred leading men were present. The conference expresses especial pleasure in the treaty with Japan, deprecating "the unfounded talk of war with that country."

—EVANGELIST BIEDERWOLF has just closed a series of meetings at Creston, Ia. Every place of business in town, including the saloons and pool halls, voluntarily closed to enable the employees to attend. The last few days of the meetings were marked by wonderful power.

—EVANGELISTS H. WYSE, I. JONES, and Prof. Eugene A. Spear, who have been conducting successful revivals in Oregon and California during the past year, will open a campaign of Union Meetings in California in October. Their permanent address is McMinnville, Ore.

—SEPTEMBER WILL MARK the beginning of an attempt to evangelize the entire State of Kansas. Every town of 300 population in the State will be visited, and thirty evangelists will begin work in different parts of the State simultaneously. The work will begin September 6. The revivals in the villages will be limited to one week, while in most of the county seats three weeks will be spent. The meetings will be interdenominational. Thirty-four preachers have already been selected to take part in the work.

—A SERIES OF remarkable evangelistic efforts have been carried on in Central Kansas within the last six months under the leadership of Rev. French E. Oliver. Hundreds confessed Christ. Meetings were held at Cawker City, Glen Elder, Mankato, Russell, Burr Oak, Ellsworth and Solomon. At all of these places revivals are reported. Perhaps the most notable were those at Mankato, a small town of about 1,100 population. Here there were 791 who confessed Christ, among them some of the leading business and professional men. One business man, after his conversion, gave $10,000 for a Y.M.C.A. building, and another $10,000 was raised to maintain the organization. At Russell there were 752 confessions; at Burr Oak, 686; and at Ellsworth, 400.

TRAINING OUR YOUNG PATRIOTS

THE training of boys is not more difficult and not more important than the training of girls, but old-fashioned people have the idea that it ought to differ from theirs in some particulars. Great stress should be laid in the education of the sons on their preparation for good citizenship.

The boys of to-day will be the men of to-morrow. In this republic every boy born on the soil has an opportunity to rise, if not to the very top, yet somewhere near it, and it is not beyond the mark to say in addressing a school audience that the speaker sees before him possible future Presidents, Governors, members of Congress, Admirals and Commanders-in-chief. The men who carry forward our government are chosen by the popular will and are drawn from the rank and file. Every home in which boys are being reared has therefore a duty to the nation. You do not know to what eminence your boys may attain. Whether they live their lives in the glare of publicity or in the shadow of obscurity, it is equally their privilege to be virtuous and honorable, and to maintain standards of purity and uprightness. The son of a millionaire and the son of a hod-carrier will alike possess the privilege of the ballot and will go to the polls on an equal footing. In the training of boys, love of country, loyalty to the flag and devotion to the memory of those who have gone before should be fostered with the utmost vigilance.

Our annually recurring Independence Day is a mile-stone at which we should halt in thought and review the glories of our past. As compared with the old world we are still in the dew of our youth. Our history indeed reaches back across the sea to Magna Charta and the subsequent struggles for liberty in England and the Low Countries. In our literature we claim a children's right to Shakespeare and Milton. Nevertheless, we are as yet hardly out of leading strings when our age is compared with that of older lands. We are still experimenting in the matter of handling our immense immigration. We have some reason to be proud of our progress, much reason for gratitude when we think of our achievements, and some occasion for humility when we remember our mistakes. We are yet a young nation. We have a great many problems that puzzle us. The boys who are in the school-room now will be obliged to face issues of vast moment before many years have passed. In what shall we train them?

All CHRISTIAN HERALD readers will concur in the statement that the first need in education to-day for the boys of America is training in the fear of God. We have gradually and steadily eliminated from our schools references to our duty to the heavenly Father. Politics have been suffered to interfere with our acknowledgment of the Divine Being, and have at numerous points ruled devotional exercises completely out of the school day. But Christian men and women can not be ruled out of the teaching force, and so long as consistent Christian teachers are on the platform and at the desk, their example will do as much for the children and their lofty principles will influence them as truly as might a daily Bible reading.

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

We ought not to expect too much from our schools. Home training anticipates that of the teacher. Let the home training start the boys in reverence for God and his commandments and in obedience to law, to father and mother and the law of the community.

Next in the training of boys should come a nice sense of honor. There could not be so much graft

Let us train the future citizens of America in honesty for its own sake. It may be that some fathers and mothers are working so hard either to support their children while they are young or to leave them a provision for the future, that the time is slipping by unimproved in which they might be trained for usefulness. Would it not be just as well to worry less about the amount that may be saved, and to get on with less in the matter of daily luxury, and do more for the children's minds and hearts? This country of ours is not growing worse.

We have no dearth of great men; we are too close to some of our heroes to recognize their merits. But if we want to carry on our history with undimmed lustre we must not overlook the training of our boys in the twin loves, love of country and love of God. Let us sing our patriotic songs and read again the story of our struggle for independence, and thank God for our mountains and rivers, our forests and plains, our schools and our churches and the millions of our happy homes.

A Hint About Perfumes

"Your house always smells so sweet," said a girl to an elderly matron. "I wish I knew your secret."

"Soap and water, Betty!" was the terse reply.

This recipe for fragrance leaves little to be desired, although there is such a thing as stepping into a house that is absolutely clean in every nook and corner and finding it stuffy and unwholesome, notwithstanding its purity. Though cleanliness is next to godliness, fresh air and perfect ventilation bring it still nearer the divine standard. The housekeeper who tolerates dirt in any part of her establishment from cellar to attic, from kitchen to drawing-room, will not have a sweet-smelling, fragrant home. She who wishes her home to be without a flaw will open her window, let the thermometer have what vagaries it may, and thoroughly freshen the atmosphere of her house every day of her life. If she does this morning by morning her good man may smoke his pipe where he pleases, and no clinging odor of stale tobacco will lurk in carpets, draperies or clothing. Dried lavender leaves thickly sprinkled in the linen closet will impart a delightful scent to sheets, pillowslips and towels. A bottle of pure ammonia, in which a little oil of lavender has been poured, will freshen a sick chamber, and rose jars filled with sweet pot pourri will give a touch of refinement to the plainest living room. Perfumes in the toilet should be sparingly used. What one wants is not to be drenched with extract of violet or new-mown hay.

The merest suggestion, the faintest waft of an odor is sufficient to put the finishing touch of elegance to a costume.

Powdered orris in flat silk packets or folded in tissue paper or quilted into thin muslin and laid away in the drawers where handkerchiefs and underclothing are kept, will impart a delicate violet perfume to the contents of any bureau.

OUR COUNTRY'S FLAG

Fling out, fling out, with cheer and shout
To all the winds Our Country's Banner!
Be every bar and every star
Displayed in full and glorious manner!

Blow, zephyrs, blow! Keep the dear ensign flying!
Blow, zephyrs, sweetly mournful—sighing, sighing, sighing!

ABRAHAM COLES.

and corruption as there is to-day, if men were filled with the conviction that there is no disgrace like that of theft, whether from an individual or the community at large. There is an old story in the Book of Samuel of an uprising of the people against the sons of the old prophet who had ruled unjustly and defrauded their fellows. The story reads very much like a reform movement of the present day, and there is splendor in the figure of the kingly Samuel who dared to challenge the nation to assert that he had ever stooped to bribery and oppression.

A New Serial Written for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

By MRS. ELEANOR H. PORTER

Author of "Into Still Waters," etc.

THE diningroom at Belcourt looked particularly pleasant this July evening. A gentle breeze stirred the curtains at the open windows, and the setting sun peeped through the vines outside and glistened on the old family plate. Three generations of Spencers looked down from the walls on the two men and the woman sitting at the great mahogany table. The two men and the woman, however, were not looking at the sunlight, the vines, or the swaying curtains; they were looking at each other, and their eyes were troubled and questioning.

"You say she is coming next week?" asked the younger man, glancing at the letter in the other's hand.

"Yes. Tuesday afternoon."

"But, Frank, this is so—sudden," remonstrated the young fellow, laughing a little as he uttered the trite phrase. "How does it happen that I've heard so little of this young lady who is to be so unceremoniously dropped into our midst next Tuesday?"

Frank Spencer made an impatient gesture that showed how great was his perturbation.

"Come, come, Ned, don't be foolish," he protested. "You know very well that your brother's stepdaughter has been my ward for a dozen years."

"Yes, but that is all I know," rejoined the young man quietly. "I have never seen her, and scarcely ever heard of her, and yet you expect me to take as a matter of course this strange young woman who is none of our kith nor kin, and yet is to be one of us from henceforth for evermore!"

"The boy is right," interposed the low voice of the woman across the table. "Ned doesn't know anything about her. He was a mere child himself when it all happened, and he's been away from home most of the time since. For that matter, we don't know much about her ourselves."

"We certainly don't," sighed Frank Spencer; then he raised his head and squared his shoulders. "See here, good people, this will never do in the world," he asserted with sudden authority. "I have offered the hospitality of this house to a homeless orphan girl, and she has accepted it. There is nothing for us to do but try to make her happy. After all, we needn't worry—it may turn out that she will make us happy."

"But what is she? How does she look?" catechized Ned.

His brother shook his head.

"I don't know," he replied simply.

"You don't know! But surely you have seen her!"

"Yes, oh, yes, I've seen her once or twice, but Margaret Kendall is not a girl whom to see is to know; besides, the circumstances were such that—well, I might as well tell the story from the beginning, particularly as you know so little of it yourself."

Frank paused and looked at the letter in his hand. After a minute he laid it gently down. When he spoke his voice was not quite steady.

"Our brother Harry was a physician, as you know, Ned. You were twelve years old when he married a widow by the name of Kendall, who lived in Houghtonsville, where he had been practising. As it chanced, none of us went to the wedding. You were taken suddenly ill, and neither Della nor myself would leave you, and father was in Bermuda that winter for his health. Mrs. Kendall had a daughter, Margaret, about ten years old, who was at school somewhere in the Berkshires. It was to that school that I went when the terrible news came that Harry and his new wife had lost their ies were in vain. She would not listen to me, or even see me. She held her hands before her face and screamed if I so much as came into the room. She was nothing but a child, of course, and not even a normal one at that, for she had had a very strange life. At five she was lost in New York City, and for four years she lived on the streets and in the sweat-shops, enduring al-lives in that awful railroad accident. That was the first time that I saw Margaret.

"The poor child was, of course, heart-broken and inconsolable; but her grief took a peculiar turn. The mere sight of me drove her almost into hysterics. She would have nothing whatever to do with me, nor with any of her stepfather's people. She reasoned that if her mother had not married, there would have been no wedding journey; and if there had been no wedding journey there would have been no accident, and her mother would then have been alive and well.

"Arguments, pleadings and entreat-most unbelievable poverty and hardships."

"Well, well!" exclaimed Ned under his breath.

"It was only seven or eight months before the wedding that she was found," went on Frank, "and of course the influence of the wild life she had led was still with her more or less, and made her not easily subject to control. There was nothing for me to do but to leave the poor little thing where she was, particularly as there seemed to be no other place for her. She would not come with me, and she had no people of her own to whom she could turn for love and sympathy.

"As you know, poor Harry was conscious for some hours after the accident, long enough to make his will and dictate the letter to me, leaving Margaret to my care—boy though I was. I was only twenty, you see; but really, there was no one else to whom he could leave her. That was a good many years ago. Margaret must be quite a young lady now."

"And you've not seen her since?" There was keen reproach in Ned's voice.

Frank smiled.

"Yes, I've seen her twice," he replied. "And of course I've written to her many times, and have always kept in touch with those she was with. She stayed at the Berkshire school five years; then—with some fear and trembling, I own—I went to see her. I found a grave-eyed little miss who answered my questions with studied politeness, and who agreed without comment to the proposition that I place her in a school where she might remain until she was ready for college—should she elect to go to college."

"But her vacations—did she never come here then?" questioned Ned.

"No. At first I did not ask her, of course. It was out of the question, considering how she was feeling. Some one of her teachers always looked out for her. They all pitied her, and naturally did everything they could for her, as did her mates at school. Later, when I did dare to ask her to come here, she always refused. She wrote me stiff little notes in which she informed me that she was to spend the holidays with some Blanche or Dorothy or Mabel of her acquaintance.

"She was nineteen when I saw her again. I found now a charming, graceful girl, with peculiarly haunting blue eyes, and heavy coils of bronze-gold hair that kinked and curled about her little pink ears in a most distracting fashion. Even now, though, she would not come to my home. She was going abroad with friends. The party included an irreproachable chaperon, so of course I had nothing to say; while as for money—she had all of her mother's not inconsiderable fortune, besides everything that had been her stepfather's; so of course there was no question on that score.

"In the fall she entered college, and there she has been ever since, spending her vacations as usual with friends, generally traveling. When she came of age she specially requested me to make no change in her affairs, but to regard her as my ward for the present, just as she had been. So I still call myself her guardian. This June was her graduation. I had forgotten the fact until I received a little engraved invitation a week or two ago. I thought of running down for it, but I couldn't get away very well, and—well, I didn't go, that's all. But I did write and ask her to make this house her home, and here is her reply. She thanks me, and will come next Tuesday. There! now you have it. You know all that I do." And Frank Spencer leaned back in his chair with a long sigh.

"But I don't know yet what she's like," objected Ned.

"Neither do I."

"Oh, but you've seen her."

VOLUNTEER BABY-MINDERS

THERE was an imperative ring of the telephone bell at Dr. MacArthur's fashionable church on West Fifty-seventh Street, New York. One of the numerous women workers answered the ring.

"Send a minder to the top floor of No. 230 West 'Steenth Street," was the mystifying message received over the 'phone.

The woman worker turned to one of the pleasant-faced assistants present and repeated the address.

"Go with her if you wish to know what a 'minder' is," she added to the writer, who cheerfully obeyed, for that was the reason he was there.

The minder climbed an interminable flight of steps to the highest story of a tenement house overflowing with juvenile encumbrances and waited for the door of one of the rooms to be opened in response to her knock. The sound of an infant protesting against being projected into this vale of tears without its own previously obtained consent could be plainly heard. As the door opened the muffled infantile protest became a perfect gust of expostulatory vocal vehemence.

The minder stepped smilingly into the room, placed her hand-bag and hat on the bed and picked up the baby.

"I had to leave him," said the tired-looking mother, "or I could never have got the work done in time to get to church."

"Now never mind," said the minder; "just you get yourself ready."

That in fact was what the minder had come for. She was one of a number of volunteer philanthropists belonging to Dr. MacArthur's fashionable congregation who have volunteered to go to the homes of poor people who are prevented from attending church because of the presence of a fretful baby. The minders take charge of the babies in the homes and care for them until the mother comes home from church. The idea origiwith a fretful child as their only solace. There must be some mysterious satisfaction in the work, however.

Deserving women who would attend church but for the impossibility of leaving the baby are sought out by the corps of church workers. The scouts who search out the women for whom "minders" are needed do their work thoroughly. No babies are minded simply to afford the mother a chance

Provision is also made for children who are not infants exactly, but are still too small to attend a church service for adults without being restless nuisances to every one in their vicinity. "Minders" are stationed in the large ante-rooms of the church to receive and look after the children who are brought to the services by mothers who cannot well leave them at home alone. These children are entertained fittingly by the "minder" while the mothers are enjoying the services. The "minder" gathers them around a table and reads to them, keeping the youngsters in a state of wide-eyed interest until the mother comes in to claim them.

The idea of organizing a corps of "minders" came to Dr. MacArthur as the result of a canvass of the non-church-going women of the neighborhood. In so many cases were the baby and young children given as an excuse by the stay-at-home that he was moved to devote a great deal of thought to the matter. He rather hesitatingly broached his plan for establishing a corps of "minders" at a meeting of the women of the church and was agreeably surprised to find the plan enthusiastically endorsed and the number of volunteers for the work most satisfactorily large. He considers he has solved the problem of the non-church-going woman, but that of the non-church-going man still confronts him. No baby keeps the man of the family from church, but certainly something does, and the puzzle is to find the cause and the remedy.

Entertaining the Children in the Church Parlor While the Mothers Are at the Services

nated with Dr. MacArthur himself.

The service of baby-minding calls for self-sacrifice of the highest order. Not only are the "minders" deprived of the pleasure of attending church, but they voluntarily imprison themselves for hours in a close apartment to gossip with neighbors or visit a crony on the block. Only those infants whose maternal parents are devoutly desirous of breathing the atmosphere of the religious edifice on West Fifty-seventh Street are accorded the privilege of a volunteer nurse.

have become history, either personal or national. Fourth of July I always enjoyed according to a boy's idea of a fitting celebration. But there is one holiday of our nation's birthday that I set quite apart from the rest. On that day, I made a resolution never to gamble in any form, and I have faithfully kept that vow. The practical application of a lesson received upon that occasion was effective and thoroughly cured me of the speculative habit. Most boys have models of friendships, chosen as a rule from some good citizen, who has shown a decided preference for their youthful personalities; and my good friend was an intimate friend of my parents and a frequent visitor of our family.

It seems to me now, as I look backward, that I was always well behaved when he was around, for I know that he gave me a jack-knife as a reward of good conduct, and I was so fond and proud of that present, that I thought nothing in this world could tempt me to part with it; yet I did.

Everything was so glorious on that day of days, that I felt persuaded nothing ventured would be a failure. I tried my luck on a game of chance, the reward to be a bunch of fire-crackers and the forfeit to be my all-prized knife. I lost—and the pleasure of the day was over for me. I went home and told of my loss, which was received by the home circle without comment. No punishment was meted out to me, and still I knew that I had deserved it.

I was very uncomfortable, and went to bed with a heavy heart. I tossed about upon my bed with a bad conscience. I surely was entitled to chastisement, yet I was spared. That fact possessed me, and from that time on I had a perfect disgust for gambling. I vowed never to gamble again—and I never did.

Never Had a Fourth in Boyhood

BY HON. JOSEPH W. FOLK, Governor of Missouri

THE development of the virtue of love of country is symbolized each natal day anniversary, and I believe that patriotism, which is the spirit of our institutions, is fostered by such observance. I only regret that my boyhood was conspicuous by a lack of these demonstrations on the Fourth. We lived near Brownsville, Tennessee, and I don't to this day know why we never celebrated on this occasion; but I do remember our Christmas festivities, which we celebrated then, as we honor the Fourth at the present time, by fire-works and fire-crackers.

A Fourth in Custer's Camp

BY BRIGADIER-GENERAL HUGHES

THE Fourth of July, 1876, was really the most forlorn one I ever spent. To every loyal American boy one day stands out pre-eminently in his list of holidays—a day that lifts itself above the dead level of common days into an everlasting eminence.

I had outgrown my boyhood, but the events of this day still abide with me. We were encamped on the banks of the Yellowstone River, after Custer's charge, and as it was thought impracticable to freight our supplies, we made shift with pack animals. From officer to man, we were in fearful need of clothes; for we had been in the field all summer and sat down and waited for orders to move. The whole scheme was that the war should end; but Custer got in a hurry for battle, and at last came news of the charge on June 25.

After we had cared for the wounded, we all began to think of our forlorn appearance, and I remembered the little comfort-bag my wife had presented me, which I thought useless at the time of my entering this particular campaign.

It was July Fourth. I was Lieutenant-Colonel at the time and had married only one week before leaving home, and so, upon this auspicious holiday, I concluded to muster the comfort-bag into service.

The only material I could find for my trousers was the shelter tent. The canvas was too tough for the small pair of scissors that fitted so snugly into the comfort-bag; but by noon I had managed to work up a perspiration over my first attempt at tailoring that can only be equaled by a Turkish bath. My, but I was persistent! I worked at those pantaloons all day long, and when night came I was really ill with a fever. I never before knew what an instrument of torture a small cambric needle could be. My face was scratched with taking long threads jerkily through my nervous fingers, my fingers bleeding and my canvas trousers polka-dotted with gore.

But if the tailoring of them was torture, I do not know how to describe the manner of wearing them. Just where they should have been large, I found them too small, and I found that I could not sit down in them comfortably unless I wore them wrong side before. I was a sight to behold and looked the part of wretchedness, whether sitting, walking or standing. When General Otis came into camp the next day, he called me "Colonel Breeches," and I was made the laughing-stock of the company. That is one of my most persistent memories of the Fourth of July.

A Fourth Passed Under Difficulties

BY CLAUDE M. SWANSON, Governor of Virginia

FOURTH of July in my boyhood was always an agreeable holiday, but I quite vividly recall a Fourth in recent years that was not enjoyable.

I had been making a number of political speeches up in the mountains of Virginia, and there was one man of the mountains who had wonderful power to influence the voters of those districts. It is needless to say that it became my desire to conciliate this man.

Just as I was about convinced that I had won him over to my way of thinking, he made a most astounding proposal to me. He had complimented my speech, and he put the stamp of approval upon this conviction by saying: "Now, look here, Squire; your speech was so fine that I want my wife and daughter to hear it."

His home was nearly twenty miles away, and I could not refuse him without injury to my campaign prospects, so we set out upon the long ride. We reached his cabin long after dark, and I don't believe any patriotic speech was ever delivered with less vim or received with so little enthusiasm as that speech of mine, given in the flickering light of a candle with an audience of three. The wife and daughter watched me open-mouthed, and when I had finished, greeted me in silence. They had not understood a single word or point I had meant to make, but I had pleased the head of the family with my oratorical outburst, and felt that my Fourth had not been spent in vain.

"Yes; and how? Do you suppose that those two or three meetings were very illuminating? No. I've been told this, however," he added. "It seems that immediately after her return to her mother's home she had the most absurd, quixotic notions about sharing all she had with every ragamuffin in New York. She even carried her distress over their condition to such an extent that her mother feared for her reason. All her teachers, therefore, were instructed to keep from her all further knowledge of poverty and trouble; and particularly to instil into her mind the fact that there was really in the world a great deal of pleasure and happiness."

Over across the table Mrs. Merideth shivered a little.

"Dear me!" she sighed. "I do hope the child is well over those notions. I shouldn't want her to mix up here with the mill people. I never did quite like those settlement women, anyway, and only think what might happen with one in one's own family!"

"I don't think I should worry," laughed Frank. "I haven't seen much of the young lady, but I think I have seen enough for that. I fancy the teachers succeeded in their mission. As near as I can judge, Miss Margaret Kendall does not resemble your dreaded 'settlement worker' in the least. However, we'll wait and see."

CHAPTER XIII

THERE was something of the precision of clockwork in matters and things at Belcourt. A large corps of well-trained servants in charge of an excellent housekeeper left Mrs. Merideth free to go, and come, and entertain as she liked. For fifteen years now she had been mistress of Belcourt, ever since her mother had died, in fact. Widowed herself at twenty-two, after a year of married life, and the only daughter in a family of four children, she had been like a second mother to her two younger brothers. Harry, the eldest brother, had early left the home roof to study medicine. Frank, barely twenty when his brother Harry lost his life, had even then pleased his father by electing the mills as his life work. And now, five years after that father's death, Ned was sharing his brother Frank's care and responsibility in keeping the great wheels turning and the great chimneys smoking down in the town below.

Della Merideth was essentially a woman who liked—and who usually obtained—the strawberries and cream of life. Always accustomed to luxury, she demanded as a matter of course rich clothing and dainty food. That there were people in the world whose clothing was coarse, and whose food was scanty, she well knew; and knowing this, she was careful that her donations to the Home Missionary Society and the Woman's Guild were prompt and liberal. Beyond this her duty did not extend, she was sure. As for any personal interest in the recipients of her alms, she had none whatever; and would, indeed, have deemed it both unnecessary and unladylike that she should have had such interest. Her eyes were always on the hills and meadows on the west side of the house, and even her way to and from Belcourt was carefully planned so that she might avoid, so far as was possible, the narrow, ill-smelling streets of the town on the other side of the hill.

Frank Spencer was a hard-headed, far-seeing man of business—inside the office of Spencer & Spencer; outside, he was a delightful gentleman—a little grave, perhaps, for his thirty-three years, but none the less a favorite, particularly with anxious mothers having marriageable, but rather light-headed, daughters on their hands. His eyes were brown, his nose was straight and long, and his mouth firm and clean-cut. His whole appearance was that of a man sure of himself—and of others. To Frank Spencer the vast interests of Spencer & Spencer as represented by the huge mills that lined the river bank were merely one big machine; and the hundreds of men, women and children that dragged their weary way in and out the great doors were but so many cogs in the wheels. That the cogs had hearts that ached, and heads that throbbed, did not occur to him. He was interested only in the smooth and silent running of the wheels themselves.

Ned was the baby of the house. In spite of his length of limb and breadth of shoulder he was still looked upon by his brother and sister as little more than a boy. School, college and a year of travel had trained his brain, toughened his muscles and browned his skin, and left him full of enthusiasm for his chosen work, which just now meant helping to push Spencer & Spencer to the top notch of power and prosperity.

For five years the two brothers and the widowed sister in the great house that crowned Prospect Hill had been by themselves save for the servants and the occasional guests—and the Spencers were a clannish family, so people said. However that might have been, there certainly was not one of the three that was not conscious of a vague fear and a well-defined regret, whenever there came the thought of this strange young woman who was so soon to enter their lives.

To be a Spencer was to be hospitable, however, and the preparations for the expected guest were prompt and generous. By Tuesday the entire house, even to its inmates, was ready with a cordial welcome for the orphan girl.

In his big touring car Frank Spencer went to the station to meet his ward. With him was Mrs. Merideth, and her eyes, fully as anxiously as his, swept the crowd of passengers alighting from the long train. Almost simultaneously they saw the tall young woman in gray, and Mrs. Merideth sighed with relief as Frank gave a quick exclamation and hurried forward.

"At least she looks like a lady," Mrs. Merideth murmured, as she followed her brother.

"You are Margaret Kendall, I am sure," Frank was saying; and Mrs. Merideth saw the glad light leap to the girl's eyes as she gave him her hand.

"And you are Mr. Spencer, my guardian—Uncle Frank. Am I still to call you 'Uncle Frank?'" Mrs. Merideth heard a clear voice say. The next moment she found herself looking into what she instantly thought were the most wonderful eyes she had ever seen.

"And I am Mrs. Merideth, my dear—'Aunt Della' I hope," she said gently, before her brother could speak.

"Thank you; and it will be 'Aunt Della,' I'm sure," smiled the girl; and again Mrs. Merideth marveled at the curious charm of the eyes that met her own.

A great many people brighten their polished floors by wiping them, once or twice a month, with a cloth dipped in milk.

That is not a bad plan; but it is open to one serious objection. Milk brightens the floors but it does not clean them.

The way to clean and at the same time, to brighten them, is to use Ivory Soap and tepid water. Apply with a soft cloth. Don't use much water. Wipe dry with another soft cloth (dry).

who can not bear to have this man Christ rule over them.

In the face of this great rule of the Kingdom of God, what part are we going to take in the great play of life? I am more and more convinced the longer I live of this truth: that if there is any life which God despises, if he despises any life, it must be that life which stands outside of the great scene of conflict between right and wrong, and looks in on it and criticises. The man who is fighting within, no matter how feeble his blows or how often he stumbles, is a towering hero by the side of the man who thinks himself big, and who stands outside looking in, but doing nothing. The Kingdom of God needs you, and you, and you. It needs you now. You have no right to separate yourself from the conflict of humanity. It is a cowardly thing for one to try and shun his part because it is hard, or because there is trouble, or because there is conflict. It is what we are here for, to prove ourselves worthy of entrance into the Kingdom which lies on the other side of the flesh. Come then and choose to-day your part. Put on the full armor of God. Accept the terms of service which Christ has laid down. They are the only terms possible. We can not go into the Kingdom at all unless we go like little children, and the rule of Christ is sweet. There is no hardship connected with it which the spirit can not gladly bear, and there is a joy in applying the rule of the Kingdom to life, and an exhilaration in confronting one's spirit with the great things of the universe, which can not be compared with any joy known to men. "Whatsoever ye do in word or deed, do all in the name of the Lord Jesus, giving thanks to God the Father through him."

Israel Asks a King

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

EVERYTHING which is of man has a tendency to deteriorate. Samuel was indeed a reformer, and God did blessed work through him. Idols were put away, the worship of God was purified, the Philistines overthrown, the land freed from invaders and brought to rest, and order and judgment instituted. Oh, if it could only last! It is a disheartening thing to see how the greatest work of reformation or revival leaves visibly permanent results only among the few; after a few months, or a year or two, the results are often only visible to the eye which traces the hand of God in all things. Outward things may be changed, but the evil heart of unbelief which entered man's nature in Eden, with its tendency to depart from the living God (Heb. 3: 12), is always reappearing, even after the most glorious work of God. Since sin entered into our nature, there has been in man no element of permanence; with sin, death and decay came in, and this principle of deterioration is only the working out of death, the witness of the curse which came with the fall. But eternal life cannot deteriorate. In the life of Christ in us is no element of decay: Christ changes not, and thus as we abide in him and he in us, and in no other way, we are kept steadfast.

Israel was in real trouble; the scandal of perverted judgment and the reputation of Samuel's sons for financial greed was such that the elders of Israel appointed a general council, where they unitedly represented to Samuel these great and bitter grievances. This was all right, if it had stopped here, and if they had then urged the old prophet to inquire of the Lord his will for his own land and people, it had been well. But the people had already fixed upon a remedy, and had set their hearts upon it. Thus they already began to ignore God as the immediate Ruler over them. It is this making of plans independently of God which so often brings on estrangement between him and his people. The people said to Samuel, "Behold, thou art old, and thy sons walk not in thy ways; now make us a king to judge us like all the nations."

"The thing displeased Samuel." He had taken a wrong step, it is true, in making his sons judges, but the people had erred too. How often, where a leader makes a slip, those who are dependent upon, or influenced by him, are encouraged to a much greater departure from God! Let a Christian mother be irritable, oh, how trying the children will be that day! Let her have the smallest feeling of vexation with a servant, it will seem as though the servants that day were trying as she has never known them before. Departure from God is infectious, it influences all around us. But Samuel, in his displeasure, went to God and prayed. It was an old habit of the prophet to take refuge in his God. And the answer came at once.

"The Lord said unto Samuel, Harken unto the voice of the people in all that they say unto thee: for they have not rejected thee, but they have rejected me, that I should not reign over them."

Would God allow the rebellious people to have their way? Would this not encourage them in insubordination? God never forces himself upon us. He will save every sinner who will let him, will be a true Father to each one who will let him; he will be a true Shepherd to all who will let him—lead them into green pastures and by the still waters; he will rule every life which is yielded up to him; but he never forces his salvation or his care, his guidance or his immediate government upon unwilling hearts. And so he lets his unwilling children have their way, that they may taste the fruits of it (Isa. 3: 10).

He Let Go

SOME years ago we were conducting evangelistic services in a Minnesota town. We discovered that a certain young man was exceedingly influential with the young people of the place. We immediately focused our prayers and personal efforts upon him, in considerable measure, feeling assured that if he were captured for Christ others would surrender with him. His uncle, a devout Christian man, informed us that stubbornness was a characteristic of his family. Dan proved to be no exception to this rule. He loved sin, and reproofs angered him so much that we feared that he would leave town until the meetings closed. However, he remained until the last evening, when I went to him, and said: "Dan, won't you come to Christ to-night? You are keeping others from coming." The thought of keeping others away startled him. Gripping my hand and releasing it alternately he struggled to his feet, his face transformed. It had been a hand-to-hand struggle between self and selfishness; between Satan and the Saviour. The citadel of the will had been stormed and Dan had crowned Jesus Lord and King. He had let go and the crowd followed.

The Joy of True Service*

IT HAS been rightly said that no Christian ever lives up to his spiritual advantages, or realizes the full measure of blessing, until he begins to do actual personal service for Christ. Jesus came into this world to do his Father's will and it was his delight. To follow his example should be our dearest task.

"Next to the consolations of divine grace," wrote Porteous, "the joy of service is the most sovereign balm to the miseries of life, both in him who is the object of it and him who exercises it." "What is the secret of your happiness?" asked a wealthy merchant of a friend whose face was an index of his generous nature. "It is simply that I try not to permit a day to pass without doing something for somebody," was the reply.

The service we render should be faithful and undivided; there should be in it no self-glorification, lest it lose its value. It should not hesitate at self-sacrifice, nor at indignity. Diderot tells of a good man named Pelletier, who asked M. Aubertot, a rich man, to contribute for a very worthy object. He followed the merchant into his warehouse and the latter turned and struck him a blow in the face. "Well—that for me!" said Pelletier, with a bright smile, "but the poor! What for the poor?" The merchant was astounded and suddenly became ashamed of his action. He burst into tears, begged Pelletier's pardon and promised to give liberally. He became Pelletier's warmest friend and patron thereafter. Indignity, borne with fortitude, won a signal triumph.

There must be no self-seeking in the service we render. God will bless abundantly the labors that are rendered without a thought of personal honor or reward. The late Dr. Barnardo of London, George Muller of Bristol, and Dr. Cullis of Boston, were shining examples of consecrated, zealous service, given with a single eye to God's glory and the good of humanity. In all three cases, the seed that was planted in their first act of service took root and grew mightily, until the whole world knew them for true followers of Christ and trusted and helped them.

Serving Christ brings joy to soul and body. "What brought you into the church and into fellowship with Christ?" a man was asked, and he quickly replied: "It was the happy life of my brother, who is a believer."

We manifest our love for Christ by the manner in which we serve him. Missionary and pastoral experience is full of incidents of this character. In an island of the Eastern seas, a crowd gathered to hear the story of redeeming love, and this was the call that brought them: "A man has come to tell us about Jesus, and the man is kind."

"Tell mother I never regretted coming out here," wrote a bright young woman missionary who lay dying of fever in Africa. "Tell sister Martha to train her children for missionary service. Tell the church to send some one to take my place."

Loving service is a shield and defense. In the Philippines, a band of robbers were in hiding to waylay the paymaster, who was known to pass along that lonely road. But on this night the surgeon, who was devoting his life to the Filipinos, rode with the paymaster, and as the two approached the leader of the robber band said: "Don't shoot, men; the doctor is along."

You may never be more than a humble, undistinguished home worker within a narrow circle of your acquaintance; but if you serve Him with zeal and heart consecration, your joy will be as genuine and your blessings as real as though you had the largest opportunities. Our Father loves all his helpers.

Character and Courtesy*

"THE truly gentle doeth gentle deeds," wrote the good old poet, Geoffrey Chaucer. Courteous in speech and manner, considerate of others, obedient to authority, magnanimous to enemies, true to his word, sympathetic to the suffering, clean in conduct and conscience and faithful to his religion—these are some of the attributes which, by common consent, are conceded as distinguishing the Christian gentleman. And this applies equally to either sex. The true man or woman possesses qualities that go deeper than the mere superficial polish which the world looks for in a gentleman or a lady. In noble aims, in worthy desires, and in generous judgment of others; in being dignified yet without pride, firm yet not oppressive or overbearing; even-tempered, instead of hasty and arrogant, they clearly draw the line between true and false gentleness.

No one's condition in life need prevent the exercise of these qualities that mark true nobility of character. They are equally applicable to king and peasant, to president and citizen.

Henry IV., of France, was standing one day with some of his courtiers, at the entrance of a village, when a poor man, passing by, bowed down to the very ground; and the King, with great condescension, returned his salutation in the same manner; at which one of his attendants ventured to express his surprise, when the monarch replied to him: "Would you have your King exceeded in politeness by one of the lowest of his subjects?"

It was a maxim of a celebrated minister, "that if a child but lisped to give you pleasure, you ought to be pleased." When occasionally preaching in the villages, he used to be delighted in visiting the poor, and, when solicited, would regale himself with their brown bread and black tea; but took care, at the same time, that they should lose nothing by their attention. "When a poor person shows anxiety to administer to your comfort," he would say, "do not interrupt him. Why deprive him of the pleasure of expressing his friendship?"

"If a civil word or two will render a man happy," said a royal philosopher, "he must be wretched indeed who will not give them to him." Were superiors to keep this in view, how much happier would the world be than it now is? We may say of this disposition, "that it is like lighting another man's candle by one's own, which loses none of its light by what the other gains."

When a high official returned the salute of a negro who had bowed to him, he was reminded that he had done what was very unfashionable. "Perhaps so," said the official, "but I would not be outdone in good manners by a negro."

Whoever neglects the cultivation of those graces that mark the true lady or gentleman, misses much of the real pleasure of living. The best manners are the simplest. "God hangs the greatest weight on the smallest wires," says an ancient maxim, and the lowliest should aspire to be useful in this service of courtesy. "Good manners," wrote Whately, "are a part of good morals." William Winter, probably our ablest living American critic, calls manners "the final and perfect flower of noble character." People avoid the boor, the tattler, the loud-mouthed, coarse, selfish, vulgar person. "Manners," says Emerson, "are the happy ways of doing things, each one a stroke of genius or of love." There are few factors that contribute more largely to worldly success than the social graces, and the Christian owes it to his religion not to be outdone in the cultivation of those qualities of head, heart, voice and hand that would make him a power for good among his fellows and reflect lustre on the religion he professes.

Questions and Answers

G. C., The Dalles, Ore. What position do the Turks occupy when they pray five times a day?

They kneel facing toward Mecca.

E. P., Portland, Ore. 1. Could a balloon rise so high as to lose gravitation from the earth? 2. How do the American battleships rank with the foreign?

1. No; for at the distance of a few miles from earth the atmosphere is so thin that the balloon would find no support, and its occupants would die from lack of air. The "drawing" influence of gravitation extends for unmeasured distance into space. 2. We rank second in the number of battleships, coming next to Great Britain.

G. W. G., Stuart, Va. 1. Were there any denominations in Christ's time as we have to-day? 2. Why was John the Baptist so called? 3. Was the John mentioned in Acts 12: 12-25 related to John the Baptist?

1. There were no denominations then. Jesus desired them to be brethren and to love one another. He made that a test of their fidelity. Denominations came afterward. They will all vanish when he comes again and all will be one flock with one Shepherd. 2. He was so called because of his baptizing his converts in Jordan. The method of his baptism probably had nothing to do with it. 3. No.

Jessie M., Chillicothe, Mo. Can you give an estimate of the annual expenditure for Fourth of July fireworks, and of the average yearly total of accidents in the same connection?

The outlay for fireworks on July 4 is in the neighborhood of $20,000,000, one quarter of which is spent in New York City. Last year the casualties were 300 deaths from lockjaw, while 400 lost one eye and over 100 lost both eyes. Minor casualties are not recorded. The victims were principally children.

H. F. H., Stark, Kan. If a man in boyhood is guilty of great follies and even crimes, can such a one become a true Christian? Even if he reforms, the scars of sin still mark his memory and his soul.

Yes. Christ saves even to the uttermost, and there is no limit to divine mercy. He saved the thief on the cross, and he has saved criminals whose guilt put them beyond human sympathy. He saved Paul, who stood by consenting while Stephen was stoned to death, and he will save all who come to him. His words are: "Let whosoever will, come. . . . Him that cometh unto me I will in no wise cast out."

Ida McC., Washington, Pa. 1. Who was Jephthah? 2. What is known of Jephthah's daughter?

1. Jephthah was one of the judges and military leaders of Israel. 2. Nothing is known of her fate further than is related in Scripture. Some commentators have surmised that she was not sacrificed but withdrew from the world permanently, to some private retreat. But all beyond the Bible statement is purely conjectural. Josephus, the great Jewish historian, says "such an oblation was neither conformable to the law nor acceptable to God."

S. K. S., London. I have just read a passage from Acts, 28th chapter. It was the 12th and 13th verses: "And landing at Syracuse, we tarried there three days. And from thence we fetched a compass and came to Messina. . . . And you please explain for me why it was necessary for St. Paul and the mariners to get a compass when the journey was so direct?

In the original Greek the word which has been translated "fetched a compass" is really more accurately rendered "went round," or took a roundabout, tacking course from Syracuse to Rhegium. When opposite the latter place but out to seaward, they probably had to tack southwesterly and then due north to the little port, which is opposite Messina, in the narrow strait that divides Sicily from the Italian mainland.

H. T., Forest Junction, Wis. Please explain Heb. 11: 39-40. In verse 39, what is meant by "report" and what is the "promise" referred to and why did they not receive it? In verse 40, what are the "better things" God provided? To whom does "they" refer, and what is meant by the last sentence, "that they without us should not be made perfect?"

It means that they had witness borne to them through their faith. The promise referred to is the consummation of salvation promised at Christ's coming again. The American R. V. makes the sense more apparent, in this in man but as the gift of God (see John, 4: 10; Matt. 25: 46; Mar. 10: 30; John, 3: 15, and 17: 2; Acts, 13: 48; Rom. 6: 23). We don't know the book referred to in your last question.

L. W. L., Wyoming, Del., in the course of a strong letter to this journal against vivisection, writes:

It was never God's plan that the health of mankind should be maintained in that way. It may be interesting to your readers to know of some of the eminent people who denounce vivisection. They are: Queen Victoria, Lord Tennyson, Sir Lawson Tait, Dr. Foreau de Courmelles, Sir Benj. Ward Richardson, M.D., Emma Eames, Mark Twain, Ella Wheeler Wilcox, Alexander Wilder, M.D., Cardinal Gibbons, Julian Hawthorne, Thos. Nelson Page, Dr. J. D. Buck, F.T.S., Rev. Dr. Huntington, Dr. Parkhurst, Sir Charles Bell, M.D., Henry Bergh, Bishop Scarborough, Frances E. Willard, David H. Cochran, Elizabeth Stuart Phelps, and scores of others in all walks of life.

K. S. B., New York, and Mrs. C. E. H., Franklin, Pa. Why is the Apostle's Creed so called, and where did it originate?

It was an early summary of the

I. McK., Des Moines, Ia. What are the great wheat producing countries?

The last report giving the comparative figures between the United States and other countries was issued by the Department of Agriculture in 1906. The United States came first with 735,261,000 bushels, Russia in Europe next with 450,000,000 bushels, France third and British India fourth.

Reader, Pittsfield, Mass. What will the Baltimore Exposition commemorate?

It will be held in 1914, one hundred years after the climax of the War of 1812 and the birth of the song "The Star Spangled Banner."

O. C. H., Deer Run, W. Va. How many is a legion, mentioned in Matt. 26: 53?

The Roman legion consisted of 3,000 footmen and 300 horsemen, so when a legion was spoken of it meant a large body. As now used loosely it does not indicate an exact number.

E. H., Batavia, N. Y. What is the meaning of the term primogeniture?

It means the first born. Certain privileges were enjoyed by the eldest son in patriarchal times. In England at the present time, by right of primogeniture the eldest son inherits practically all of the paternal estate.

A. J. W., Kirkland, Ill. 1. Does the Bible forbid the eating of meat on Friday? 2. Is it a Christian's duty to abstain from pleasures on Friday? 3. What is meant by "the third day He shall rise again"?

1 and 2. No. 3. The Jews reckoned their day from sunset to sunset. The crucifixion took place on Friday, on the evening of which, at sunset, the Jewish Sabbath begins. Through part of Friday, through all of the Jewish Sabbath (our Saturday) and through part of the next day (our Sunday) the body of Jesus lay in the grave. On Sunday morning (being the third day since Friday) the resurrection took place.

2,000 Sunday School Workers on the Steps of New York's State Capitol

On Wednesday, June 10th, the Sunday School workers of New York State, who were holding a Convention in Albany, held a mass meeting on the Capitol steps. Over 2,000 delegates took part.

translation: "And these all, having had witness borne to them through their faith, received not the promise, God having provided some better things concerning us, that apart from us they should not be made perfect." "They" refers to Old Testament believers. Chrysostom puts the explanation thus: "You, Hebrews, may more easily exercise patience than Old Testament believers; they had much longer to wait and are still waiting until all the elect are gathered in; you have not to wait for them," etc.

E. E. J., Pensacola, Fla. 1. Are we to believe that God himself shall descend from heaven as stated in 1. Thes. 4: 16? 2. Does verse 17 mean that "we" in our present state are to be taken up to meet the Lord? 3. Is man born with immortality, or does he take on immortality through faith in God?

1. Yes, the coming will be in all the majesty of his personal presence and not by deputy, "even as he ascended" (Acts, 1: 11). "With a shout" means that he himself will give the signal to the hosts of heaven. 2. After having been "changed in a moment" (1. Cor. 15: 51, 52). 3. Jesus himself refers to eternal life not as inherent Christian faith on which all the churches—Greek, Roman and Protestant—agree. Tradition says it was drawn up by the apostles themselves during their stay at Jerusalem after the Ascension. Each one contributed a sentence, and the whole was left as a rule for the guidance of believers. Commentators, however, reject this explanation and hold that the Creed was composed not later than the fourth century. Many creeds were in existence at that time. Besides, no ecclesiastical writer earlier than the fifth century mentions the Apostles' Creed. It was not introduced as a part of public worship in the churches until the eleventh century.

A. E., Rumford Falls, Me. Is anything being done by the Chinese themselves toward education for women and girls?

Yes; Bishop Bashford reports that the Dowager Empress has established twelve schools for girls in the city of Peking, and several princesses connected with the royal household have also organized schools for girls in other cities. Footbinding has been forbidden in all of these schools.

M. M. F., Table Rock, W. Va. The custom of presenting eggs to friends at Easter time originated, it is said, with the Persians, as symbolical of the creation or re-creation of spring. The practice prevailed also among the Jews, Egyptians and Hindus. Christians adopted the custom to symbolize the resurrection.

M. C., Gainesville, Va. For a professing Christian to encourage any card-playing for any purpose is decidedly detrimental to his spiritual influence. It is setting an example which may lead others into evil courses and may even make them gamblers. That a minister of the Gospel should play cards is inconceivable.

SAVING THE CHILDREN IN CHINA

ONE Sunday afternoon in 1899, the writer attended a woman's C. E. Society in a station class held on A-da-cang Street near the south gate of the city of Foochow, China. One of the women had been weeping bitterly, and, on inquiry, she invited us to go to her home next door and see her children. There we found the "go-between" waiting for the final answer for the sale of four as fine children as were ever seen. No wonder the chubby baby boy and those nice girls had kept the mother weeping two days and nights. The father had died of cholera the year before. It had taken them a year to eat up the value of the house and now starvation faced them all.

The woman mourned. How could she, when she had become a Christian and had given up her idols, sell her children off to heathen? Well, she did not, for although there was not a cent of money in hand, the writer decided that the Lord must have some; and he had. About a month later, a stranger wrote to ask me to find a boy and a girl to be named for her own Norman and Rachel, to be supported by them and prayed for as their representatives in China. Later, two other sons of the same Chinese family "adopted me," and the Lord has provided.

Sing-ong, the eldest son, is most studious. He knows Mandarin and Japanese, and is studying English, and it is my hope that he and Rachel will go to Japan to fit themselves to be industrial leaders later; Sing-ong to study printing and lithographing, and Rachel art embroidery, cooking and dress-making in Tokyo. Mrs. Dang, the mother, has never regained the nervous strength lost in those days of sorrow.

From this beginning many other children have been added to our care. One young man has graduated from the Theological Seminary and is now preaching the Gospel. One girl, saved from being sold, is now teaching in the Ponasang Preparatory Girls' School; three others are studying there. Two boys are working in Foochow College press, two are in advanced classes in Foochow College. One, having studied in the Chinese course three years, was excused a few months to go to a government school to receive a degree. Although the youngest in the class, he graduated third highest and gained a testimonial of first degree with honorable mention and now has secured a family stipend and can pay to study in the English course of Foochow College. His mother died of fever con-

The night after Dr. Torrey, the great evangelist, visited Foochow on his way to Australia, pastor Lau, at Pagoda Anchorage, called us up to ask if we could give shelter to a poor starving girl that had been brought to the church. As she was known as the slave of a woman who was bringing her up to sell for evil purposes when older, he did not dare to harbor her without foreign permission. It was not until she caught sight of my foreign dress the next morning that she dared to be seen. Her arms were scarred where they had been tied behind her back and where lighted matches had been held to burn them. On one temple was a scar where her mistress had hurled her down on a jagged kerosene tin. She had heard her mistress say that she would kill her and throw her into the river (a thing very probable); so she had hidden for two days and nights in the foreign cemetery and finally came out the third night, driven by hunger. Twenty dollars was paid to release her. Dr. Torrey was surely allowed to come to strengthen my faith, for a child with no past but one associated with gambling and drinking was a discouraging task before an overworked missionary. But Pastor and Mrs. Lau took her into their own family. Pastor Lau found a Christian husband for her and she now has a home and a surname of her own.

Last year marked the opening of the second century of Protestant Christianity in China. It also marked the sixtieth year from the landing of the first missionaries at Foochow. It was the opening year of the second fifty years of baptized Christians in Foochow. It will become memorable as the year in which the Chinese Revival Society launched its first humanitarian work in the "Foochow Orphanage." For this the writer and others had prayed in secret for years—been persistently working on both sides of the globe. This prayer in secret began to find its open reward in both continents in 1907, first by the appointment of a Chinese committee on the Foochow Orphanage in Foochow, second by the promise of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to open its columns to the orphan needs.

A house was found and purchased in the name of one of the Orphan Committee. There Mrs. Dang's

Right Ideas About God

TEXTS:

"Are not five sparrows sold for two farthings, and not one of them is forgotten before God?" — LUKE 12: 6.
"Are not two sparrows sold for a farthing? and one of them shall not fall on the ground without your Father." — MATTHEW 10: 29

IF JESUS had not talked this way, for my part I would not have believed this talk; but seeing Jesus did talk this way, and seeing we never knew him to mislead us, and seeing he is the Truth, I cannot help but believe that this is so. It is too wonderful to be true on the one side; and then on the other side it is altogether too necessary to be untrue, and Jesus said it; and that is its certificate of truth. And in a word, what I would have you catch with all its divine preciousness and cadence is that Jesus says in the Scripture I read you that the sparrow's life was looked after by God, and the second Scripture says that there is always one mourner at a sparrow's funeral and that mourner is God.

Now Jesus evidently had been over at the market and had been noticing the price list of sparrows; and these sayings, that are often confounded in thought as if they were one, are not one and not identical, but very gladly and very truly two sayings. Jesus said at different times two strangely and beautifully different things about sparrows. He said that sparrows sold two for a third of a cent. That is cheap enough for preachers to buy them; and that is cheap enough to have a Sunday dinner for the poorest of us. Two sparrows, the market price on the price list, two for a third of a cent. And then when the family was bigger and they needed more meat, Jesus saw that the price list read that if you bought two farthings' worth you would get an extra sparrow thrown in for a bargain, and you would get five sparrows for two-thirds of a cent. Well, now, is that all? Why, no; that is not all. Is that the start? Well, it is not quite the start. What is this sparrow talk, foolish as the bickering of sparrows on a roof? Why, it is not sparrow talk; it is God talk. And he says that these sparrows, so tiny, so tough, so undesirable for food even for the poorest that they are practically actually worthless in the markets, yet God looks after the life of every one of them, and God digs the grave for every one that dies, and God is the mourner at every worthless sparrow's grave. And then he says—didn't you hear him? And then he says—we will not forget! And then he says—Oh, it is so heartening to hear it! And then he says with a jubilation of voice like the blowing of great music, "Are ye not of much more worth than many sparrows?" Don't you think, he says, that God will look after you folks, if he forgets no sparrow folk? Don't you think he will take care of your children when he takes care of a sparrow's children? Don't you think he will plan for your future when he plans for the sparrow's future? Jesus said, don't lose heart. You are not worthless. God notices you. He has them under his eye, he won't forget you. Take heart, O souls; clap the hands of your heart and sing. He is out watching over us.

Danger of Wrong Conceptions

Now there are two primal ideas I think absolutely necessary in any worthy life. One of these is a right idea about man and the other of these is a right idea about God. If you make a miss on either of these notions you will never get right on any notion. A great many matters, if you hazard on them and fail in the hazard, if you guess and guess amiss and figure at the sum and figure it out wrong, there will be nobody hurt and no issue changed; but if you got a wrong notion of God and if you got a wrong notion of man, every notion of the universe which lies between these two strange extremes would be defective and only defective forever. You might be able to measure the bulk of the stars; you might be able to catch the tug on the cable of gravitation; you might be able to compute for nautical almanacs the coming and going of the tides; you might be able to name a discovery for the new archipelagoes of stars; but if you did all that and did it well, namely, accurately, and do not get the right notion of the man who did the estimating and the God who did the creating of the star and gravitation and the tug of tide and ocean that hath the tides, and sun that pulls the tides with the moon that is the intermediary, all your astronomy would be worse than a broken cobweb that hangs between the sunflowers on the dusty autumn plain. Who is man? That is one matter. Who is God? That is another matter. Here is man at the poles of the universe, and yonder is God at the poles of the universe. And where is man going? Oh, well, if he is going right, he is going toward God.

Who is man? Now, then, if we were good logicians, if we had a knowledge of man, a right knowledge of man, then we could get knowledge, a right knowledge, of God. Or if we had right knowledge of God, then we could, if we were good logicians, get right knowledge of man. But we are not good logicians. Most people's logic breaks like a dismantled rainbow and we have nothing but shivering remnants of departed glory. And besides all that, we cannot get a right notion of man and we cannot get a right notion of God. We must be tutored. We must be shown. We must have some schoolmaster. We must be informed.

Nothing is more simple to the theory than to say that anybody can get a right notion of man, and truly it looks so and truly it is not so. We are with ourselves all the time. Some of us might be glad to get away from ourselves, but we are not permitted. We can get away from other folks; but we cannot get away from ourselves. A man eats with himself, he thinks with himself, he loves with himself and dreams with himself. He himself is his own companion from birth morn to death's dewless night. Yet there is not anybody with whom we are absolutely less familiar than we are with ourselves.

Do We Know Ourselves?

People know little about many things, but I will say they know less than little about themselves. If you want an accurate judgment of a man, don't ask the man; ask his wife. And if you want an honorable judgment, namely truthful, of a man, don't ask his wife, ask his neighbors. A man doesn't know himself. A man is apt to overrate himself. If a man were to put a price mark on himself, and he was going to be put in a salesroom or bazaar, don't you know enough to know that he would put about ten times as big a price mark on himself as the other folks would put on him? Don't you know that his neighbors would put a bargain price on him? And don't you know that he would put a price mark on himself that would defy all sale? That is solely to say that a man is not acquainted with himself. That is all it is to say. I do not fault it, not at all. I say this, that if a man didn't think something of himself, and if a man didn't have a bigger estimate of himself than most folks do, he could not stay with himself at all. I think it one of the sweet kindnesses of God that we do not know ourselves. We do not know the right climbing directions of our own powers. We cannot quadruple our own possibility in the universe. We usually are of lesser bulk than we dream. We are not worlds but satellites. And it is not in actual usage possible for a man to know himself; and a man that lives with himself all the time is still an unknown continent to himself. And if we don't know ourselves, how are we going to know God? And we don't know other folks. We cannot plummet souls. We cannot know how wide the deserts of the soul are. We do not know what vast despairs tyrannize over people's hearts. We do not know what shifting storms rankle in men's lives. We do not know how the hell sea angers on the rocks of people's characters. The next door neighbors of us; the next door neighbors to them, we do not know. And when a man gets to be a genius, as few men in the history of literature are, their faculty superb is that they know other people's souls. They do not know their own souls, but other people's souls. Shakespeare was no more a judge of himself than other people are judges of themselves; but he knew other people's souls so well that when we are with him we think we have gotten to a master of souls. And all the greatest men that ever drew breath and sighed and sobbed and lifted up a wonder call and charmed the earth and put new rainbows in the despairing stormy sky of life, were people that knew more about people than other folks; but they didn't know all! Now, when we don't know men, how are we going to get logical basis from which to argue up to God? And if we don't know man, having been man all our life, and if we don't know man having lived with man all our life, how are we going to know about God? And the plain simple statement is that neither man nor God have we ever gotten rightly at; and the plain simple statement is that man and God we must get rightly at or we shall get right with nothing and we shall arrive at no right destination, and we shall tie our boat up at some foreign wharf where we have no business. And this is why Jesus came here.

Why Jesus Came

Jesus came here to talk on just two matters; one of his items was man and the other of his items was God. He never talked about anything else. If he talked about the sparrows, he was looking at man, not at the sparrows. When he talked about God, and when he talked about men, then he was at his theme. And the incarnation is sufficiently explained by the impossibility of us folks that are born to live and born to die getting right notions about either God or man. And Jesus came to tell us how it was with man; and he came to show us how it was with God. And so man and God are not only the extremes of Jesus' talk, but they are the sum total themes of Jesus' discourse.

And we must have a right notion about God. If we get wrong about God our catastrophe is supreme. There is no mending it. If you get a pusillanimous God you will have a pusillanimous population. If you get a magnanimous God you will have a magnanimous population. If you get a heartless God you will have a Roman population. If you get a gleeful, æsthetic God you will have a Greek race of laughter and of song and of grace and death. And if you get a heart God, and a God of a heart, then you will get a heaven populated with music and laughter, and an earth populated with joy, and a world that is made so tender that a touch upon it is like the touch upon the hands of a little child. We must get right notions about God.

And Jesus came here to show us, not to tell us. These people that tell us may be prophets, and you may name them seers, but the people that show us, they are glorious. Telling folks won't do. We are so dull-eared, we are so incapable of larger understandings, we are so incompetent for the reasoning processes, we are so dubious or so hesitant, so bordering on despair, so fretful, we are so incompetent to climb; our sublimities are so far from us we can not catch them only temporarily in the wandering vastnesses of our moods; and what we want is somebody to show us. And Jesus came and showed us himself, and he said, "I am the Son of Man." Oh now, is this a man? This is a man. And he came and showed us himself and he said, "I am the Son of God." O Christ, what are you doing? And he said, "I am showing you man and I am showing you God; look and remember." That is it.

Now what is God doing? Allow there be a God, what is God doing? And we will never get at that, in my belief, unless we get it from Jesus. What is God doing? Why, he is doing the big things. What is God doing? Why, he is making charts for the stars to sail by. What is God doing? He is building the grand dyke around the seas to keep the hazard of the waters in, when the storm is fingering with the waves. What is God doing? Keeping the mountains in their places where he has anchored them. What is God doing? Sowing the forests so the ships shall not be without masts while the ages endure. What is God doing? Oh, you may reckon that from the days of Homer and Eschylus to the days of William Watson, anybody who tried to tell what God was doing without going to see him will have God off doing vast exploits and sailing vast seas and going through an interminable universe. And when Jesus came here he said: God is staying down close along the ground where he can watch the sparrows when they are building their houses, and he is staying down close along the ground so he can teach the witless, worthless sparrows how to fly, and he is staying close along the ground so that when the baby sparrow falls from its ill-built nest he will be there to dig a grave for it, and he is staying close along the ground so that no bird shall come to its eternal slumber without having one Body by it to shed a tear. God is out around looking for the lost and caring for the lost significant and caring for the lost insignificant. There will be some other that will be out looking at the mountains. Some look at the mountains because they are so high and they hedge the sky and they catch the glory of the skies on their tops. But who is going to be around looking for the baffled folks and looking at the common things? And Jesus says, "God is." What I say is, nobody knew that but Christ, and nobody shows that but Christ. Thank God, beloved, this

MONT LAWN'S BAND OF HELPERS

ONE of the most interesting incidents connected with the opening of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home at Mont-Lawn is the coming of the teachers. From North, South, East and West they come filled with love for the children and with cordial enthusiasm for their work among them.

The term teacher (given to the young ladies by the children) is rather misleading to those who are not entirely familiar with the methods employed at Mont-Lawn. A number of the young women are school teachers, and like the children are glad when school closes. But while the three "Rs" hold no place in the curriculum at Mont-Lawn, the little ones are surely taught lessons of fully as much importance, lessons which they carry into their homes, and which oftentimes have a distinct and practical bearing on their future lives. Gentleness to one another, love of nature, kindness to all living creatures, and practical application of the Golden Rule are lessons taking the place of books and slates.

Music forms an important part of the Mont-Lawn teaching, and is greatly enjoyed by the children. The young lady who has charge of the music brings each year new songs and hymns of cheer, and when the children gather in the Temple for the song service every child's face is radiant with interest as the first notes of the organ invite a response from childish voices. With what enthusiasm they follow the clear ringing voice of their leader! How their voices rise and swell in harmony, second only to that of the feathered choirs in the neighboring tree-tops! Who could look upon those fresh young faces and listen to those clear voices without feeling a thrill of joy and a concurrence of sentiment with the man who said he cared not who made the laws of a nation if only he could make the songs?

In this devoted group of young women one finds not only varied temperaments and personality, but each one adds her quota to the different ways and means of instructing and amusing the little guests.

One brings a trunk full of kindergarten material, paper, straw, scissors, and other implements and materials which serve admirably in keeping little fingers employed on days when the rain forbids a showing of the young lady who is "handy with the needle." Then there are the interested audiences which gather around the teacher with the gift of story-telling. How bright eyes sparkle and childish sympathy is expressed as the plot unfolds, involving the adventures of the brave little boy or the naughty little girl who saw the error of her ways just in time. Bed-time stories are told, when restless little ones are not inclined for sleep, and "continued-in-our-next" is promised, if quiet only prevails until each drowsy eye-lid falls and the tired but happy teacher can seek her own well-earned rest.

Then there is the teacher well up in wood lore, who takes a happy band of boys and girls up the mountain side, the party returning later laden with beautiful feathery ferns and other woodland beauties, with which porches and tables are decorated.

Mont-Lawn, as a holiday home, is a revelation of beauty to visitors who see it for the first time, with its splendid location on the hillside, its natural scenery, its colony of beautiful, commodious buildings, with the crowning glory of the Children's Temple embodying as it does the brooding care of the Master who bade the children come unto him. The spirit of love and devotion, which prompted the founding of this remarkable charity, finds expression in every item which goes to make up the whole.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home is really and essentially a home entirely devoid of anything which savors of institution life. Everything which the fertile brain and kindly heart of Dr. Klopsch can devise for the comfort and happiness of the little guests is put into operation and becomes an accomplished fact, without delay, and no one element at the Home contributes so largely to the desired end—complete happiness for the children—as the band of "teachers" who watch and work with unabated zeal.

RIGHT IDEAS ABOUT GOD

Sermon by Bishop William A. Quayle

is the right idea of God, that nothing is beneath him, that he has no small work, that he has no insignificants; that everything that is around is a big enough thing for God to lay his hands on, and for God to touch with his fingers, and God to caress with his tears, everything.

The right notion to get about God is not that God is exclusive, but that God is inclusive. That is the right notion about God. Why, woman, what are you hugging so? And she says, I am hugging my baby. Ay, but there are a hundred babies at the orphanage that haven't anybody to hug them. And she says, "Oh, I am busy. I am hugging my baby." And she well might. Anybody who wouldn't hug a baby such as was brought here for the preacher to baptize this morning, isn't worth keeping around. When you get so you don't want to hug babies, then nobody ought to hug you. What about the hundred babies motherless? Is God exclusive? Why, no, thank God, he is inclusive. He is around mothering all the motherless; he is around fathering all the fatherless. Who are you? I don't know who you are, but I know God knows who you are. Where do you live?

I don't know where you live, but my God knows where you live. If God came to town to-day he would not consult the city directory but come to your house and climb the stairs, or go down the back stairs, down the long dark hall, and knock on your back door. How many numbers here? Why, number, number, number, everybody's room has a number, and there are so many numbers and so many rooms. But God never asks anybody where you live. He never makes a mistake about your room, but knocks at your door in the cellar or garret or anywhere in the just came to or anywhere in the town, and says, "I just came to town and thought I would come over to see you." "How did you know where I lived?" "Oh," he said, "I never forgot." Thank God!

Now then, that is the right notion of God. What Jesus meant to say and what I think he did say in terms as unforgettable as the minstrelsy of angels on the night Jesus was born, is that there is a God in heaven and on earth, both in heaven and on the earth, to whom everybody is worthy, and with whom everybody is influential, and to whom everybody is a person of importance. O life, wouldn't you love a God like that? Who cares? God does. God does. Who notices? God does. This matter of noticing and caring, it is a great matter. Some people don't notice. You could pass them a hundred times and they don't notice. You could elbow up against people because you didn't notice where you are going, or sometimes because you want them to notice where you are going, and you want a smile from them, but they barely say, "Watch out where you are going, and what you are doing." Some people don't notice, and then some people when they do notice they don't care. They look at you and your face is furrowed. Why, it is plowed with the crazy plows of care, because the plows wherewith men plow the fields go straight across the field they are plowing, but the plow of care is a crazy plow; it runs its furrows zigzag. Some people when they notice you, don't care, and when they see all your life fairly plowed by the plow of care, they are so busy with themselves they don't have any more care than if they didn't notice you at all. And God notices, and God cares; and I am going to have comfort now.

There is a good deal of talk first and last about the immanency of God. That means God is here, not only there but here. And there is a good deal of talk, witless in the main I think, about the carpenter theory of the universe, namely, that God built the universe and went off and left it. But the trouble with that kind of talk is this, that the people that make it against Christianity have not had Christ show them things, have not had Christ tell them things. Do you tell me there is a carpenter of the universe, or an absentee God and a landlord that doesn't come to the house he has to rent, when he is down here watching for the sparrows? O soul, God is in town. O soul, God is in yourself. O soul, God will stay up with you. O soul, God will laugh with your joy. O soul, here is God. What a God that is!

I read this week one day how Dr. Grenfell, the man of the Labrador coast, out on a mission of mercy driven by his dogs, went out on an icefloe; then the floe drifted out to the sea, then dogs and master tipped in the surly winter waters along the Labrador coast, then climbed along on a rock of ice and floated. And the storm was so cold and so bitter, and the dogs were so fierce that the doctor had to fight for his life. He slew some of the dogs to keep them from slaying him. He wrapped himself about with their skins. He took the legs of the dead dogs and tied the bones of the legs together and made a staff of such poor material as this, and took his own garment and swung it to the top piece of the sorry staff so somebody might see him. And the winter storm was terrible; and the winter sea was surly; and the death hazard was imminent, and the dogs howled and fought like wild uncanny beasts. And somebody saw that flagstaff made from the bones of the dead dogs upon which the man swung his own garment for a flag, and somebody came and rescued him. But what I want you to know and what I want to certify to, is, If nobody else noticed us, God would. God saw the battle in the briny bitter sea. And what you say is, Why didn't God help him? Why, God did, dear heart. You mean, Why didn't God go and help him off the raft of icebergs? Oh, well, because God is in better business than helping folks off the icebergs. God's business is to help the man while on the iceberg to play the man while there, and in the storm to play the man while the storm rages and while he is fighting for life with the maddened hunger of the brutes to be so much the man that while God looks on he says to his angels, "Now play the hallelujah chorus. There is something being done that ought to wake your ecstasies. Now play, play!" And what I say this morning is that everybody harassed by care, and everybody dug into by the rowels of care and pain, and everybody baffled by the exigencies of things he cannot master, and everybody floating out on an iceberg in the winter sea to die, thinking that nobody knows and nobody cares—God cares and God knows, and he will bring him to a desired haven, thank God! Ah, brothers, brothers! Oh, sisters, sisters! God is around caring for the five-sparrows-for-two-farthing folk, all the cheap folks among us, all of us, all of us. God is noticing and God cares.

And when you remember this thing you must never forget that God came to die for his folks here; God came to die for his little folks here; God came to die for the least man and least woman of us here; then you will understand what Jesus meant when he said, "Are not ye of much more value than many sparrows?" God lives for the sparrows, but never dies for them. God both lives and dies for us, and then he lives again. Thank God! For human souls God lives and God dies, and God hath resurrections. And for these poor, forgotten folks God hath notice, and God hath care, and God hath a cross, and God hath salvation, and God hath a ladder built up into the skies, and God hath a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens. Oh, I wonder if there is anybody who, if he got that notion of God, would not fall in love with him? That is God. That is our God. Glory to his excellent name forever!

PRAYER: O Lord God, bless us, hearten us, restore our lost faith to us. Give us God, the great, true, tender, affable, merciful, salvation-bringing, cross-lifting God, and bring him to us, and then, O mighty God, bring us home in Christ. Amen.

RIOTING IN PERSIA'S CAPITAL

The Parliament Building at Teheran

A Persian Trooper

The Old Palace Which Was Bombarded

FOR some months past trouble between the Shah of Persia and the members of the new Persian Parliament has threatened to reach an acute stage. Close watchers of events thought it probable that at some time an actual clash, a trial of strength between the Shah and the Parliamentarians might come, but there were indeed few who three weeks ago would have predicted that before July the picturesque streets of Teheran would echo to the crackle of rifle shots and the shouts of the combatants, and see charges of cavalry sweeping through the dust of falling walls. It is a remarkable fact that the gun shots fired at Teheran would probably never have been heard if it were not for the shots fired in the late Russian-Japanese War. The Persians from the first evinced a strong interest in the success of Japan. Russia at the north they fear. As they saw what Japan had done they began to dream of a rebirth of the former military and civil power of Persia, which once caused the entire East to tremble at the sound of their chariots. Educational institutions were established and quite a number of provincial governors entered into the movement to modernize Persia. The Shah who then ruled listened to the demand for a more or less popular assembly and a Parliament was established. This, however, greatly displeased the conservative party and the old nobility, who have great influence both in the court and in the provinces. After the establishment of the Parliament there was more or less friction between the Shah and its members. Then the Shah died and a new ruler came to the throne. The new ruler did not take kindly to the authority that was assumed by the assembly, which even dared to investigate the Shah's private budget. This by many of the old-time Persians was regarded as intolerable effrontery. Several of the Parliamentarian leaders were suspected of sowing sedition, and the government took measures for their arrest. The Parliamentarian propaganda was perhaps unwise in demanding so much at this early stage of its existence. Probably, in the course of time, additional power would have come to them.

On June 23 the clash came. Early in the morning several troops of cavalry trotted into the open space about the Parliament Building and a neighboring mosque, and, filing off to right and left, drew a cordon about the buildings in which the Parliament was assembled. Then an officer entered and demanding that certain persons be surrendered on the order of the Shah. The assembly sullenly refused. It has, or rather did have, a corps of guards. These opened fire without warning on the Shah's troops. Several troopers pitched dead from their saddles and fell clanking on the stone roadway. For the assembly and its ambitions it was a fatal volley, for it placed them in the position of malcontents bearing arms and in actual rebellion against the legal authorities. It gave unfortunately an excuse for repressive measures that otherwise the government would probably have not dared to employ. The troops threw their carbines to their shoulders and returned the fire. Then the battle began to rage in earnest; reinforcements were soon swinging through the city gates from outlying garrisons and converged toward the district from which the continual crash of musketry told them that the fight was on and the ground being bitterly contested. About eleven, light artillery got into position, and a few moments later the shells were shrieking toward the walls of the Parliament Building, bringing down great sections of brick and stone. A neighboring mosque, filled with members of the Parliamentarian Party, and from which a galling fire had been kept up, was soon laid in ruins. The insurgents delivered their fire with great accuracy and many of the cavalymen were killed, as they were compelled to fight for the most part in the open, while the Parliamentarians were ensconced behind cover. The cavalry engaged in the fight are usually referred to as the Shah's Cossacks on account of their uniform and equipment being nearly identical with the cavalry of Russia, but they are of pure Persian blood and have no relation with the warriors of the Don. Then the shouting troops stormed the Parliament Buildings, the shots seemed to cease and the clash and grate of cold steel told that the fight was a desperate hand-to-hand struggle with sabre and bayonet. When the fight was over the bodies of soldiers and nationalists were strewn thick about the Parliament House. A number of reformers took possession of the Imperial Palace, lately vacated by the Shah; artillery opened fire on it, dislodged the nationalists and left the structure a wreck. Eighteen leaders of the reform party were taken in chains before the Shah and at once ordered to be executed. Everywhere the Shah triumphed, and a great many of those opposed to him were imprisoned. Already workmen are tearing down the ruins of the Parliament Building, and the Shah has issued orders for a new election to occur in two months.

SAVING THE CHILDREN IN CHINA

family live, and several protégés of others who have gone on furlough, among them a very bright boy and his betrothed. He was taken by Dr. Emily D. Smith from begging on the streets of Ingkok, but is now studying English in Foochow College, and only stays in the Orphan House during vacations. There is a fine school room in this house which is ready for the girls' industrial class as soon as we have funds for the teacher. Adjoining houses will be bought as funds come in.

Among our orphan children is another little rescued slave, Ging-muoi. Another is the adopted daughter of a Bible woman. There are girls who do not care to study but will make good seamstresses. The orphanage needs an industrial school for girls more than anything else. Unless the Christians can keep the girls good and pure, our whole attempt will fall into disrepute. Special appeal is therefore made for means to buy and support industrial plants for both girls and boys.

A poor widow came to us for help. Her husband, an earnest preacher, had just died of plague among the mountains of Ingkok. She has three children under seven. With this little circle, none old enough to care for itself, how can she do more than hold them together for the next few years? Half an hour later my sedan was headed to visit a family whose father is in prison for debt. The poor mother of four children was dying with consumption and I dared not take her into the Home to contaminate others. As soon as she heard her husband was to be arrested, she swooned and never revived. She died the day before he was put in prison. His family used to be wealthy, but now are extremely poor. These children were left by a dying mother with the request to hunt me up and ask me to educate them to be Christians. At A-da-cang is a poor woman whose oldest boy was stolen and sold to a rich man in the Philippines. She has another little boy. What shall be done with these people?

Notwithstanding the urgency of these individual cases, the needs of buildings and matrons, superintendents and teachers come first on the list. In a district where smallpox and plague are yearly scourges, proper buildings are imperative, before any large number of orphans can be received with safety. For the information of interested readers I would explain that two orphans can be supported for $50 a year, and a matron or industrial or kindergarten teacher for $50; $200 will build and $100 will furnish a workshop.

Foochow is one of the oldest ports in China. There are no restrictions in buying property either here or at Pagoda, Sharp Peak or Kuliang. One house is already bought at Foochow city, and property is secured at Pagoda Anchorage, and a fine site for a sanitarium has been purchased at Sharp Peak. Thus the work is already well started. All gifts contributed by CHRISTIAN HERALD readers will be received by the writer and accounts will be audited by Hon. Samuel L. Gracey, American Consul, who will also act as legal adviser in the future as he has from the first in all matters relating to the work.

EX-PRESIDENT CLEVELAND DEAD

After a Protracted Illness, he Suddenly Passes Away at His Home in Princeton, N. J.

IN THE death of ex-President Grover Cleveland, which took place suddenly at 8:40 A. M. on June 24, in his home at Princeton, N. J., the country loses one of its most respected statesmen, a man who throughout a long public career had won the admiration and esteem of the American people, irrespective of political affiliations, for his administrative ability, sturdy honesty and absolute integrity of character.

Mr. Cleveland had been in ill-health since last fall. For several months past, he had been under treatment at Lakewood, N. J., for gastrointestinal troubles and long standing organic affection of the heart and kidneys. His condition became critical in February last, and reports were published that his ailments were still further complicated by cancer of the stomach, but this was denied by his physicians. Early in June he seemed to improve and returned from Lakewood to his home. The gain, however, was merely temporary. On June 23, while he was planning to join his family in New Hampshire for the summer, he became suddenly worse. Mrs. Cleveland, who was with him, summoned the physicians, who took a hopeful view and saw no reason to apprehend serious results. Next morning, the ex-President was prostrated by a stroke of heart failure. The doctors were hastily recalled. Drs. R. L. Lockwood, J. M. Carnochan and Joseph D. Bryant were soon at the invalid's side and worked with him for some time. He continued to sink, however, and at 7 o'clock became unconscious. He remained in a comatose condition until 8:40 A. M., when the end came. Mrs. Cleveland was the only member of the family present at the final scene.

Stephen Grover Cleveland was born in Caldwell, Essex County, N. J., on March 18, 1837, his father being the Rev. Richard Falley Cleveland, a Presbyterian minister.

Cleveland's youth was a period of hard struggle. He was one of a family of nine children and his father died before any of them were grown up. It was a battle for educational advantages, but young Cleveland was exceedingly energetic and ambitious. At Fayetteville and Clinton, he attended an academy, though not regularly. At 14 he was clerking in a store at the munificent salary of $50 a year. At 17 he was preparing to enter Hamilton College. On the way he stopped to visit his uncle, Allan Cleveland of Buffalo, who persuaded him to remain in that city, having taken a strong liking to the lad.

This was the turning-point in his life. He studied law, was admitted to the bar and made many friends by his quiet, self-reliant manner. For some literary work in Buffalo he was paid $60 for six weeks' labor and considered himself well rewarded as his work was acknowledged in the preface when the books were published. When he began the study of law, he served as copyist in the offices of a Buffalo law firm for $600 a year, which was afterwards increased to $1,000. By study and observation and reading he strove constantly to widen his mental horizon. He thus kept himself in training for the opportunity which he felt would come some day as it had come to others. His first political appointment was that of Assistant District Attorney of Erie County, in 1863. Step by step, he plodded his way until within the next eighteen years he had become well known both in law and politics, and so popular in Buffalo that he was nominated for Mayor and triumphantly elected. His uncompromising honesty and unflinching courage in doing what he believed to be for the best interests of the people won him friends and at the same time leagued against him many politicians of the venal class. It was not a surprise to those who knew the strong personality of the man, when in 1882 he was nominated for Governor of New York. As Governor he pursued the same vigorous policy. He became known as the "Veto Governor," just as years later he became the "Veto President," and his official hand and influence were firmly set against public extravagance, political cabals, corruptionists and grafters. As Governor he gave his whole time and energies to the people's interests and added to his reputation for honesty, courage and political sagacity.

In 1884 he was elected President of the United States, defeating James G. Blaine by a majority of 37 electoral votes. He was defeated for the presidency in 1888 by Benjamin Harrison, and for a time returned to law practice in New York. In 1892 he was again elected, defeating President Harrison. The events of his two terms are public history and need not be recapitulated here. His messages, his official acts and his general conduct of the duties of his high office were marked by solicitude for the public interests, high regard for the supremacy of the law and reverence for the constitution. He inaugurated important reforms, kept his sacred pledges to the people, and gave to the country an example of a President who held the good of the people as superior to the demands of political parties. His attitude on tariff reform, on the proposed free coinage of silver, on Hawaii, Venezuela and the Monroe doctrine proved that to Jacksonian courage he added a broad and comprehensive statesmanship in dealing with the great questions of the time.

Mr. Cleveland, in 1886, married Miss Frances Folsom, who speedily became one of the most popular as she was one of the most beautiful brides the White House had ever welcomed. Five children were born to them. The eldest was Ruth, a girl of unusual promise, who was born in New York City, October 3, 1891. When she went to live in the White House she was called Baby Ruth by the public. She died at the Princeton home on January 7, 1904, of diphtheria. Esther, the second child, was born in the White House on September 9, 1893, a few months after Mr. Cleveland entered on his second term. Marion, the third daughter, was born at Buzzard's Bay July 7, 1895. Richard Folsom, the first son, was born at Princeton in 1897. The fifth child and second son was born at Gray Gables, Buzzard's Bay, July 18, 1903, and was named Francis Grover, for both parents.

Mr. Cleveland left a moderate competence for his family. Contrary to the general impression, he was not a rich man. His income since he left the White House has not exceeded $15,000 a year, though for one year it was $25,000. He lived in the country rather than face the heavy expenditures involved in city residence. In his domestic and social life, his surroundings were of the happiest. His Princeton friends and neighbors far and near appreciated the honor of having "the First Citizen" dwell among them. He was greatly devoted to outdoor sports, and spent much of his leisure fishing and hunting. Undue exposure to cold and wet on some of these outings years ago is believed to have laid the foundation of his physical ailments.

Many hundreds of telegrams and letters of condolence have been received by Mrs. Cleveland, showing how widespread was the popular appreciation of the late statesman. Orders were given for official thirty days' mourning in the Army and Navy. President Roosevelt in a proclamation addressed to the nation, gave expression to this eulogy of Mr. Cleveland:

His chief services to his country were rendered during his long, varied and honorable career in public life. As Mayor of his city, as Governor of his State, and twice as President, he showed signal power as an administrator, coupled with entire devotion to the country's good and a courage that quailed before no hostility when once he was convinced where his duty lay. Since his retirement from the Presidency he has continued well and faithfully to serve his countrymen by the simplicity, dignity and uprightness of his private life. In testimony of the respect in which his memory is held by the government and people of the United States I do hereby direct that the flags on the White House and the several department buildings be displayed at half mast for a period of thirty days, and that suitable military and naval honors, under the orders of the Secretaries of War and of the Navy, be rendered on the day of the funeral.

The Dead Ex-President

EX-PRESIDENT CLEVELAND'S death removes from worldly scenes and activities one of the worthiest and most distinguished sons of the republic. The bereavement is none the less a national one because of the fact that for several years past Mr. Cleveland was retired from the public gaze through increasing age and illness. In his retirement he was followed by the love and admiration that were due to one who during a long life of public service had performed his duties with a simple, quiet dignity, a Spartan courage and an inflexible fidelity.

As Executive, he held constantly before him the highest interests of the whole people. When the path of duty was once made clear, no opposition could restrain him from following it to the end. He had passed through the ruck of factional politics with a clean conscience and an unsullied record, and he was well equipped to become the champion of the people against the assaults of political bosses, partisans and predatory spoilsmen. In city, State and nation, he was a bulwark against corruption and extravagance. He stood for the supremacy of law, the integrity of the Constitution, clean politics and rigid honesty in the public service.

Mr. Cleveland had reached the allotted span of human life when the call came; but long before his demise, he had the consolation of knowing that his faithful services had been rightly appreciated by the American people, who, notwithstanding his unostentatious private life, had set his name high up in the roll of those whom our nation loves to honor. In the mellowing influences of those closing years he had lived down all partisanship and old-time antagonisms. Amid the rise and fall of public reputations, that of Grover Cleveland stood secure. As the "First Citizen" of the republic, he was beloved and respected by all.

It is natural that we should look for the influences that combined to form a character at once so strong, honest, fearless and just. In Mr. Cleveland's case we have not far to seek. Early home training under Christian parentage left its beneficent impress on that rugged life. His was not a demonstrative religion, but a quiet, firm, abiding belief in the old-fashioned Gospel. On March 14 last, in the preface to a book on "The Gospels and the Acts," he wrote what was probably the last formal expression from his pen:

I very much hope that in sending out this book you will do something to invite more attention among the masses of our people to the study of the New Testament and Bible as a whole. It seems to me that in these days there is an unhappy falling off in our appreciation of the importance of this study. I do not believe, as a people, that we can afford to allow our interest in and veneration for the Bible to abate. I look upon it as the source from which those who study it in spirit and truth will derive strength of character, a realization of the duty of citizenship and a true apprehension of the power and wisdom and mercy of God.

It would almost seem as though the writer, in that closing sentence, had revealed the secret of his own phenomenal life-work, which the Hon. W. J. Bryan has pronounced "the career of one of the strongest characters known to the political world during the last generation."

A Century of Temperance

ALTHOUGH comparatively little attention has been given to the meeting of the World's Temperance Centennial Congress in Saratoga in June, it was in many respects one of the most notable public gatherings of the year. Just a century ago, in 1808, the seedling of a great reform was planted by the organization in Saratoga County, New York, of the first permanent association for the purpose of promoting temperance. It was called "The Union Temperance Society of Moreau and Northumberland" and its members, chiefly farmers and ruralists, pledged themselves, under a penalty of twenty-five cents fine, not to drink wine or distilled spirits, nor to offer them to others. Any member who fell from grace and became intoxicated, was subjected to a fine of fifty cents! It was a courageous movement for those early days, when drinking was in fashion and conviviality the rule, and the members were denounced as fanatics.

But it was a beginning. Soon the churches aroused themselves to the importance of such an example and some four years later, in 1812, the Presbyterian General Assembly urged all the pastors of that denomination to preach against intemperance. Several States took up the new reform, and in 1813 the famous Massachusetts Society for the Suppression of Intemperance was organized to "suppress the too free use of ardent spirits and its kindred vices." They were not so radical as the Saratoga farmers, who had caught the true spirit of John Wesley, who, over half a century earlier, had formulated a set of "General Rules" warning his people against the sins of the times and especially against "drunkenness, the buying or selling of spirituous liquors, or drinking them."

When the first little Saratoga Society was formed in 1808, we had a population of only 5,500,000. To-day, with our population of nearly 90,000,000, we have a multitude of temperance organizations in practically all the States, with strong, well-supported central bodies on a national basis and an aggregate membership mounting up into the millions. In all save a few States and territories the liquor traffic is under restraint, in some States the control is absolute. A very large proportion of our whole population is now living under prohibition.

This splendid rounding of the century's temperance record should give courage to the brave men and women who are spending their lives in an earnest effort to suppress the worst evil of our times.

The Hot Wave in a Great City

NEW YORK CITY dreads the coming of summer with its intense heat, dust and general discomfort. This year, however, the greater part of June was so cool that hopes were entertained that the deadly hot "spells" might not come but for a short period. The last week of June, however, was enough to make one forget the pleasant days that had gone before. The sun beat down pitilessly into the squares and courts. A yellow glare seemed to shine in the streets and the walls and pavements radiated heat long after the sun, from which they had received it, had gone down.

The city authorities did what they could to ameliorate the condition of those in the crowded lower parts of the city. Water was turned on from the hydrants, and the children were soon splashing their feet in the cooling streams running through the gutters. The great recreation piers were great points of attraction for both mothers and their children. These piers are double decked and reach far out into the river beside the docks. On our cover page is given a picture of one of these recreation piers on one of the hot afternoons when all humanity seeks some place more comfortable than the narrow apartments in which they literally gasp for air. The artist painted the picture from the edge of the pier and gives an accurate idea of the many types of people who frequent these "health resorts."

Before the weather changed there were many prostrations and several deaths resulting directly or indirectly from the intense heat, for the effects of such a period of physical discomfort do not pass away until some time after cool breezes make a great city more "livable."

AS A FINAL REMINDER we call attention to the fact that all new subscriptions mailed to us until midnight, July 8, will be received at the greatly reduced rates open to NEW subscribers under our Special Subscription Offer—for particulars see issues of June 10 and 17 and editorial pages, June 24 and July 1.

One Day Left

If you are one of those who receive THE CHRISTIAN HERALD a day in advance of the date of issue, there is still one day left in which you and your friends may take advantage of this Special Offer. The chances are that in one day you could easily win every one of the more than generous rewards which we will send—one for every new subscription—in appreciation of your efforts.

It will not require any extraordinary arguments or tiresome persuasion on your part. Simply call on a few of your friends and tell them plainly and briefly the leading features that attract you to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD; how it keeps you up-to-date on all the general topics of the day; how it helps you in your Church work and spiritual life, and how its beautiful art features and the many interesting and useful things which you glean from its pages, are a weekly source of good cheer. Then tell them that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD can be theirs for eight months—from July 1, 1908, to March 1, 1909—at exactly one-half the regular subscription price, or 50 cents—all holiday numbers for the year included.

Will YOU Send Us One New Subscriber

Probably every second person, at least, to whom you present this proposition will be eager to take advantage of our extraordinary offer, and you yourself will have materially aided us in our earnest efforts to upbuild this magazine and extend its wonderful influence for good. 300,000 subscribers is the goal we are determined to reach. Our friends are helping us nobly, but we want everyone to send us at least one new subscriber—and if you send us but one, remember, you have started an influence for good for which your friend as well as we will be ever grateful.

Make to-day bear fruit for yourself as well as for us—for if you desire any of the books mentioned in our list of rewards, to-day is ample time to earn them.

Alexandra's Beautiful Act

RECENTLY Miss Martha Massey, a poor girl, lay sick in the St. Luke Hospital, Pembroke Square, London. On being told that she could not recover, she wrote a letter to Queen Alexandra, stating that she should like to see her before she died. Accompanied by the Hon. Charlotte Knollys and the Hon. Sidney Greville, Queen Alexandra paid a surprise visit to the hospital to gratify the poor girl's request. The Queen took with her a bouquet of orchids, lilies of the valley and other flowers from the palace gardens, which she presented to the invalid, who was overcome with joy at the realization of her desires. It is getting to be one of the pleasant features of the times that kings and queens are paying very much more attention to the plain people of their realms than was the custom, although there have always been among rulers good men and women who have counted their positions of power as a means of stewardship. One of the most important lessons that Christ teaches is the duty that strength owes to weakness. Before Christ's time it was held that weakness owed all the obligation to strength, and hence power has ever oppressed weakness; intelligence has held its haughty head above ignorance; culture has been impatient with rudeness. But Christ reversed the teaching of the world and commanded the strong to help the weak, the intelligent to enlighten the ignorant, and the good to purify and reform the bad. For six thousand years the idea of human government was that the people were to minister to the happiness and success of the ruler, till, at the close of the Civil War in this country, it was demonstrated that men could rule themselves and that the object of human government is for the rulers to minister to the happiness and prosperity of the people; and hence the greatest kings and queens in the world to-day are those that have at heart most sincerely the interest of the humblest citizens in all the realm. Alexandra is a queen in her royal robes, adorned with her crown jewels in the great social functions of the palaces, but nowhere greater as a queen than when she visits the poor, sick, dying girl in the hospital and gives her flowers and her love. She has copied the example of the Divine Master whom she serves, who, though he is King of heaven and earth, counted it his highest glory and greatest pleasure to minister to the wants of his humble, suffering subjects.

For even the Son of man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister. (Mark 10 : 45.)

The Skull and Cross-Bones

The government of Russia has control of the liquor traffic and there is appalling drunkenness there. The women of St. Petersburg, some time ago, mobbed some of the drinking places of the city, so enraged were they at the wreckage of their husbands, sons, fathers and brothers. The Parliament of Russia appointed a commission to consider the damage of the liquor traffic. That commission reported in favor of removing the royal eagle from the vodka (liquor) bottles, and placing in its stead the skull and cross-bones, which stand for poison in all nations and climes; and also a printed message of warning against the excessive use of strong drink.

Their poison is like the poison of a serpent. (Ps. 58 : 4.)

Blind Tom Dead

For a whole generation, Blind Tom astounded and delighted hundreds of thousands of people all over our country by his marvelous performances on the piano. His real name was Thomas Wiggins, and his parents, Mignon and Charity Wiggins, were slaves on a plantation in Georgia. Though a poor, blind slave, he was endowed with such musical genius that he could interpret Beethoven, Chopin, Rubinstein, Wagner and the other great composers in a wonderful manner. At the height of his career he was desired for concerts and public entertainments, above almost anyone else in the country. He had a peculiar habit of applauding himself enthusiastically when he had finished one of his great pieces. Tom died in Hoboken the other day. The colored people in plantation times were full of music and though Tom could not see, he could hear and his soul was full of harmony. He reflected, in his singular genius, the spirit of absolute harmony and was God's evangel of joy and melody to his fellow men. He had tireless industry along with his singular genius, which made his professional marvels more astonishing. When we see so many dull and heavy and dreary people who have eyes, ears and all that wealth or culture could give, we look with feelings of admiration upon such a character as Blind Tom, who with so many difficulties contributed in so large a measure to the entertainment and happiness of his fellow men. It is not surprising that God, who is the author of all harmony, should have always employed music as a part of the service of his house, in the personal inspiration and spiritual progress of his Kingdom.

Praise the Lord with harp : sing unto him with the psaltery and an instrument of ten strings. (Ps. 33 : 2.)

A Fatal Error

Owing to heavy rainfalls in the mountains in northwest Hupeh, China, it frequently happens that a torrent of water rushes down the mountainsides into the Han, a tributary of the great Yang-tse. Hitherto warning of the freshets has been telegraphed from Siang-yang, 400 miles away from the mouth of the Han, and on receipt of the news men have been hurriedly sent out, equipped with gongs, to warn the boats at the mouth of the river to find a safe anchorage. On the evening of April 6, messengers were sent around with the news that a freshet, six feet high, was on its way down. The inhabitants and the boating population considered signal and make shipwreck of their faith! How sad it would be if we were to so delay the message of alarm that the mariners on life's sea would perish before it had reached them!

But if the watchman see the sword come, and blow not the trumpet, and the people be not warned; if the sword come, and take any person from among them, his blood will I require at the watchman's hand. (Ezek. 33 : 6.)

Public Drinking Vessels

As a man was leading his little girl to get a drink in a railroad car, a woman halted him and said: "Do not let your child drink out of that cup. That man that just drank from it and went into the next car, has a loathsome disease and your child is liable to take it." He said: "The child is very thirsty and we will have to take some risks in life." After the child had drank, the woman went over to the mother and told her of the danger, who, filled with horror at the risk, spoke in excited words to her husband, who rose, seized the cup and threw it out the window. In another car a tall lean man in the last stages of consumption, went to the water cooler and drank out of the public cup. He was even halted by a paroxysm of coughing before he took his drink. During the day's ride, men, women and children drank from the same cup and it was a miracle if some of them did not catch the disease by contagion.

The laws of health are getting more strict. They must stop these public cups at the fountains, parks, railroad stations and other popular places, as the white plague and other diseases are being scattered broadcast through this contamination. In the moral and religious world, the people with fatal diseases and the utensils of contamination are so numerous that the greatest care must be taken to save the men, women and children from the deadly blight.

The priest shall pronounce him unclean; it is the plague of leprosy. (Lev. 13 : 27.)

The Traitor Disgraced

A pitiable spectacle, the degradation of the traitor Charles B. Ullmo, formerly a naval officer, occurred at St. Roch Square, Toulon, France, June 12, in the presence of an enormous crowd. Ensign Ullmo was arrested at Toulon last October, charged with being a spy. An examination of his effects showed him to be in possession of many valuable documents. Last February he was found guilty by a court-martial of attempting to sell naval secrets to a foreign Power, and sentenced to life imprisonment in a fortress and to be degraded in rank. Train excursions were run into Toulon and thousands of people from the surrounding country came in to witness the ceremony. They packed the sidewalks and covered the adjacent roofs, walls and ramparts. The pressure of the crowds was so great that it threatened to sweep away the lines of soldiers and sailors drawn up around the square. After the troops had been reinforced with two line regiments, a battery of artillery and two squadrons of cavalry, Ullmo, wearing his uniform and sword, was led into the rectangle, where the Commandant read the order, that Ullmo had betrayed his country and was not worthy to wear its uniform. Two subalterns then took off his sword and stripped him of his chevrons and buttons. One of the subalterns broke the sword across his knee and threw the broken blade at Ullmo's feet. In this plight Ullmo was compelled to march at the head of a squad of soldiers around the rectangle amid the hoots and jeers of the crowd. Tears were streaming down his face. Several thousand recruits who witnessed Ullmo's degradation were greatly impressed by the ceremony. Ullmo will be deported to Devil's Island, off the coast of French Guiana, where Major Dreyfus was confined.

In all nations and times, the traitor has been counted the most despicable character. It is bad enough to be untrue to another, to profess to be a friend and yet be an enemy; but the one who would sell his country, by universal estimation merits death. And when a man sells his country for money, he sinks to a deeper degradation. Since the days of Judas there have been those who have sold the truth for money, have betrayed their Lord for silver. There are persons in our civilized and Christian times who sell their Lord for a price cheaper than that of thirty pieces of silver. They get no return, only pieces of leather, or paper, or glass, or clay. They have parted with their Lord and have not a pennyworth, even of material things, to show for it.

What will ye give me, and I will deliver him unto you? (Matt. 26 : 15.)

Queen Alexandra's Visit to a Dying Girl in Hospital

a six-foot freshet to be of little consequence, and took no precautions whatever, believing that, as in former years, its arrival need not be expected for another twenty-four hours. Unfortunately the telegram announcing the oncoming torrent was delayed for twenty-four hours and by an error in the wording the height was reduced from twenty-six to six feet. The freshet arrived at lightning speed at midnight on April 6. The night was pitch dark, the inhabitants were asleep. Suddenly thousands of boats in the Han River were torn from their moorings and hurled together in confusion on the breast of a raging torrent. The native papers state that a small steamer, 700 large junks and innumerable small craft were destroyed. The loss of life, at first estimated at 2,000, probably exceeded double that number. Eighteen hundred bodies were picked up at one bend of the Yang-tse alone. A number of women and children are among the dead. Thirteen hundred masts were recovered at the same spot.

When so much of human destiny hangs upon the words and actions of others, how important it is that there be caution and prudence, that fatal mistakes may be avoided! There is the difference between life and death for the passengers in the color of the signal-light at the switch or station. Amidst the moral dangers of life, Christian men and women must sound the alarm in no uncertain way. The message of warning must have no word left out. It must be unequivocal and true, the messenger sent with the alarm must be swift of foot or a wreck of souls will line the shores. How dreadful if, by the fault or sin of ourselves, others shall mistake the

BIBLE TEACHERS IN CONFERENCE

AN ARMY of Christian workers, numbering 2,500, assembled in Louisville, Ky., from the 18th to the 20th of June as delegates to the twelfth International Sunday School Convention. These delegates represented a Sunday School constituency of fourteen millions. They came from every State in the Union, Canada, various countries of Europe, notably Great Britain, from the Far East and "the isles of the sea." Cuba, Mexico, Porto Rico, the West Indies, the American Possessions, South and Central America also had representatives. All of these delegates were Christian men and women who have long been interested in all phases of Bible study and Sunday School instruction.

Canada sent a large delegation of its most distinguished men. Among them were Justice Maclaren of the Ontario Court of Appeals, who has been president of the International Sunday School Association since 1905, Principal E. I. Rexford, D.D., Hon. Noah Shakespeare, Postmaster of Victoria, and a list of the addresses delivered would make a good-sized leaflet.

Secretary Lawrence

The Convention was one that impressed all present with a sense of its spiritual import. Its motto was "We Would See Jesus," and it seemed to in-membership. The pastor, he declared, is the pastor of the Bible School, and it is his most fruitful and responsive parish.

Dr. M. C. Hazard, of Boston, made a strong plea for the graded lessons in Sunday School work. He said the graded lesson would be easier to teach and thus be a benefit in small schools. The advantages of the graded lessons over the uniform lessons grew out of the fact that they are selected with reference to the capacities and requirements of each grade in the school. Psychology shows that at different ages the mind of the child requires different nutriment. Graded lessons are based upon this fact, and provide for each grade the lessons suitable for it. The lesson does not have to be adapted to the scholar; it is already adapted to his needs.

On Sunday afternoon the time was devoted to the temperance question and several important addresses were made. Hon. Justice J. J. Maclaren, of Ontario, Canada, was in the chair, and the number of people present evinced the general interest of the people in the topic, especially since so many of our States have been swept into the temperance column. Mrs. L. M. N. Stevens, of Portland, Me., was the only woman speaker. She is national president of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union and she spoke of prohibition and total abstinence as the two oars of the temperance reform. In order that the temperance craft go steadily, successfully forward both of these propelling forces were necessary. She stated that there is far more total abstinence sentiment and practice than ever before. Rev. Alexander Alison, D.D., General Secretary of the National Temperance Society, spoke on "The Dual Problem." He said this was total abstinence for the individual and the abolition of the liquor traffic. There was no obstacle in the way of our Christian religion that is greater than the use and sale of alcoholic beverages.

Rev. P. A. Baker, D.D., of Columbus, O., National Superintendent of the Anti-Saloon League, spoke on the new crusade against the saloon. He assured the delegates that the present wave of reform would never recede, and that at last that un-American institution, the saloon, would be swept away. Already more than thirty-eight millions of people are living in prohibition territory.

At the close of the Convention Dr. George W. Truett conducted the service, speaking on the theme, "Arise! Let Us Go Hence." It was an inspiring godspeed to the delegates to take back to their home churches some of the divine fire that had burned in the hearts of the Sunday School workers at the Convention.

Mrs. Lillian Stevens

superintendent of the largest Methodist Sunday School in the world, both of whom have spent several months in China, Korea and Japan in Sunday School work, spoke most interestingly on Bible study progress in the Orient. From Mexico came C. Scott Williams and Rev. E. M. Sein. From Central and South America came Rev. Aquila Lucas, who gave a comprehensive review of Sunday School work in those countries. It would be impossible to give even a brief list of the prominent Americans present, for they comprised all of the eminent Sunday School leaders of the country, both clergymen and laymen, spire every speaker and every delegate with new zeal for Sunday School work through which the youth of our country, the men and women of tomorrow, receive most of their religious instruction. There was a preparatory praise service and every day a quiet half hour of prayer and religious communion at the close of the Convention work. Several main topics were presented for discussion by the committee. They included the world-wide subject of missions, temperance, the adult department and teacher training. The last was considered of vital importance by the delegates, who discussed the various plans presented with an eagerness and intensity which showed how the topic had been gone over in their own minds.

Dr. A. F. Schauffler of New York, chairman of the Lesson Committee, presented the report on the intermediate lesson system. Among those who spoke at this session were four members of the British section of the International Lesson Committee, one being the chairman, Rev. Alfred Rowland, D.D., the eminent Congregational clergyman of England.

One of the most interesting addresses was made on the Friday evening of the Convention by Dr. A. C. Dixon of Chicago. His theme was "The Bible For Men." He brought out the fact that if you would study the history of literature, you must know your Bible, for hundreds of thousands of volumes in our great libraries were written because the Bible exists. Theology, which is the science of God, the greatest science in the world, is unintelligible without the Bible. The study of great modern movements which have emancipated the human mind and given to millions civil and religious liberty, compels us to take into account the Bible as the mightiest factor in bringing about these results.

Bishop Bell spoke on "The Bible School and the Pastor." He said the pastor should endeavor to form great classes of men, that he might unite in one essential life and body his school and church

Temperance Leaders in Council

A CONGRESS of temperance workers met lately in Saratoga, N. Y., the sessions lasting from June 14 to 23. Many prominent representatives of the temperance cause from other lands were in attendance. The Sons of Temperance, the Good Templars, the Rechabites, the Women's Temperance Union, the International Reform Bureau were present; also representatives from the Permanent Committees on Temperance of the Presbyterian, Baptist, Free Methodist and Lutheran churches and the Society of Friends. Great Britain was represented by the Hon. Joseph Malins, of Birmingham, England, Mr. R. Johnson, of London, and Mr. and Mrs. Tom Honeyman, of Edinburgh; Canada by Mr. Benjamin Spence, and the American Society for the Study of Inebriety by Prof. T. D. Crothers, of Hartford, Conn. Addresses were given by Prof. Chas. Scanlon, of Pittsburg (Presbyterian), Rev. S. Parks Cadman, D.D. (Congregational), Rev. W. H. Clark (Free Methodist), Rev. Hervey Wood (Baptist), Mr. Henry Wilbur (Society of Friends),

Rev. E. C. Dinwiddy (Lutheran), Rev. C. H. Mead, D.D., Rev. Dr. A. Alison (National Temperance Society), Rev. Wilbur F. Crafts, and others. Not less than thirty governors of States sent representatives. The addresses are to be published later in book form. Among the addresses made at the Convention were several that held a peculiar historical interest. Rev. George H. Vibbert, D.D., of Springfield, Mass., and other speakers gave reviews of "The Temperance Condition of the World in 1808" and down to the present time, which contained much valuable information. Dr. Charles A. Ingraham of Cambridge, N. Y., told the story of "The Birth of the Temperance Reform at Moreau, N. Y.," a hundred years ago. Mr. Edward H. Emery and the Rev. Israel Lace both spoke of the Christian Civic League of Maine and the part it has played in the great temperance movement in that State. Other prominent topics were "Does Prohibition Prohibit?" by Mr. Hayler of Newcastle, England, "The History of Good Templary" by H. G. Greensmith of Oswego, N. Y., and "Juvenile Temperance Work in Europe." One of the attractive features of the Congress was the International Discussion of the Temperance Question, in which delegates from England, Scotland, Sweden, Germany, Hungary, France, Ireland, Belgium and the United States participated.

THE TRANSFORMATION OF MARGARET

CHAPTER XIV

A New Serial Written for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

By MRS. ELEANOR H. PORTER

Author of "Into Still Waters," etc.

THE big touring car skirted the edge of the town, avoiding as usual the narrow streets, and turning as soon as possible into a wide, elm-bordered avenue.

"We have to climb to reach Belcourt," called Frank over his shoulder, as the car began a steep ascent.

"Then you must have a view as a reward," rejoiced Margaret.

"We do," declared Mrs. Merideth, "but not here," she laughed, as the car plunged into the depths of a miniature forest.

It was a silent drive, in the main. The man in front had the car to guide. The two women in the tonneau dropped an occasional word, but for the most part their lips were motionless, and their eyes were fixed on bird or flower, or on the shifting gleams of sunlight through the trees. The very fact that there was no constraint in this silence argued well for the place the orphan girl had already found in the hearts of her two companions.

Not until the top of the hill was reached, and the car swung around the broad curve of the driveway, did the full beauty of the panorama before her burst on Margaret's eyes. She gave a low cry of delight.

"Oh, how beautiful—how wonderfully, wonderfully beautiful!" she exclaimed.

Her eyes were on the silver sheen of the river trailing along the green velvet of the valley far below—she had turned her back on the red-roofed town with its smoking chimneys.

The sun was just setting when a little later she walked across the lawn to where a rustic seat marked the abrupt descent of the hill. Far below the river turned sharply. On the left it flowed through a canyon of many-windowed walls, and under a pall of smoke. On the right it washed the shore of flowering meadows, and mirrored the sunset sky in its depths.

So absorbed was Margaret in the beauty of the scene that she did not notice the figure of a man coming up the winding path at her left. Even Ned Spencer himself did not see the girl until he was almost upon her. Then he stopped short, his lips breaking into a noiseless "Well!"

A twig snapped under his foot at his next step, and the girl turned.

"Oh, it's you," she said absorbedly. "I couldn't wait. I came right out to see it," she finished, her eyes once more on the valley below. The brothers, at first glance, looked wonderfully alike, and Margaret had unhesitatingly taken Ned to be Frank.

Ned did not speak. He, too, like his sister an hour before, had fallen under the spell of those wondrous blue eyes.

"It seems to me," said the girl, slowly, "that nothing in the world would ever trouble me if I had that to look at."

"It seems so to me, too," agreed Ned; but he was not looking at the view.

The girl turned sharply. She gave a little cry of dismay. The embarrassed red flew to her cheeks.

"Oh, you—you are not Uncle Frank at all," she stammered.

A sudden light of comprehension broke over Ned's face. And so this was Margaret! How stupid of him not to have known at once!

He laughed lightly and made a low bow.

"I have not that honor," he confessed. "But you—you must be Miss Kendall."

"And you?"

"I?" Ned smiled quizzically. "I? Oh, I am—your Uncle Ned!" he announced; and his voice and his emphasis told her that he appreciated his privilege in being twenty-five—and uncle to a niece of twenty-three.

evenings so charming to Frank as now when one might lie back in one's chair or hammock and listen to a dreamy nocturne or a rippling waltz-song, and realize that the musician was no bird of passage, but that she was one's own beloved ward and was even now at home. As for Ned—never were the golf links in so fine a shape, nor the tennis court so alluring; and never had he known before how many really delightful trips there were within a day's run for his motor-car. And yet—

"Della, do you think Margaret is

"I was a brute," said Brandon. "I frightened you"

CHAPTER XV

BY the end of the month the family at Belcourt wondered how they ever lived before they saw the world and everything in it through the blue eyes of Margaret Kendall—the world and everything in it were so much more beautiful now!

Never were the long mornings in the garden or on the veranda so delightful to Mrs. Merideth as now with a bright, sympathetic girl to laugh, chat, or keep silent as the whim of the moment dictated; and never were the long happy?" asked Frank one day, as he and his sister and Ned were watching the sunset from the west veranda. Margaret had gone into the house, pleading a headache as an excuse for leaving them.

Della was silent. It was Ned who answered indignantly:

"Why, Frank, of course she's happy!"

"I'm not so—sure," hesitated Frank.

"Then Mrs. Merideth spoke:"

"She's happy, yes; but she's—restless."

Frank leaned forward.

"That's it exactly," he declared with conviction. "She's restless—and what's the matter? That's what I want to know."

"Nonsense! It's just high spirits," cut in Ned, with an impatient gesture. "Margaret's perfectly happy. Doesn't she laugh and sing and motor and play tennis all day?"

"Yes," retorted his brother, "she does; but behind it all there's a curious something that I can't get at. It is as if she were—were trying to get away from something—something within herself."

Mrs. Merideth nodded her head.

"I know," she said. "I've seen it, too."

"Ah, you have!" Frank turned to his sister with a troubled frown. "Well, what is it?"

"I don't know," Mrs. Merideth paused, her eyes on the distant skyline. "I have thought—once or twice," she resumed slowly, "that she might be—in love."

"In love!" cried two voices in shocked amazement.

Had Mrs. Merideth been observant she might have seen the sudden paling of a smooth-shaven face, and the quick clinching of a strong white hand that rested on the arm of a chair near by; but she was not looking, and she went on quietly:

"Yes, but on the whole I am inclined to doubt that now."

"Oh, you are," laughed Ned a little nervously. His brother did not speak.

"Yes," repeated Mrs. Merideth; "but I haven't decided yet what it is."

"Well, I for one don't believe it's anything," declared Ned, stubbornly. "To me she seems happy, and I believe she is."

Frank shook his head.

"No," he said. "By her own confession she has been flitting from one place to another all over the world; and, though perhaps she does not realize it herself, I believe her coming here was merely another effort on her part to get away from this something—this something that, while within herself, perhaps, is none the less pursuing her, and making her quite restless and unhappy."

"But what can it be?" argued Ned. "She's not so different from other girls—only nicer. She likes good times and pretty clothes, and is always ready for any fun that's going. I'm sure it isn't anything about those socialistic notions that Della used to worry about," he added laughingly. "She's got well over those—if she ever had them, indeed. I don't believe she's looked toward the mills since she's been here—much less wanted to know anything about the people that work in them."

"No, it isn't that," agreed Frank.

"Perhaps it isn't anything," broke in Della, with sudden cheeriness. "Maybe it is a little dull here for her after all her gay friends and interesting travels. Perhaps she is a little homesick, but is trying to make us think everything is all right, and she overdoes it. Anyway, we'll ask some nice people up for a week or two. I fancy we all need livening up. We're getting morbid. Come, whom shall we have?"

A COURSE IN ESPERANTO

LESSON No. 14—By Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

Exercises on Correlative Words

WHERE there is a circle, let each member in turn translate one word, giving the Esperanto form. When a person is studying alone, go through the list without referring to the table in Lesson 12, and check off all that are known; afterwards study the unknown ones by means of the table.

Neniam, tiel, kiel, ie, ĉia, kie, nenie, kiam, ial, iam, ĉies, ĉiu, nenial, kies, kiom, ĉio, ĉiam, kio, tio, iu, io, ĉie, ĉiom, kiu, tiu, iom, tiom, ĉiel, ia, kia, kial, ĉial, iel, ies, nenio, neniu, neniom, ties, tial, nenies, nenia, tia, tiam, tie, neniel.

Mi komprenas iom da tio kion vi volas diri. I understand somewhat of that which you wish to say. Mi ĉiam respondas al via voko. I always respond to your call. Kial vi ploris? Why did you weep? Kian libron vi legis? What kind of a book did you read? Kial vi ne skribis al mi? Why did you not write to me? Ni helpas la infanojn ĉiel. We will help the children in every way. Kiun lingvon vi parolas? Which language do you speak? Kiam vi iros Usonon? When will you go to the United States? Venu al mia hejmo hodiaŭ aŭ morgaŭ. Come to my home today or to-morrow. Ĉu vi metis la ĉapelon ien? Did you put the hat anywhere? Io estis sub la tablo. Something was under the table. Morgaŭ mi vidos ion belegan. To-morrow I will see something magnificent. La vetero estas iom pli varma. The weather is somewhat warmer. Kiajn ĉarmajn personojn mi renkontis! What charming persons I met! Kies plumon vi uzas? Whose pen are you using? Estas tempo por ĉio. There is a time for everything. Nenio estas preta. Nothing is ready. Mi nenion trovis. I found nothing. Tio estas malfacile memori. So much is difficult to remember. Kiom vi scias. As far (much) as you know. Kiom da ĉevaloj vi havas? How many horses have you?

NOTE.—Tio, that (thing); tiu, that one, and sometimes ĉio are followed by the separate word ĉi, "nearest," to express the demonstrative pronoun "this." ĉi is invariable. Tio, that (thing); tio ĉi, this thing; tion ĉi (accusative), this thing; tiu, that one; tiu ĉi, this one; tiuĉi, those; tiuĉi ĉi, these; ĉio ĉi, all this. For example: Vi devus memori tion ĉi. You should remember this. Tiu ĉi ringo estas por vi. This ring is for you. Tio ĉi estas malsaniga. This is unwholesome. Tiu ĉi libroj estas grandaj. These books are large. The adverb tie, there, is also followed by ĉi to denote here. Thus tie, there, tie ĉi, here; tien (accusative), thither; tien ĉi, hither.

Add ajn to interrogative words and get words ending in ever: Kia ajn, Whatever kind of. Kiam ajn, whenever. Kie ajn, wherever. Kiel ajn, however. Kiu ajn, whoever. Kio ajn, whatever. Kiom ajn, however much. Kia ajn frukto, Whatever kind of fruit. Kien ajn mi iras, Wherever I go. Kiel ajn mi parolas, However I speak. Kiu ajn legas la libron, Whoever reads the book. Kiom ajn mi amas, However much I love.

A Walk in the Garden

Promeno en la Ĝardeno.

Kiam vi vizitos la ĝardenon? Kia estas la ĝardeno? Kiaj floroj estas en la ĝardeno? Ĉiaj; rozoj, lilioj, geranioj (geraniums), verbenoj (verbenas), heliotropo, miozotoj (forget-me-nots), diantoj (pinks), dalioj (dahlias), narciso (narcissus), violoj (violets). Kies ĝardeno estas? Kiel ni iros en la ĝardenon? Vi eniros per veturilo (carriage). Ĉu iu montros al ni la belajn florojn? (Ĉu is sign of a question). Jes, mia onklo estis tie. Li estas ĉiam ĝoja vidi siajn amikojn. Li havas bonvenon por ĉiuj. Ĉu la ĝardeno havas ian muron? Jes, ĉu vi deziras scii kiu muro ĝi estas? Ĝi estas konstruita el griza ŝtono. La muro estas kovrita de hedero (ivy). Jen estas aleoj (paths) ĉie en la ĝardeno, randitaj de altaj plektobariloj (hedges) el bukso (box) similaj al tiuj de la ĝardeno ĉe Mount Vernon. Ĉirkaŭe ĉiu bedo havas malaltajn plektobarilojn el bukso. La bedoj estas kurbaj similaj al (curved, similar to) rulpaperoj (scrolls). Nenio kreskas (grows) en la ĝardeno sen zorga (careful) ĝardenlaborado (gardening).

The explanation concerning participles, which was promised for this lesson, is unavoidably crowded out, and will appear in the next lesson.

WIFE WON

Husband Finally Convinced.

Some men are wise enough to try new foods and beverages and then generous enough to give others the benefit of their experience.

A very "conservative" Ills. man, however, let his good wife find out for herself what a blessing Postum is to those who are distressed in many ways, by drinking coffee. The wife writes:

"No slave in chains, it seemed to me, was more helpless than I, a coffee captive. Yet there were innumerable warnings—waking from a troubled sleep with a feeling of suffocation, at times dizzy and out of breath, attacks of palpitation of the heart that frightened me.

"Common sense, reason, and my better judgment told me that coffee drinking was the trouble. At last my nervous system was so disarranged that my physician ordered 'no more coffee.'

"He knew he was right and he knew I knew it, too. I capitulated. Prior to this our family had tried Postum but disliked it, because, as we learned later, it was not made right.

"Determined this time to give Postum a fair trial, I prepared it according to directions on the pkg.—that is, boiled it 15 minutes after boiling commenced, obtaining a dark brown liquid with a rich snappy flavor similar to coffee. When cream and sugar were added, it was not only good, but delicious.

"Noting its beneficial effects in me the rest of the family adopted it—all except my husband, who would not admit that coffee hurt him. Several weeks elapsed during which I drank Postum two or three times a day, when to my surprise my husband said: 'I have decided to drink Postum. Your improvement is so apparent—you have such fine color—that I propose to give credit where credit is due. And now we are coffee-slaves no longer.'

THE TRANSFORMATION OF MARGARET

CHAPTER XVI

IT had been a particularly delightful day with the Belcourt household. They had gone early in the morning to Silver Lake for a picnic. A sail on the lake, a delicious luncheon, and a climb up "Hilltop" had filled every hour with enjoyment until five o'clock, when they had started for home.

Two of the guests had brought their own motor-cars to Belcourt, and it was in one of these that Miss Kendall was making the homeward trip.

"And you call this a 'runabout,' Mr. Brandon?" she laughed gayly, as the huge car darted forward. "I should as soon think of having an elephant for an errand boy."

Brandon laughed.

"But just wait until you see the elephant get over the ground," he retorted. "And, after all, the car isn't so big when you compare it to Frank's and Harlow's. It only seats two, you know, but its engine is quite as powerful as either of theirs. I want you to see what it can do," he finished, as he began gradually to increase their speed.

For some time neither spoke. The road ran straight ahead in a narrowing band of white that lost itself in a thicket of green far in the distance. Yet almost immediately—it seemed to Margaret—the green was at their right and their left, and the road had unwound another white length of ribbon that flung itself across the valley below and up the opposite hill to the skyline.

Houses, trees, barns and bushes rushed by like spectres, and the soft August air swept by her cheeks like a November gale. Not until the opposite hill was reached, however, did Brandon slacken speed.

"You see," he exclaimed, "we can just annihilate space with this!"

"You certainly can," laughed Margaret, a little hysterically. "And you may count yourself lucky if you don't annihilate anything else."

Brandon brought the car almost to a stop.

"I was a brute. I frightened you," he cried with quick contrition.

The girl shook her head. A strange light came to her eyes.

"No; I liked it," she answered. "I liked it—too well. Do you know, I never dare to run a car by myself—very much. I learned, and I run one sometimes. But it came over me one day—the power there was under the turn of my hand. Almost involuntarily I began to let it out. I went faster and faster—and yet I did not go fast enough. Something seemed to be pushing me on, urging me to even greater and greater speed. I wanted to get away—away! Then I came to myself. I was miles from where I should have been, and in a country I knew nothing about. I had no little difficulty in getting back to where I belonged, besides having a fine or two to pay, I believe. I was frightened and ashamed, for everywhere I heard stories of terrified men, women, children and animals, and of how I had narrowly escaped having death itself to answer for as a result of my mad race through the country. And yet—even now—to-day—I felt that wild exhilaration of motion. I did not want to stop. I wanted to go on and on—"

She paused suddenly, and fell back in her seat. "You see," she laughed, with a complete change of manner, "I am not to be trusted as a chauffeur."

"I see," nodded Brandon, a little soberly; then, with a whimsical smile: "Perhaps I should want the brakes shifted to my side of the car if I rode with you! But, after all, when you come right down to the solid comfort of motoring, you can take it best by jogging along like this at a good sensible rate of speed that will let you see something of the country you are passing through. Look at those clouds! We shall have a gorgeous sunset to-night."

It was almost an hour later that Brandon stopped his car where two roads crossed, and looked behind him.

"Where are those people?" he queried.

"But we started first, and we came rapidly for a time," reminded the girl.

"I know, but we've been simply creeping for the last mile or two," returned the man. "I slowed up purposely to fall in behind the rest. I'm not so sure I know the way from here—but perhaps you do."

"Not I!" she laughed. "But I thought you did."

"So did I," he grumbled. "I've been over this road enough in times past. Oh, I can get back to Belcourt all right," he added reassuringly. "It's only that I don't remember which is the best way. One road takes us through the town and is not so pleasant. I wanted to avoid that if possible."

"Never mind; let's go on," proposed the girl. "It's getting late, and we might miss them even if we waited. They may have taken another road farther back. If they thought you knew the way they wouldn't feel in duty bound to keep track of us, and they may have already reached home. I don't mind a bit which road we take."

"All right," acquiesced Brandon. "Just as you say. I think this is the one. Anyhow, we'll try it." And he turned his car to the left.

The sun had dipped behind the hills, and the quick chill of an August evening was in the air. Margaret shivered and reached for her coat. The road wound in and out through a scrubby growth of trees, then turned sharply and skirted the base of a steep hill. Beyond the next turn it dropped in a gentle descent and ran between wide open fields. A house appeared, then another and another. A man and a woman walked along the edge of the road and stopped while the automobile passed. The houses grew more frequent, and children and small dogs scurried across the road to a point of safety.

"I believe we've got the wrong road now," muttered Brandon with a frown. "Shall we go back?"

"No, no," demurred the girl. "What does it matter? It's only another way around, and perhaps no longer than the other."

The road turned and dropped again. The hill was steeper now. The air grew heavy and fanned Margaret's cheek with a warm breath as if from an oven. Unconsciously she loosened the coat at her throat.

"Why, how warm it is!" she exclaimed.

"Yes. I fancy there's no doubt now where we are," frowned Brandon. "I thought as much," he finished, as the car swung around a curve.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S SOCIETIES

Total Abstinence*

IN THESE days of popular education and of widespread agitation for civic betterment and the uplift of the lower classes, it is not surprising that the Temperance Question should have assumed a prominence never before reached in the United States. It is now generally recognized that the liquor traffic is responsible for a very large percentage of the crimes, taxation, poverty and misery that afflict society. This being the case, it becomes the duty of all good citizens to promote temperance. Especially is it the duty of the Christian, by his own self-denial, to give an example of temperance to others.

Anachonis, the philosopher, who lived in an age when intemperance afflicted Greece, was asked by what means a man might best guard against the vice of drunkenness. "By bearing constantly in his view the loathsome, vicious behavior of the intemperate," was the reply. And surely we of this later age do not lack for object-lessons when we look around us and see thousands of promising careers wrecked by drink, courts busied in the trial of crimes inspired by drink, and jails crowded with criminals chiefly the victims of drink.

John Wesley's inflexible attitude toward the drink habit was well known. A friend of his related that on one occasion at dinner Mr. Wesley saw him take a small portion of brandy. The great divine in surprise asked the reason and was told that it was for digestion. "Ah," observed Wesley, "you take a tablespoonful now; that will soon lose its effect and then you will take two; from two you will go to a glass and then to two glasses and so on, till in the end you may become a drunkard." He pleaded with him to stop it altogether, and the friend wisely heeded the plea.

An old man died not long ago in New England who was esteemed as a good citizen. But he had early contracted a fondness for ardent spirits, and drank temperately and daily for the greater part of his life. He gave a little to his children as they grouped around him; and they thought what their father loved must be harmless. But with their growing years a fondness for the stimulus increased, and this aged man lived to mourn the death of half his sons and forty descendants, who went down to the grave drunkards.

It has been said tersely that "the cup kills more than the cannon." Drink's death-roll of victims in the United States is estimated at 100,000 a year! All the wars of all the ages could hardly equal the cumulative slaughter by this monstrous vice.

The late Dr. Talmage emphasized very strongly the duty of parents in preaching total abstinence in the home. "Let your children grow up with an utter aversion to drink," he wrote. "Make it utterly nauseous. Teach them, as faithfully as you do the truths of the Bible, that rum is a fiend. Take them to the almshouse, and show them the wreck and ruin it works. Walk with them into the homes that have been scourged by it. If a drunkard hath fallen into a ditch, take them right up where they can see his face, bruised, savage, and swollen, and say, 'Look, my son. Rum did that!' Looking out of your window at some one who, intoxicated to madness, goes through the street, brandishing his fist, blaspheming God; a howling, defying, shouting, reeling, raving, and foaming maniac, say to your son, 'Look; that man was once a child like you.' As you go by the grog-shop let them know that that is the place where men are slain and their wives made paupers and their children slaves. Hold out to your children all warnings, all rewards, all counsels, lest in after-days they break your heart."

From Doubt to Devotion*

"DOUBT is the vestibule which all must pass before they enter into the temple of truth," wrote Colton. Doubt has its uses in the process of our spiritual development. It is half-conviction. But no good comes of continued doubting, or of brooding over one's sins.

When young Dr. Merle D'Aubigné was a student at Kiel, he was oppressed with doubts, and went to Klenken, an old experienced teacher, for help. The old man refused to answer them, saying, "Were I to rid you of these, others would come. There is a shorter way of destroying them. Let Christ be to you really the Son of God, the Saviour, and his light will dispel the darkness, and his spirit lead you into all truth."

The Rev. Job Throgmorton lived thirty-seven years without any sound assurance as to his spiritual safety. When dying, he addressed the venerable Mr. Dod in the following words: "What will you say of him who is going out of the world and can find no comfort?" "What will you say of Him," replied Mr. Dod, "who when he was going out of the world found no comfort, but cried 'My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?'" This prompt reply administered consolation to the troubled spirit of his friend, who departed rejoicing in the Lord.

Cowper, the poet, speaking of his religious experience, said: "The happy period which was to shake off my fetters, and afford me a clear opening of the free mercy of God in Jesus, arrived at last. I flung myself into a chair near the window, and seeing a Bible there, ventured once more to apply to it for comfort and instruction. The first verse I saw was the 25th of the third of Romans: 'Whom God hath set forth to be a propitiation through faith in his blood, to declare his righteousness for the remission of sins that are past, through the forbearance of God.' Immediately I received strength to believe, and the full beams of the Sun of Righteousness shone upon me. I saw the sufficiency of the atonement he had made and in that moment I believed and received the Gospel."

Nathanael was a sensitive man by nature, with high ideals, and a critical mind. His skepticism was that of a man whose hopes are at war with the hard facts of actual experience. Such a man, hearing of Jesus, though in doubt, was willing to investigate and even to be convinced. Thomas, on the other hand, was less of an idealist and more practical. He relied more upon the evidence of the senses than on spiritual impressions. Yet though slow and taciturn, he was honest and proved loyal when he had once cast doubt to the winds.

The doubts of an earnest man, who is ready honestly to believe when a certain point is reached, are very different from those of one who cultivates his skepticism. Fortunate for him will it be if the light breaks through.

A man had been living without Christ. Illness came—a mortal sickness. Human help brought no relief. He turned in his despair to those kind friends who were trying to lead him to Christ. The way was long, the battle hard; but the light that had been a stranger to him in health, broke in upon him when in his weakness and pain he turned at last to the Saviour for help. He found what he sought; his doubts vanished and he realized the fulness of grace and the strength to endure which comes from a present Redeemer.

The first step beyond and out of our doubts is a step of faith; but we find that instead of being in the dark, we are on firm ground. We can then sing with joyful heart:

On Christ, the solid Rock, I stand;
All other ground is sinking sand.

Nimrod was a mighty hunter, but had he hunted in the "Temagami" region he would have been a mightier one. Nimrod hunted for glory, but Temagami hunters hunt for game. Those Indians who made the first canoe of birch bark long ago, were our greatest benefactors. The children of those Indians know the canoe, and they know how to use it, and if you go to Temagami this summer they will paddle your canoe in their own superb way. They will be the best guides you ever had. Students who camp in summer along the Temagami lakes are able to do two years work in one. Finest of fishing and hunting. BETTER POSITION

And Increased Salary as a Result of Eating Right Food.

There is not only comfort in eating food that nourishes brain and body, but sometimes it helps a lot in increasing one's salary.

A Kans. school teacher tells an interesting experience. She says:

"About two years ago I was extremely miserable from a nervousness that had been coming on for some time. Any sudden noise was actually painful to me and my nights were made miserable by horrible nightmares.

"I was losing flesh all the time and at last was obliged to give up the school I was teaching and go home.

"Mother put me to bed and sent for the doctor. I was so nervous the cotton sheets gave me a chill and they put me in woollens. The medicine I took did me no apparent good. Finally, a neighbor suggested that Grape-Nuts might be good for me to eat. I had never heard of this food, but the name sounded good so I decided to try it.

"I began to eat Grape-Nuts and soon found my reserve energy growing so that in a short time I was filling a better position and drawing a larger salary than I had ever done before.

"As I see little children playing around me and enter into their games, I wonder if I am the same teacher of whom, two years ago the children spoke as 'ugly old thing.'

"Grape-Nuts food with cream has become a regular part of my diet, and I have not been sick a day in the past two years." "There's a Reason."

Our Sunday School Lesson

BY DR. AND MRS. W. F. CRAFTS*

PERSONAL AND CIVIC RIGHTEOUSNESS

"AND Samuel said unto all Israel, Behold, I have hearkened unto your voice." And in so doing he had made a king over them. Saul had been selected for king at Mizpeh, and was afterward crowned at Gilgal. On the occasion of the inauguration of Saul, Samuel lays down his office as civil and military leader of Israel to become their civil and religious judge. In that connection he makes a farewell address, of which the above are the opening words. The occasion has been compared with the time when Washington laid down his rank as Commander-in-Chief of the Army and delivered his farewell address (which is read with ceremony every twenty-second of February in Congress). But that did not close Washington's public life, for he afterward became President of the United States and participated in national affairs for many years. Likewise Samuel did to the end of his days as the priest and prophet of God.

"I have walked before you from my childhood unto this day." Probably not many who had known him as a child were then living, but certainly he was a well-known figure, and revered above any other man in Israel. "Witness against me before the Lord." What a challenge to sound forth! He had a clean life or he would not have dared to do it. Had he taken what did not belong to him? Had he defrauded or oppressed any one? Had he taken a bribe as a judge? If any one could bring a charge against him he promised restitution, but as no claim was made against him, instead, with one voice they said: "Thou hast not defrauded or oppressed us, neither hast thou taken aught of any man's hand." And yet Samuel wanted the matter sealed, and so he said: "The Lord is witness." And the people replied, "He is witness." And the honor of Samuel was unimpeachable.

"And all the people greatly feared the Lord and Samuel," because Samuel had called upon God to send a thunder storm as a sign of his power. What the people needed to realize was the power of God above the power of their king. They needed to see their man king crouch under the power of the God King. Such a storm descended as had discomfited Sisera and his host, "and all the people greatly feared the Lord and Samuel."

"Pray for thy servants unto the Lord thy God that we die not," and then they made confession that they had added to their sins in asking for a king. They saw themselves in the lime-light of God's lightning.

"God forbid that I should sin against the Lord in ceasing to pray for you." He might not still be their leader, but he would be their intercessor. To cease praying for them he considered would be a sin against God. And then he uttered two appeals, if haply he might bring them to the point of faithfully serving their God: first, he tried to stir gratitude in their hearts because of what the Lord had done for them in delivering them from their enemies, and secondly, to arouse their fear of extermination if they and their king did wickedly.

"Only fear the Lord, and serve him in truth with all your heart; for consider how great things he hath done for you."—I. Sam. 12: 24.

Long Life for the Individual

The passage of Scripture chosen for the Golden Text should become a motto for all nations of the earth. The central truth of this lesson is righteousness for individual citizens and for nations. It is only that which can secure long life in either.

Samuel's active and useful old age brings, in midsummer, lessons for life's autumn and springtime, "on bringing forth fruit in old age" (Psa. 92: 14). With which should be associated another text golden with harvest truths, for those in life's springtime especially: "Whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap." Let us then consider: first, how those who are in life's autumn may continue fruitful to the last; and, second, how those who are in life's springtime or summer may insure "the joy of harvest" in old age.

In the early centuries of human history it was as common to live into the second century as it is now to live into the second half century (Gen. 5), suggesting that but for sin, man in his human body might be as immortal on the old earth as he is to be in his resurrection body in the "new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness."

The Psalmist, in days of luxury and dissipation, when men were digging their graves with their teeth, and weaving their shrouds with the swift shuttle of passion, spoke of seventy as the usual limit of life, with fourscore as only undesirable addition of "labor and sorrow." But even to-day, when all of us start in the springtime handicapped with thistle seeds of heredity, the "inbred sin" which science as well as theology proclaims, threescore years and ten is by no means the limit of a well-ordered life or even of its fruitfulness; much less is there any reason in the modern phrase "the dead-line of fifty." Lazy men and women often go to seed long before that; but public and private life both attest by many examples that one may do his best work for the world after fifty. As we have said before, the secret of success in life's second half century is in retaining the hopefulness, enthusiasm and energy of youth, while adding the maturity and wisdom of age—the heart of fire under the locks of snow.

The Horizon of Life

For young and old alike it is important to extend the horizon of possible life. "A short life and a happy one" is a "doctrine of devils." The very sins that shorten life, also sadden and sicken it. Nor is there any healthy virtue in a good man wishing to die before he is called. It is like the "clock watcher" longing for his wages before his day's work is done. Let our motto be "A useful life and a long one." The usefulness will take care of the happiness, while prolonging as well as deepening life. What is the literal "dead-line" in modern life, the line beyond which no modern has ever lived? We read not infrequently of five generations; a hundred or more people gathering to honor the hundredth birthday, or the 102d, 103d or 104th, of a healthy and happy great-grandmother, seldom of a great-grandfather. But that is not the dead line. According to the census, there were in the United States in 1880, 4,016 persons one hundred or more years of age, and 3,981 in 1890-92 in London of the same age. Servian statistics for 1897 give 290 persons from 105 to 115; 123 from 115 to 125; 18 from 125 to 135, and three from 135 to 140. It is said that monks from Mount Athos have lived beyond 150.

And now let the young, most of all, remember that in order to live long we must begin early to live right. There are some wicked old men, whose hoary heads are not a crown of glory, because not found in the way of righteousness. But the rule holds good, despite the exceptions, the wicked shall not live out half their days. It is virtue that bears in one hand "length of days" and in the other "honor and riches." "Self-denial is self-love living for the future." "Whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap." He who sows gluttony and intemperance and envy and hatred and jealousy and ambition will not usually reap a strong life or a long one.

Two Life Harvests

Let us put in contrast two life harvests, one of Talleyrand, who had built up a great outward fame, but not a noble inward character, who said at last when death confronted him: "Behold eighty-three years passed away! What cares, what agitation, what anxieties, what ill-will, what sad complications, and all without results, except great fatigue of mind and body, and a profound sentiment of discouragement with regard to the future, and disgust in regard to the past."

In contrast look at Cornaro, at eighty-three, congratulating himself that in all probability he had a series of years to live in health and spirits and to enjoy this beautiful world, which is indeed beautiful to those that know how to make it so. Even at ninety-five he wrote of himself as "sound and hearty, contented and cheerful." "At this age," he says, "I enjoy at once two lives: One terrestrial, which I possess in fact; the other celestial, which I possess in thought; and this thought is equal to actual enjoyment, when founded on things we are sure to attain, as I am sure to attain that celestial life, through the infinite mercy and goodness of God."

Long Life for the Nation

Let us broadly study the "living and dying nations"—to borrow Lord Salisbury's expressive classification of the quivering map of the world as it now spreads before us in dissolving views. What a time to teach geography and history! Surely no true teacher can fail to teach also the great lessons in civics that throng the map to-day. Lord Salisbury did not need to specify the "dying nations." Every well informed person knew, whatever might be the debatable ground, that he must include in that category Turkey, France and Spain, and perhaps others. And every intelligent reader was bound to admit that the British Empire and the United States belong to the "living nations."

These "living nations," however, have some serious symptoms, and should study the dead and dying nations in order to keep out of their graveyard. With nations once mighty lying before our eyes, we face anew a living problem the old academic question of our college history classes, "Is it necessary that a nation should grow old and weak to die?"

As a matter of fact nations have hardly averaged as long life as the patriarchs, and there are no Methuselahs among them. We are easily deceived by old names on the maps. The "body politic," the government that bears the name to-day, may be but a young namesake of a body politic deceased that once occupied the same territory.

The Graveyard of Nations

Where are the nations of which we read in the Bible and the classics? The world empires of the Egyptians, Hittites, Assyrians, Babylonians, Scythians, Persians, Macedonians, Romans, died in turn. Of all great races of antiquity the only ones that survive are the great prophetic races, the Jews and Arabs, both long ago dead politically, surviving only as subject peoples. Russia claims a thousand years, but they are mostly years of savagery, and the nation has not yet borne the test of civilization and luxury. Japan's Mikado claims an ancestral royal line of six thousand years, but previous to 1868 the Mikados were popes, and the Tycoons, now abolished, were the civil emperors, and therefore as civil ruler the young Mikado is the first of a new series.

Must every nation, then, must our own, grow old and die? Nay, for in the very nature of the case, a nation may be immortal; like a river, its drops ever passing on to the sea, but ever renewed from its mountain springs. If we maintain the Christian morality and popular education, which Washington declared to be the high sources of national prosperity, and keep unbroken on either hand the banks of liberty and law, our nation's life may go on ceaselessly, singing like a river, Men may come and men may go, but I go on forever.

Arise and shine in youth immortal.
Thy light is come, thy king appears;
Beyond the century's swinging portal,
Breaks a new dawn, a thousand years.

But eternal life to a nation can come only through "eternal vigilance." Many who firmly believe nature goes by law act as if history went by luck. As surely as effect follows cause, Babylonian vices will in every age produce a Babylonian fall.

SAUL CHOSEN KING

By Mrs. M. Baxter

BEFORE God gave the children of Israel a king after his own heart, he gave them one after their own hearts, one who in outside things was a man to be proud of. He was the son of Kish, a man of substance or wealth, of the tribe of Benjamin. He himself was in the vigor of youth.

The general council of Israel's elders had passed the resolution that the form of government should be altered, and they should appoint a king, that they might be like the nations. Samuel had yielded up his will to God, and was perfectly ready to resign his post as judge of Israel in favor of a king; he had confidence in God, and believed that He knew best what was right to do, and he could trust the consequences with Him.

By the secret anointing of God and the public election of the people, Saul was chosen king. But another and very important ceremonial had to be observed. Samuel told the people the manner of the kingdom, from Deut. 27: 15-20—a manner of the kingdom which would forbid emulation of the nations round, and self-aggrandisement—and commanded that the king should write out for himself a copy of the law of God, that he might read, learn, and "keep all the words of this law and these statutes to do them." Then Samuel sent the people away, and Saul returned to Gibeah, but not alone: "There went with him men of valor whose hearts God had touched."

God soon gave Saul an opportunity of showing his mettle. Nahash the Ammonite came up and encamped against Jabesh-Gilead, and imposed such humiliating terms on the besieged as only the most imperious and brutal tyrant could have demanded. He would only make a covenant with the inhabitants on condition that he might put out all their right eyes, and lay it for a reproach upon all Israel! The Spirit of God came mightily upon Saul, and he sent forth his first edict as king in a most impressive manner. Taking a yoke of oxen, he cut them in pieces, and sent them into all the coasts of Israel, saying: "Whosoever cometh not forth after Saul and after Samuel, so shall it be done unto his oxen."

The result was that "a terror from the Lord" (R. V. margin) fell upon the people, and they came out as one man." Sending a message of deliverance to the inhabitants of Jabesh-Gilead to allay their suspense, Saul mustered his large army, marched down upon the camp of the Ammonites, and obtained complete victory. This established Saul's military reputation, the people were now unanimous in his favor, and a sentiment of indignation arose against such as had disapproved of his election.

An Evangelistic Visitor

THE Rev. J. Tolefree Parr, one of the foremost evangelists in England, and who has been associated with Gipsy Smith and W. R. Lane in revival work in that country, is about to visit the United States. The Rev. F. B. Meyer writes of him: "Everywhere his ministry has been followed by great blessing. I know him to be a godly, earnest and devoted servant of Christ who is able to attract and sway large audiences. He has identified himself with all the great movements of our time which have made for liberty, sobriety and purity."

Rev. Dr. Campbell-Morgan writes: "He is a capital preacher, a strong and reliable man and a Bible teacher of great ability. He has done splendid work in England and Africa."

Evangelist Parr is a man in the prime of life, and is the son of a Primitive Methodist minister. His fame as a preacher is known throughout Great Britain, and in hundreds of towns and villages he has conducted successful meetings and led multitudes to Christ. His eight years of Gospel work in some of the darkest districts of London, however, is his most remarkable achievement, although he has made a splendid record in provincial towns. He is one of the best known missionaries of the National Free Church Federation in England. While in this country, he will preach in the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church, New York, and also in leading churches in Boston, Cincinnati, and other cities.

An inquiry by mail for "the truth about it," addressed to the Industrial Savings and Loan Co., see page 561, will bring you valuable and trustworthy information about the safe investment of your savings.

The Leading Features and Departments of The Housewife:

Fancy Work Department

The most desirable of the new, with the best of the old ideas and designs, will as usual be described and illustrated in this department, such as Art Needlework, Crochet, Knitting, Lace, and other Home Arts requiring the use of needles and hooks, and the department will supply valuable ideas for those who have time to spare and wish to use it to add to their personal or home decorations. The very latest fancy work conceits will be found in this department every month.

The Home Nook

This is the most practical of our departments and any and all subjects pertaining to the welfare of the household will be treated clearly and in season. Our editors are always seeking information, based upon actual experiences, which will lighten the labors of the housewife and aid her in her daily duties. Our readers may look with confidence to this department for suggestions and advice on the various phases of home life that will aid most in the making of a cheery, happy, well-ordered home.

Kitchen Department

Whether a subscriber lives on the coast of Maine or on the plains of Arizona, she will always find something good in this department, without spending half her income or hunting the world over for ingredients. We are firm believers in the Simple Life when it comes to cookery, and while something elaborate may be desirable occasionally, we are planning so that our readers may not have to spend any more time in the kitchen than is necessary for the preparation of good wholesome food.

Late Fashions

We are frequently told that our Fashions are the most satisfactory shown in any popular household journal, and we strive persistently for improvement.

We aim to show good taste as well as good sense in our patterns and illustrations, and they are always sensible, seasonable and never extravagant. The reputation of New York women for correct dress is world-wide, and our patterns show the Latest and Best in New York Styles.

The Mother's Hour

This department will continue in its helpful mission and we shall keep in mind the moral and spiritual as well as the physical needs of both mothers and children in selecting the matter for it. Many new writers have been secured and we shall retain the former ones, who are already familiar to our readers. The Mother's Hour is a dependable feature of THE HOUSEWIFE and many look for it eagerly every month.

Editorial Outlook

Our editor touches life at many points, and in the coming year he will try more than ever to make his little monthly "Sermons" timely, cheerful and to the point. With the inspiration that naturally comes from a rapidly increasing audience, you may expect some very enjoyable talks in this particular corner, and we feel very sure that he will do his utmost to retain the warm regard of our millions of readers.

The Social Circle

This feature of THE HOUSEWIFE, which is so much thought of by our readers, will continue under the capable direction of Miss Blake, and she is always glad to find room for the letters from those who have something to say and know how to say it so as to confer the greatest good to the greatest number.

The letters printed in The Social Circle are, as one subscriber expresses it, "as good as a visit from a friend."

WHAT SUBSCRIBERS SAY OF THE HOUSEWIFE:

"Every one is pleased with THE HOUSEWIFE. I like it better than some of the higher priced papers."

"I consider the Editorial Outlook worth the whole year's subscription. It was an inspiration and the whole magazine is elevating and uplifting. Whatever your subscription list numbers, it should certainly be doubled."

"You certainly publish one of the best magazines going. I take and exchange with my neighbors, so I have the reading of more than a dozen, and yours compares favorably with the best of them."

"Your editorials are the best I have ever read; they have been helpful to me and I read them often in our Mothers' Meeting."

"While I am renewing my subscription I can't but speak a word of praise for our dear, good paper. I did think once I would not take it this year, but when the time came for it to come and I had waited, it just seemed as if a friend had disappointed me. I want to thank you and dear Hilda Richmond for the Little Lessons they alone are really worth the price of the paper."

"It is an interesting paper: the editorials are uncommonly fine, calculated to do great good, and the stories are always practical and helpful."

"We have been readers, lovers and appreciators of THE HOUSEWIFE for years. In these days of yellow-deep yellow-cheap publications, words would not express our gratitude for the work of the editor of THE HOUSEWIFE."

"I have received THE HOUSEWIFE and think it is just splendid. It is full of the very best reading, and the Editorial Outlook especially struck me as the finest thing I have read lately. We have mothers right around us that ought to read that editorial."

"Please accept my praise for the 1907 numbers of your magazine. I think it is one of the most entertaining monthly papers that I have ever come across, and within the reach of everybody. It has more stories in it than many of the ten and fifteen-cent papers. You have so many lovely short stories that THE HOUSEWIFE is one of the most welcome visitors that come to our house."

Questions and Answers

Old Subscriber, Kingston, N.Y. How many electoral votes are necessary for a choice this year?

On the apportionment of 1900 it will be necessary to have 242. New York comes first with thirty-nine electoral votes, Pennsylvania second with thirty-four, and Illinois third with twenty-seven.

Subscriber, Lexington, Ky. Referring to I. Chronicles 21, wherein consisted the sin of David's numbering the people, that it was imputed to him as a great sin?

David's act was presumptuous, as though he doubted God's promise to multiply Israel and wanted to satisfy himself. In Moses' time, there was an approved reason for the census. The people were summoned for the express purpose of the tax for the sanctuary, and the money thus collected was consecrated. David's act was one of pride, to learn just how many warriors he had at command to levy a tax for the support of the royal establishment. This last was regarded as an unwelcome innovation and an oppressive exaction. David had forgotten the express command given to Moses (see Exodus, 30: 12-16). He repented and tried to stop it, but he was too late. The punishment that followed took off 70,000 of the best and bravest of David's men.

W. A., St. Louis, Mo. What is the best way to avoid overheating in midsummer and to treat those who are unduly susceptible to the heat?

The best safeguards are moderate diet with little meat, avoidance of alcohol, use of light clothing and care to avoid too much exposure to the sun. The New York Medical Journal advises that the slightest indication of heat exhaustion (headache, vertigo, and faintness) should be heeded and the sufferer removed to a cool, shaded room. For mild cases a glass of water with a few drops of aromatic spirits of ammonia will suffice; but where the indications are pronounced a physician should be called at once.

R. W., Richmond, Va. 1. Who was the first secretary of agriculture, the first secretary of war, the first postmaster-general and the first attorney-general? 2. When was the office of secretary of commerce and labor established?

1. Norman J. Colman, of Missouri, was first secretary of agriculture; first secretary of war was Gen. Henry Knox, of Massachusetts; the first postmaster-general was Samuel Osgood, of Massachusetts; the first attorney-general was Edmund Randolph, of Virginia. 2. In 1903.

F. S. W., Union City, Mich. Who was the first person to take the name of God in vain?

There is no record anywhere to show who was the pioneer in this particular sin. As we find it specially mentioned in the Decalogue, however, we may reasonably assume that it was prevalent among the Egyptians and no doubt among still earlier nations.

Mazie W. D., Dayton, O. What is the highest skyscraper in New York at the present time?

The Metropolitan building, which is slightly over 657 feet in height, but the new Equitable Life building as planned will be much higher. The structure will stand 900 feet above the curb and will have a flag-staff the peak of which will be 1,059 feet high from the sidewalk. The Eiffel Tower in Paris, 984 feet above ground, will still be the highest known building.

F. C. V., Fort Worth, Tex. Did Christ promise to forgive us if we did not first forgive our enemies?

See Matt. 5: 23-26; Matt. 18: 35; Mark, 11: 25; Luke, 6: 38; Eph. 4: 32. Also the "forgive us" in the Lord's Prayer.

M. E. K., Iowa. I am a Christian mother with a family, and a husband who is not a Christian and does not care to have prayer. Is it right that I should pray alone, without teaching my children to pray? I teach them their Sunday School lessons and the Bible.

Where parents differ radically in matters of faith, perplexing questions are bound to arise. As a Christian mother, it is your right and privilege, as well as your duty, to teach your happiness and future destiny of the whole nation. It is said that he is seldom permitted to reach mature age, the Buddhist priests preferring an infant ruler with whom they can do what they please.

Reader, Yardley, Pa. Please state the difference between local option and prohibition.

Local option is the privilege granted to a county or town to prohibit the sale of alcoholic liquors within its limits. Prohibition is the forbidding by legislative enactment of the manufacture and sale of alcoholic liquors for use as a beverage.

M. S. L., Dunnegan, Mo. 1. "There is none that doeth good, no, not one" (Psalm 53: 3). Does that mean there were no good people at that time? 2. How could Elijah kill four hundred prophets and why did Ahab let Elijah kill his prophets? (I. Kings 18: 40.)

1. The psalm is one that deals with man's spiritual malady or sickness. It describes the condition of the sceptic, estant churches, it is employed as a title of veneration; in the Catholic Church, it is a title conferred by formal canonization.

M. McL., Bennettsville, S. C. Were the disciples converted before the day of Pentecost? If so what did they receive on that day? Was it not a second blessing, separate and distinct from the blessing of regeneration?

Yes, they were converted before, and Pentecost was the occasion on which the Holy Spirit descended, as Jesus had promised. These converts, to whom this promise was specially made and faithfully kept, were the first fruits of the Spirit. The Pentecostal effusion, which was sent expressly to them, was the seal set upon their ministry. It was an endowment distinct from and in addition to the work of regeneration.

Mr. W. M. Cumming, of Wilmington, N. C., writes:

Your last issue contained a very interesting article on the Prohibition election in North Carolina. The largest city in the State did not go "wet," for Charlotte, not Wilmington, is the largest city and Charlotte voted "dry." Greensboro claims to rank second and it voted "dry." Wilmington (whether second or third) went "wet," but by a majority of only 139 and this was a Prohibition victory when you consider that there are sixty-three saloons here and eliminating the saloonkeepers and the bartenders, directly engaged in the trade, the majority was on the other side. More than to any other one man, the credit of the victory is due to Governor Glenn, who is a most ardent Prohibitionist and has been for twenty-seven years, and he has devoted most of his time for months to the cause of State Prohibition. He is an elder in the Presbyterian Church and a teacher in the Sunday School. He is foremost in every good work.

THE DEAD SEA IN MINIATURE AT CHAUTAUQUA

NEAR the water's edge of Lake Chautauqua on the grounds of the New York Chautauqua Assembly, is an interesting facsimile of the Dead Sea, the River Jordan and the cities of the Holy Land. Among the miniature hills and mountains on both sides of these bodies of water, the cities are represented by metal monuments. Lake Chautauqua itself represents the Mediterranean. Often on Sundays, in the early evening, someone who has visited the Holy Land will give an hour's talk to those who gather about him, and as he talks will point out the different cities on the miniature model. The model is perhaps 300 feet long. In the photograph the children at Chautauqua may be seen sailing the toy boats in the waters of the Dead Sea.

Reader, Detroit, Mich. Are there not two Lamas in Tibet? What are their relative powers and positions?

Yes, the Dalai Lama or "Glorious King," and the Tashi Lama, or "Glorious Teacher." The present is the thirteenth Dalai Lama. He is the nominal ruler of Tibet and held to be a reincarnation of Buddha. The real ruler, however, is the Regent, who is chosen from the four great Tibetan monasteries. The Dalai is credited with absolute control of the present the ungodly, the seekers after worldly pleasures. In no sense can it be construed to include God's faithful people in the general denunciation. The object is to make sinners reflect and turn again to the Lord. 2. These false prophets were knowingly leading the King and people into idolatry. They had impiously accepted the test by which their strange gods must stand or fall. They were slain by the people at the order of Elijah (see Josephus' Antiquities and I. Kings, 18: 40).

L. M. V., Long Beach, Calif. Whence comes the authority for saying "St. John," "St. Mark," etc?

TREASURE-SEEKING IN VENEZUELA

Missionary Bach Writes of the Search for Hidden Riches, and of the Mission Boat, "Heraldo Cristiano"

IN WHATEVER country we may be, we constantly meet seekers for treasures and riches; but what are treasures and riches to one may not be so to another. It is not everybody that considers gold as the best treasure, and we praise God for that! It is not only man that seeks for treasures, but also God our heavenly Father; and a day shall come when he shall gather his "jewels" from all parts of the world. We are glad to say that it includes Venezuela also. We have had the joy to receive good news through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD from many parts of the world where the Lord's servants are seeking for "treasures of darkness and hidden riches;" and it may interest some of its readers to hear some from Venezuela.

Two years ago last April we came to Maracaibo, the most fanatical city in Venezuela and possibly in the whole of South America. As we were the first Protestant missionaries to begin evangelical work here, we have had to face many difficulties during these two years. The priests have done all in their power to drive us out of the city; they have forbidden the people to sell us food, and strictly forbidden the owners of houses to rent to us. Our lives have often been in danger; we have been threatened with knives, revolvers and bombs; we have been pelted with stones; but we have not thrown them after people again. No, we are gathering them for the building of a church; so we hope some day to be able to thank them for the good material which they have given us.

A little less than a year ago, we started regular meetings, and after the first opposition they have been well attended. The people love to hear the Gospel.

As the field is so extensive and we have no colporteur, we must at times leave the station and go out to do the work of a Bible colporteur ourselves. A few months ago, the writer made a trip to the interior. A small sailing-boat took me across the Lake of Maracaibo. During the day here we feel the sun intensely hot, and on these small boats there is no place to rest during the long hours of the night. The following day, I saw what I took to be the smoke from a steamer, and I asked the captain where the steamer came from. He answered: "It is no steamer; it is mosquitoes." Soon we could hardly breathe for the mosquitoes.

We came to San Timoteo. All the houses are built on poles which stand in the water. Roofs and walls are made of palm leaves, and the floors are also made of poles covered with palm leaves. I sold many Bibles and Testaments there. It was my purpose to visit places where they never have had the chance to get the Bible.

A few weeks ago, we finished the work on a mission-boat. On the coast of the Lake of Maracaibo we have about eighty villages, which we can only reach by boat. We soon saw the need of a mission-boat, and we laid the matter before the Lord and some of our friends in America. We did not get sufficient money to buy the boat finished; but we got so much that we could buy the material for it, and the Red D Line of Steamships in New York brought it down free of charge. My fellow-worker, Mr. Christiansen, took part in the building of the boat. We put in a four-horse power engine, and it has also sails, which we use in favorable winds. We succeeded very well in the building of it. We got it tight and it sails well. The name of the mission-boat is Heraldo Cristiano ("Christian Herald"). It has already made two successful trips. A short time ago we had the joy of baptizing of a young man who has dedicated his life to the boat mission work. Our Master went in a boat to the country of the Gadarenes, to find "hidden treasures" there; so we thank him for our mission-boat.

It is now seven months since we started a little monthly paper called La Estrella de la Mañana (The Morning-Star). We had with us when we came a small printing-press and some type, and we soon started to print tracts and last year we published a little book of about ninety pages. We bought more type, and then we began to publish the paper. We are doing the printing ourselves, and it has been a wonderful help in spreading the Gospel. We constantly receive new subscribers. We are planning to publish it twice a month and make it larger; but we will be in need of a larger printing-press, which will cost us about $500; but we believe the Lord will send us in due time what we need. Many doors have been closed for us; but the printed pages have entered them. We ask your readers to pray for us, so that we may have strength to do our work.

INCREASE OUR FAITH

TEXT — Luke 17: 5, 6

"And the apostles said unto the Lord, Increase our faith"

THIS simple request of the apostles, taking up only a line on the page, is pregnant with mighty issues. The prayer of these men, though so very brief and slipped into the narrative so unobtrusively, is like a cup of water caught in a horse track; though small it reveals limitless heights because it mirrors the vast, skyey expanse of the soul. We feel very close akin to these men as they look into the face of Jesus and lay bare their hearts, because they make the request we are forced to make every day of our lives, "Lord, increase our faith." We will do these men gross injustice if we say that they had no occasion for questioning or open unbelief. The fact that they had the visible person of Christ to compel belief does not lessen their difficulty in the least. They are brothers with us in a common struggle, a struggle that is as old as the human race, the ascent up to the high level where the life of the spirit becomes a reality. That was their conflict. It is ours also. Whether Jesus is present in person or spirit matters not.

The Jews and the Messiah

Their faith was constantly being put to the severest tests. No men were ever more severely tempted to disbelieve. They were Jews by the untainted blood of two thousand years; Jews by training and instinct, and the most intense and strict Jews because of the prejudice of their class. The traditional errors of their history, the glory of their people, were stained through and through them. The material conception of the Messiah was inwoven into their history as a thing inseparable from life. And now that the Wonderful Counselor had come they were impelled by the charm of his irresistible love to follow. Of course they could not understand all that Jesus meant when he said, "Follow me." These plain peasants had all the narrowness and tenacity of prejudice common to men of like occupation to-day. Tradition received the unquestioned homage of the law.

Our sympathy for them is aroused as we follow them through those memorable years. Every day they had to meet and accept things new and strange and, to them, incredible. They felt the old foundations breaking up and sinking beneath their feet. They saw the old familiar horizons vanishing before the broader sky line of Jesus' vision. Before their eyes were being unveiled insuperable heights that they had never thought possible to life. The horrible depths of men's depravity were being laid bare with rigid fidelity. Human values that had not fluctuated by so much as a degree in centuries were undergoing radical change. The relative value of money and honor and pomp and salutation in the market place was shriveling up under the searching lime-light of the enhanced value of the spirit. Old racial customs were being put at naught. The fatal inconsistencies of the national leaders were beginning to glare. Beyond all of this strain upon their confidence Jesus was saying calmly, "Love your enemies," "The Son of Man is Lord also of the Sabbath." Had they been deceived after all? Was this in truth the Messiah?

The Great Deliverer

In such experiences as these the fearful struggle began which finally resulted in the anxious request, "Lord, increase our faith." But more startling revelations were to follow. The terms, "Other sheep," "All the world," were frequently thrust into his public discourses. What could this mean? Such teaching was stupefying to a Jew. No such ideas ever entered his head. The world had no place in his plans. Jesus' words left no doubt. The Gentile dogs were objects of his sympathy also. Every day their strained vision had to embrace unheard-of truth, miraculous and revolutionary. In the midst of all of this, with quickening, bewildering rapidity, Jesus was declaring, "My kingdom is not of this world." He was telling them with solemn earnestness that he must be betrayed and crucified after the manner of Roman criminals. They were hearing him condemn the sword as a weapon of conquest. They were witnessing him reject the crown as the sign of his kingship and rightful authority. The bias of a life-time changed in an hour! Were men ever so sorely tempted to disbelieve? The belief that the Messiah, when he came, would restore the Temple to its former glory; that he would literally restore the kingdom of David; that he would bring vengeance upon the enemies of Israel and that he would gather the dispersed together from every corner of the earth, were fixed in the Jewish mind as questions beyond dispute.

Now, here was the great Deliverer, upon whom their dearest hopes were set, in whose kingdom they were planning to have seats of authority, talking of failure and betrayal and death; talking of a kingdom not of this world, and even talking with a Samaritan woman of ill repute and eating with publicans and sinners! With bated breath they witnessed the gathering storm of hatred against this Messiah whose cause they had espoused. The heavens and earth were swept clear. Not a landmark remained to point them back to the old life.

Held between a great, strange love and incredulity, how natural the cry, "Lord, increase our faith." They had reached a perilous place in their attitude to Jesus. They must now renounce him altogether or go in with him heart and soul with a faith that should stop at no danger, not even the terrors of martyrdom. They could not turn back. "Lord," they were saying, "to whom shall we go? Thou hast the words of life. Help us to believe in thee what we can not understand."

What Jesus Demands

Men, how the experiences of these Jews touch the quick of your life and mine! We, too, met Jesus in the cloddy highway of life and felt the constraining power of his love. When he called us we left all, or what we wished to believe was all, to follow him. We set out with over-confidence and the enthusiasm of a zealot. But we had no more than crossed the border line into the new life than our confidence began to weaken into doubt and our doubt in turn to give way to consternation. Like Peter and Thomas and the others, we had not counted all of the cost. Now we are at the parting of the ways where the great conflict begins. We, too, cry for faith to sustain us when sight and reason can not penetrate the mystery of the new life into which Christ has led us. We, too, are held between love and incredulity, not daring to turn back and trembling to go on. It is a crisis with us. There is no alternate course. We must forsake Jesus openly and above board or go in with him heart and soul, for life or death.

Consider the demands which Jesus makes upon us: We came, it may be, thinking that the programme of Jesus, while perfect in its adaptability to the needs of life, was too radical and revolutionary to be accepted as a practical life code. When one with a great vision declared that the question, "What would Jesus do?" should be indorsed as the standard for social and commercial conduct we recoiled and anxiously scrutinized our hearts to know whether it really meant that after all. Some of us even dared to assert that we did not believe that it was possible or necessary to do as Jesus would do or that it was intended that his teaching should be taken literally. In other words, we dodged the issue. . . . One of two things is sure. Jesus is either a myth or a fact. If Jesus is a fact his teaching is a fact. If his teaching is a fact his moral code must be accepted literally or not at all. The road stretches out before us broad and straight. Our hands are upon the plow. We will have to stay by Jesus and revolutionize our business. "Lord, increase our faith."

The Lure of the World

When Jesus passed us on the Jericho road and found us blind and ragged by the way, we leaped up and with wild joy hurried along with the crowd, confident in our strength to go with him all the way. Now, before his vision of holiness there comes over us a sickening sense of inborn pollution. Foul spectres haunt the dark abysses of our souls. The lure of the senses is so intoxicating and the swinish appeal of lust is so overpowering. The goal is so far away and so high up and the ascent is so steep and perilous. The light is so blinding and we are so weak and faint. Oh, does Jesus demand so much of us frail, bat-like things! Does he? Is it possible to us, this severe ideal of purity? Is it? "Lord, increase our faith."

When we closed with Jesus in a last serious talk with him and heard his request that we go to men who were in the slime of horrible sin we obeyed joyfully in the belief that all men must certainly be moved by such a marvelous story; that all must be quickly transformed under the spell of his companionship. Years have now passed. We have preached and taught and pleaded with men, but their ears are so dull of hearing, their lives are so slow and clotted like that they are not moved by a recital of Jesus' love and pain. They even turn away with disgust and with jests upon their lips, and the few who have taken his name upon them are but weaklings and hirelings. They are carnal and covetous and lukewarm and many times are cruelly selfish. Our faith in the rich goodness of men, in their possible goodness even, is strained to the point of breaking. It takes so much love and patience and loving kindness to bear with our brothers and labor with them in peace and joy in the common cause. The church moves on at a snail's pace. So many take offense so easily. So many turn back to go no more with thee—"Lord, increase our faith!"

The World's Standard

We have come to Christ with our table of weights and measures, saturated with a base sense of the abnormal worth of human values. We have come thus to weigh and test God to determine whether his service is worth the while. Dollars, houses, lands, jewels, clothes, equipage and all the sensual things that follow in the wake of these seem so real and tangible. All of our life before has been estimated in terms of these values. Now Jesus is telling us that this is all false and wrong and must be put away from us utterly. Like the rich young ruler, we have come running and kneeling to Jesus with lives of rigid morality wrapped about a cankered selfishness, asking what proper thing, what easy, comfortable thing, we may do to inherit eternal life. Flushed with enthusiasm, we come clanging our scale pans to actually weigh God by the jungle standard of the world.

And now we are startled and amazed by the truth that everything must serve and pay homage to the life of the spirit; that life must stand or fall by its eternal values. The spirit! What is all of this talk about the life of the spirit? Are we dead certain that there is such a thing? At the very best it is vague and indefinite and unreal and invisible. Now we are hearing that this invisible life is the real life; that all things, if need be, must be given up for its sake; that we must conquer selfishness, master our covetousness, strangle our base desires and forsake our old weights and measures all for an unseen life of the spirit! How many men of mastery have turned back at this hard saying of Jesus! We feel, deep down, that Jesus is right. There is no skulking around the issue. Every voice of the inner life bears proof of it. Oh, the fierce, mortal conflict in the souls of strong men who have to face this reality! Oh, the struggle and travail and faith it takes to make an unseen thing real and priceless, to make it a ruling passion in conduct! "Lord, increase our faith."

"Ye Must be Born Again"

But we are swept on into another crisis where we are impelled by Jesus' love and waver at his commands. Our little horizon of self-righteousness and self-love, described about our feet, is shattered into a thousand fragments. No sooner do we build a new wall outside the ruins of the old than an out-circling wave of larger love lays it low and inundates all of the region beyond. Sloth, smug self-satisfaction, pinched giving, niggardly serving are all carried away. Like Nicodemus, we come with many secret reservations to the house-roof to look upon the great Nazarene bathed in the mellow moonlight. We open the conversation with evasive compliments. But Jesus is wearied with this kind of talk. He breaks in abruptly, "You must be born again." And it means just this: To pass forever out of the dark womb of selfishness into a limitless region of ceaseless growth. There can be no limit to the sacrifice, no measure for the loving, no base ease for the body, no cushions for the feet, no hugging up to ourselves of the old sensual pleasures, no forgetting for a moment of the crying of that outlying world for the bread we have to give. We can never again lazily paddle among the flats and shallows of vanity and forgetfulness of God. But caught up and swept out upon the deep sea of an

MR. CLEVELAND LAID AT REST

THE BURIAL OF EX-PRESIDENT CLEVELAND IN THE PRINCETON CEMETERY

IMPRESSIVE from its very simplicity was the burial given the remains of ex-President Cleveland from his home at Princeton, N. J. A few companies of State troops were present to line the streets. The President and many statesmen came to do honor to the late President's memory and the people of Princeton gathered silently near the gates of Westland where Mr. Cleveland had spent his last years in dignified retirement, but there was none of the pomp we associate with the funeral of the historic dead.

It had been Mr. Cleveland's wish that he be buried without ostentatious display, and though his fellow townsmen and his countrymen at large would have gladly accorded his memory every ceremonial honor within their power, they followed, in so far as was possible, the desires of the former President. Mrs. Cleveland wished the services to be strictly private and only invited to the house those who had been intimately associated with her late husband either in his political or private life. The President of the United States came on a special train from Oyster Bay and arrived shortly before five in the afternoon, the hour set for the funeral. Preceding him by a few minutes there had come half a dozen members of Mr. Cleveland's two cabinets, and there were also present several members of Mr. Roosevelt's cabinet, the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States and others of historic place and name. These assembled in the large library of Westland, while the body of the dead President lay in the reception room on the other side of the spacious hall. About the casket was grouped the bereaved family: Mrs. Cleveland, who could with difficulty conceal her emotion, her eldest daughter and eldest son, a sister and nephew. With them were President Roosevelt and Dr. Bryant, the family physician. Between this group and the door leading to the hall stood four clergymen of the Presbyterian Church, of which Mr. Cleveland's father had been a minister and he a member. As the bells struck five, one of the clergymen stepped forward and read the opening lines of the funeral service; prayer was offered, followed by the reading of a psalm by another of the group. A second psalm was read by a third clergyman and Rev. Dr. Henry Van Dyke read part of Wordsworth's poem, "The Happy Warrior."

President Roosevelt, as the head of the nation and also as a friend of Mr. Cleveland, rose and in a quiet voice, which yet carried clearly to all the rooms in which the mourning friends were assembled, paid a brief tribute to Mr. Cleveland's character and achievements. It was too brief to be ranked as a eulogy, yet it was fully as impressive as any long and carefully prepared address. Its straightforward truth and sincerity touched all hearts and there were few who were not greatly moved. A few words of prayer closed the service at the house and then all moved slowly from the open hallway to the line of twenty-six carriages that were waiting to carry them to the cemetery. The cortege wound down the curved drive to the entrance gate of Westland, and then out through historic Bayard Lane, which was often traversed by Washington when his headquarters were at Nassau Hall. Hundreds of people lined the walks, the men removing their hats and the women bowing their heads as the coffin passed. There was not a whisper from the multitude; only the rumble of the carriage wheels broke the hushed stillness. Then the bell on old Nassau Hall began to toll, sending its solemn peal far out over the Gothic towers of Princeton. It was about three quarters of a mile to the cemetery. The carriages moved slowly, the pall-bearers walking on either side of the hearse. It was nearly six o'clock when the procession moved through the cemetery gates. The four clergymen left their carriages and moved to the open grave, followed by Mayor McClellan of New York, and the other pall-bearers.

Beautiful floral pieces were placed about the grave. Just at one side was the grave of Mr. Cleveland's little daughter Ruth. The sun was just going down and suffusing the landscape with its yellow summer light as Dr. William H. Richards began to read the committal service. As the benediction was pronounced Mrs. Cleveland was overcome with emotion. As friends urged her gently toward her carriage she turned once more to look at the grave of her husband. The mourners entered their carriages and the last group of watchers dispersed.

eternal love and driven by the winds of a holy passion that shall never calm, the shore line receding, leveling our eyes upon the sky line beyond, taking leave forever of the old life with its evil deeds, stricken with fear at the voyage ahead but determined to sail on, we send up the cry, "Lord, increase our faith."

In the old life, shielded from the pain of deep sympathy with suffering humanity, ignorant of the world's need and blind to its awful mystery of human wrong and affliction, we came to confess our faith in a God of measureless love. Till now no adversity or sickness or grief has overtaken us. In the past we grew unconsciously to feel that our freedom from these calamities was an expression of God's love. And now pain grips us with its needle fingers and haggard misery crouches by the door. Our dearest life purpose crumbles like ashes in our hand. Thus crushed and baffled we recoil from God and with anger and rebellion ask bitterly if this be his love. We are face to face with the problem that has palsied humanity from the days of Job till now. We are trying to reconcile the goodness of God with human misery. The trouble is that we have been living under a delusion and have been expecting God to shield us from something he has never promised to shield us from. If he did not keep Jesus from the tree how can he keep us from the anguish to which life is heir?

I have spoken thus far of the trials of faith which besiege the individual life. There is a greater problem which lies outside of and includes all of these lesser ones. I lay stress now upon our proneness to question with grave doubt the power of the Church to transform the earth. We lose everything and gain nothing by refusing to look at the truth. The appalling fact of human depravity surrounds us upon every hand; the ghastly crop of suicides and butcheries; the whirl of tainted pleasures, the cruelty, the apostasy and the oncoming storm of actual revolution all gather upon the horizon with menacing blackness. One steady look in this direction drives us to hopeless despair. The church seems to be winning out in small detachments and insignificant skirmishes. But how about the general engagement? Merciful God, what if we were losing ground! What if the repulsed army of Jehovah were on the retreat! What if thousands were only attempting to save a few men out of the wreck with no hope of saving the wreck itself! What if the rich were rotting in their palaces and the poor were rotting in their tenements! What if the bitter cry of two million little children were unheeded! What if the vandal hordes in our great cities threatened our civilization with paganism! What if human ghouls sucked in the gain of the earth and left the people faint for bread! What if marriage were a farce and morality a coarse jest! What if men and women just used the church for a social convenience to keep up a semblance of respectability! What if all this were terribly true! "Lord, increase our faith." All of the faith that our hearts will hold we must have now in these fearful times.

Now the way of gathering a mighty faith and an invincible optimism is all very plain. There is a law by which the mustard seed will triumph over the mountain. This is our victory. We must ask for it, but we have got to do one thing more for a triumphant faith. We have got to stop making Jesus Christ a vapor-fingered myth and make his teaching and life a fact. We have got to stop dodging a literal application of his teaching to these open sores of the world just because his teaching is so revolutionary. Make Jesus a fact, I say; a literal, impelling fact in everyday life, in commerce, industry, and statecraft. Only as we do this will we beat back the wave of midnight that threatens to engulf the earth. Only as we shall plunge headlong and heartful into the long purposes of God; only as we shall come by intense devotion into the secret of Jesus' control over men will we come into possession of that working, all-conquering faith which will bring the kingdom of God upon earth.

The "Glorious Fourth" at Mont-Lawn

A BEAUTIFUL CELEBRATION OF THE DAY AT OUR CHILDREN'S HOME

MONT-LAWN never looked more gay or attractive than on the Fourth of July this year. Bright and early, before the little folks were awakened from their slumbers in the big airy dormitories, "Old Glory" was set flying from the great flag pole, to greet the rising sun as he lighted up the tops of the Westchester Hills and gilded the placid waters of the Hudson.

Matron and helpers were early astir, for it was to be a day with a double celebration. When the 325 youngsters arose from their cots they were full of eagerness, for the Fourth means much to every American boy and girl, poor as well as rich. After breakfast, the morning hours were spent in harmless frolic.

Early in the forenoon the visitors began to arrive, Dr. Klopsch being among the first comers as he always is on the Fourth. Soon there came a stream of guests, by rail and boat from New York and other cities, and visiting neighbors poured in from Nyack and the surrounding villages by stages and other vehicles. All were cordially greeted by Matron Hopkins and her corps of assistants. A brass band of fourteen pieces played at frequent intervals throughout the day, from sunrise to sunset.

At noon, dinner was served to the children who are guests at Mont-Lawn, and the visitors were greatly interested in the fine order and excellent behavior of the little folks, as they assembled at the signal of the matron and marched to the great open-air dining room. The dining-hall has been considerably improved since last season, by a rearrangement of tables, permitting of the seating of nearly a hundred extra children. At the north end, against a partition, is painted in clear legible letters this motto from the gifted pen of the late Malbie Babcock:

Back of the hall is the snowy flour,
Back of the flour is the mill
Back of the mill is the wheat and
The harvest,
The sun and the Father's will

Over the main entrance to the dining pavilion is the legend "Fort Plenty," which is peculiarly appropriate in view of the architectural design of the building, which suggests a fort. At one o'clock, luncheon was served to all the invited guests and visitors.

At three o'clock P. M., the pretty ceremony of christening the new dormitory took place. One hundred little boys and girls assembled on the balconies of the dormitory and Miss Mary Merritt Klopsch, daughter of the founder of Mont-Lawn, took her place at the head of the steps. She wore a garland of flowers and in one hand she carried a small vase of water, brimmed with cut daisies. There was a hush of expectancy as the visitors gathered around, the rest of the children meanwhile grouping themselves at the foot of the steps. Then Miss Mary advanced a pace, bowed to the spectators and, pouring out the contents of the vase on the steps of the new building, said in a clear and distinct treble: "Sunbeam Cottage, I christen thee." At the same instant a string was pulled and a flag rolled back from the front of the building, revealing in golden letters the words "Sunbeam Cottage" on a central panel of the structure. Then the hundred wee tots on the balconies raised their sweet young voices in the "Sunbeam Song."

Mr. Robert S. Blair, of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD editorial staff, made a brief address to the children telling them what the mission of a sunbeam is, how fast and far it travels, and how they, too, could be sunbeams, bringing brightness, joy and happiness wherever they went.

At 3:30 P. M. came the flag drill by the children on the big lawn, and the spectators were greatly interested in the intricate and beautiful evolutions which were skilfully performed. The "Salute to the Flag" was one of the patriotic events of the day, and showed how deeply rooted is the love of country in the heart of even the poorest child.

After the flag drill came the oratory of the day. The whole audience, children and adults, including all the visitors, assembled on the lawn in a large semi-circle.

Among those who had consented to speak to the children on this occasion were Rev. Dr. David Charles Hughes, father of the distinguished Governor of New York State; Rear-Admiral Charles D. Sigsbee, U. S. N., whose previous speeches at the home gave great pleasure; Rev. Ferdinand C. Iglehart, Superintendent of the New York Anti-Saloon League; Rev. C. H. Mead, the well-known temperance orator; Rev. William Potts George, pastor of the Bedford Street M. E. Church, New York, and Rev. John G. Hallimond, Superintendent of the Bowery Mission. Mr. S. C. K. Rutnam, of Ceylon, also spoke briefly to the children.

The speakers were introduced to the audience by Mr. G. H. Sandison, Managing Editor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. All the addresses were heartily enjoyed and applauded to the echo. Rev. Dr. Hughes gave a brief but most effective talk, which was enjoyed by the grown-ups as well as by the children; Admiral Sigsbee kept the youngsters in good humor with his fund of anecdote and words of practical counsel; Dr. Iglehart made a stirring patriotic address; Dr. Mead had a budget of entertaining anecdgiven the audience by their speeches, and to the visitors and guests, for their attendance and for the interest evinced in Mont-Lawn and its work.

At the conclusion of the exercises, the visitors inspected the dormitories, the open-air gymnasium with its swings, see-saws and "giant strides," and the garden; they looked with amazement on the roller-skating in the "Rainy Day Play Room"; entered with zest into the sports which Dr. Klopsch organized among the larger boys and girls on the wide graveled foot-path; and joined heartily in that was going on.

After supper, which was served in the dining pavilion, the children formed a great circle on the lawn where ice-cream and cake were served, all guests present being included in the service. Meanwhile arrangements were made for the display fireworks, which began at dark and lasted nearly an hour. Like all the rest of the attractions of the Fourth, this feature was thoroughly enjoyed by children and guests alike.

Then the carriages were called and the guests prepared for the homeward journey, some to catch trains, others to go to Nyack and nearby villages. It was after nine o'clock when the last of the carriages rolled away, and Mont-Lawn became strange quiet, as its 325 little charges were disposed of for the night in the various dormitories by the teachers and attendants.

The New Dormitory

As can be seen from the photograph, the new dormitory is a spacious building and the architectural design is suggestive of cool shade and refreshing breezes. It resembles somewhat the English cottages of the Middle Ages. It is constructed of stone up to the floor level and all of its angles are reinforced with the same material. It stands on a slope. The lower platform and steps are made of concrete. There is a large gable on the front supported by ornamental oak beams, and below this gable is a spacious bay-window. All of the coping of the walls and steps of the stone porches are of concrete, as are also the entrance steps of the porch at the east and facing toward the main building.

"Sunbeam Cottage," the New Dormitory

otes and Dr. George and Superintendent Hallimond also made characteristic speeches.

Among the guests was Mrs. Eleanor H. Porter, author of the beautiful story "The Transformation of Margaret," now running in the pages of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Mrs. Porter, whose earlier story, "Into Still Waters," like the present one, dealt with the career of a child who had been brought up in the slums, was greatly interested in all she saw at Mont-Lawn.

Dr. Klopsch was called upon vociferously by the audience to speak and finally made a brief address, although he explained that he preferred that the honors of the oratory on the Fourth should always go to the visiting speakers. He spoke expressing gratification on the great success of the occasion. That the Children's Home had become the model home of its kind in the world, was in large measure due to the intelligent management and co-operation of the teachers, who look upon their work as a labor of love, to which they consecrate themselves with signal devotion. It was a matter of special gratification to him to be able to receive over three thousand little guests into the Home this year, which was six hundred more than in any previous year. While the additional number would entail larger financial responsibility, the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and the good people generally would measure up to the requirements in the same creditable manner which has distinguished their conduct in past years.

At Dr. Klopsch's suggestion, a rousing vote of thanks was passed to the Matron and teachers for their excellent management, to the orators, individually and collectively, for the pleasure they had

The walls are plastered in light buff, floors are of hard pine and the ceilings of wood, with beaded boarding, finished in natural tone. The upper sash in all of the windows is diamond-shaped and of glazed cathedral glass, tinted a light amber color. The building faces south as do the other cottages. It is seventy-eight feet long, fifty-two feet deep, and one story high. It is divided into two dormitories, each twenty-nine by thirty-seven feet. Each room has 1,200 square feet of space. In front of the main building are two teachers' rooms. These rooms are nine by fourteen and have openings into the dormitories, so that the teachers can oversee their charges without leaving their apartments. The dormitories are fourteen feet in height from floor to ceiling, thus giving plenty of space for the circulation of air. Each room is lighted by eight large windows and has two outside doors and two large ventilators in the ceiling. At the front are two small porches, one at each end, from which entrance may be gained direct to the dormitories or to the teachers' rooms.

IN THE FOREIGN FIELD

MISSIONARY WOODHOUSE writes that during one of his recent Gospel tours in Rhodesia, he was surprised and delighted to find a mission station run by a Christian native, with about five hundred of a congregation, and poles ready for erecting a new church.

MISSIONARY W. N. CHAMBERS writes from Hadjin, Asia Minor, that during the terrible suffering in that section last winter, consequent on almost total crop failures, two mission ladies, Miss Vaughan and Miss Billings, devoted themselves to relief work, with the result that at one time 3,500 were being helped. Both ladies are now suffering from overstrain, but their energetic efforts doubtless saved many lives.

THIRTY-SIX MISSIONARY RECRUITS

ONE of the most interesting conferences of the early summer was held in the Presbyterian Building in New York City the first week of June, when the newly appointed and the furloughed missionaries assembled for a final discussion of all matters relating to the tremendous responsibilities the former were about to assume on the foreign field. In many ways, it was in the nature of a heart-to-heart talk between the Board of Foreign Missions and the successful candidates they were about to send out. An intimate personal acquaintance with the missionaries was gained, and the closest touch was established between them and the men who stand as their advisors and co-operators. Indeed, so valuable were the benefits derived from this gathering that it may be looked upon as a college course crowded into ten days. It gave the Board an opportunity to make final tests, give final instructions, and develop a feeling of fellowship among them all. As they go forth to the untried fields of Korea, China, Japan, the Philippines, and India, to carry the Gospel, they will look back with a feeling of strengthening inspiration to the sanctuary in which they had assembled to receive their final blessing.

It was the eleventh conference of the kind, and the sessions were made memorable by the excellent advice and encouragement given by those just fresh from the field of action. Among those who gave their personal experience were the Rev. James B. Cochran and the Rev. Samuel Cochran and their wives, from HwaiYuen, China; the Rev. and Mrs. R. W. McCointock, Hainan, China; Mr. Charles A.

Glunz, from the Philippines; Dr. W. A. Briggs, of Laos; Miss Rachel E. Towles, of Syria; Miss Caroline M. Holmes, who has independently inaugurated a settlement in Jebail, Syria; Mrs. W. K. Eddy, also of Syria; Miss Donaldine Cameron, who is in charge of the Rescue Home in San Francisco; Dr. Maud Allen, of India; the Rev. and Mrs. H. J. Underwood, the first missionaries sent to Korea twenty-five years ago; Dr. J. B. Neal, who is a graduate of Yale, and has spent twenty-five years in China, and has much to do with the men of the upper classes, such as Li Hung Chang and others; Mrs. B. W. Labaree, of Persia; the Rev. J. C. R. Ewing, D.D., president of the Forman Christian College of Lahore, India; the Rev. C. A. R. Janvier, D.D., who has spent fourteen years in India; Rev. John N. Forman, who has done excellent work among the Hindus; Rev. Stealy B. Rossiter, D.D., for five years head of the American Church in the Philippines; and Mr. Louis H. Severance, of Cleveland, O., a layman of prominence who has just returned from a visit of a year and a half in the mission field. All these greatly interested the thirty-six young men and women who are to follow in their footsteps.

On the opening day the theme for consideration was administration of the enterprise. The practical phases of the subject were well brought out by Mrs. C. N. Thorpe, whose excellent advice to the new missionaries was to be natural both on their journey and in the foreign field. Other addresses were made by Dr. Halsey, Rev. C. E. Bradt, Rev. George Trull and Mr. Milliken. The second day the topic was "The Relation of the Missionary to His Mission and Associates." The third day was devoted to "The Missionary as a Teacher." The lecture was by Dr. T. H. Sailer, who explained the science of pedagogy as it relates to the missionary. Rev. Dr. Charles R. Erdman gave good advice on the use of the Bible and the books that should be used in conjunction with it. Rev. A. F. Schauffler, D.D., delivered an in-addresses to the newly appointed missionaries and words of cheer and advice from those on furlough. The list of out-going missionaries and the countries to which they have been assigned are as follows:

To Africa: Mr. Jacob Anthony Reis, Jr., educated at the Newark Theological Seminary.

To China: Miss Mary Cole Murdoch and Miss Margaret Falconer Murdoch, educated at the Woman's College of Baltimore, and Miss Agnes Gordon Murdoch, M.D., a graduate of the Medical Department of Johns Hopkins University; the Rev. Charles Hodge Corbett, of the University of Worcester and the Union Theological Seminary; Mrs. Minnie Webster Corbett, Miss Cora Small, Miss Minnie Bell Maggi, Miss Lulu Rose Patton; Mr. Horace Edward Chandler, of Brown University, Providence; Miss Chloe Carolyn Edgerton and Miss Mary Marshall Harding.

To Japan: Miss Annie Margaret (Nisbet) Hail. To Korea: Rev. Harry Andrew Rhodes (of Princeton) and Mrs. Edith Brown Rhodes; Rev. Welling Thomas Cook, of Lafayette and Princeton; Rev. William Campbell Kerr, a graduate of Princeton University and the Auburn Theological Seminary; Rev. Henry Willard Lampe; Dr. Ralph Garfield Mills, of the University of Illinois and the Northwestern Medical College; Miss Mary Ethel Bumgarner, Mr. John Frederick Genso; Miss Katharine McCune, of Park College, Missouri; Miss Helen Isabella Taylor, of the University of Colorado and the University of Michigan; and Miss Eleanor Irene Burns, of Cornell University.

To the Philippines: The Rev. Kenneth Piercy MacDonald, a graduate of Princeton and the University of Nebraska; and Miss Theresa Marguerite Kalb.

To Laos: Dr. Edwin Charles Cort, educated at Johns Hopkins University.

To South America: The Rev. Robert Bartlett Elmore, of Princeton and the Union Theological Seminary; and Miss Ethel Helen Iles.

To Syria: Dr. Ara Elsie Harris.

And those who have been appointed but not yet assigned are: The Rev. John J. Heeren, of Iowa College; the Rev. Harold Charles Anderson, of the Iowa State University and Princeton; Miss Anna S. Doriss; Dr. Archibald Gray Fletcher, of Sioux City and Iowa Medical College, and also a graduate of the College of Physicians and Surgeons of Chicago; the Rev. Wesley Lynn Hemphill, of Princeton and the University of Pennsylvania; and Mr. Hugh Anderson Moran, of Wadham College and Oxford.

A Group of Veteran Missionaries and Candidates for the Foreign Field

teresting extemporaneous speech on the salient features of both the Old and New Testaments.

Socially the Conference was most delightful for the departing missionaries. There were several receptions tendered them, one of the most enjoyable being at the beautiful home of Mrs. John Crosby Brown at Brighthurst, N. J. Upon their arrival at the station the guests were met by carriages in which they were driven to Brighthurst, where sloping lawns, shade trees and beautiful flowers added their refreshing welcome to the hospitality of the hostess. Several delightful hours were passed strolling through rose gardens, visiting the log cabin and its adjacent flower beds, and the conservatories and greenhouses. The succeeding days of the Conference were filled with interesting events. There was a reception at the Savoy under the Presbyterian Union of New York, at which Hon. Linn Bruce, ex-Lieutenant Governor of New York State, presided. The last day of the Conference was devoted to short

MODERN SCIENCE ON ALCOHOL

MAY I tell your readers what modern medical authority teaches concerning the pernicious effect of the various preparations of alcohol and other inebriating drugs on the human race? The Twentieth Century Practice of Medicine says under "Alcoholism and Drug Habits":

There is no form of poisoning which is so wide spread and so rapidly increasing at the present time, as the series of toxic phenomena exhibited in the persons of those addicted to the excessive use of the various preparations of alcohol, opium, morphine, chloral, chloroform, ether, cocaine, and allied inebriating substances.

There is no other kind of poisoning which so degrades brain structure and disturbs mental function, while physically degenerating bodily texture and undermining vital organs, or which is so far-reaching in its operation, transmitting as it does through two generations a great variety of brain abnormalities, mental defects and moral obliquities originally induced in the ancestral stock by the toxicating action of the poison on brain and nerve tissue.

The more generally employed among such articles, narcotics and anaesthetics, by their characteristic influence, have the property of setting up and thus practically originating a desire for a fresh dose (drink), and at the same time of so disturbing brain-function as to induce moral perversion.

Such substances are Alcohol (in the form of beer, wine, brandy and whisky), opium, morphine, cocaine, chloroform and the like, the first-named, Alcohol, being a prolific inciter to breaches of human and divine law, ranging from minor offenses to the gravest misdemeanors and crimes.

Till about a century ago, there was a general belief that drunkenness was a purely voluntary condition; that men and women could get drunk or refrain from getting drunk as they chose, and that intoxication was a pastime willingly and wilfully indulged in; nor is this erroneous belief even now wholly dead. The many who formerly held and the comparatively few who still cherish this opinion looked upon the whole matter of drunkenness as a mere immorality, vice, or crime; punishment in a jail, confinement in the "stocks," pulpit denunciation, ecclesiastical excommunication, or the administration of a good whipping being in their view the proper mode of dealing with such wanton and depraved outcasts. Medical science has, therefore, set itself to investigate thoroughly the nature and properties of intoxicant action on body and brain, and the various morbid conditions which operate to render a substantial proportion of human beings an easy prey to some form of that enslavement, by excessive indulgence in intoxicants, which is the most complete possession and tyranny endured by man.

This extract from the writings of a world-renowned specialist in the treatment of beer, wine and whisky inebriates is surely enough to arouse every man, who desires the elevation of society, to war an everlasting warfare against the soul-and-body-destroying rum business. SUBSCRIBER.

Our Missionary Squadron

IN A LETTER from a missionary in Castro's country, which appears in this issue, we have a striking proof of the wonderful way in which God prospers his work, when the laborers are earnest and self-sacrificing. In Maracaibo there is a little band of missionaries who have been laboring bravely against fearful odds. But the Lord was with them and they pressed on boldly, knowing that he would make for them a smooth path in due season. Their field being largely maritime, they prayed for a mission-boat. Friends in this country, including many readers of this journal, became interested in their struggles in that distant land and sent them help. And now they have their mission-boat plying on the waters of Lake Maracaibo and in grateful acknowledgment they have christened it Heraldo Cristiano. The tribute was as unexpected as it was graceful, and will afford sincere pleasure to all of our friends who are personally interested in spreading the Gospel in missionary lands.

This is the fourth mission-boat in which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers have a direct, personal interest. One is navigating the rivers and lagoons of the Laos country in Siam; another—a large houseboat—is a floating church on the Yangtze, near Wuhu, in China; a third has lately arrived at Cebu, where it is to patrol in the hundred-island parish of Missionary Jansen, and now the last of the quartet of this Gospel fleet hails all unexpectedly from South America.

Long may they fly the flag of the Cross and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD pennant; may they, with their precious burthen, be preserved amid storm and danger, and may they bring in a rich freightage of souls to the Kingdom of Christ.

Evangelist Sunday

IN A RECENT issue, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD commented on an address delivered in Pittsburg by Evangelist William A. Sunday, before an audience of Presbyterian preachers, on "Why Some Ministers Fail." Since that publication we have received a number of letters on the subject, some approving and others disapproving of our well-meant criticisms, and among them a communication from Mr. Sunday himself, which appears in another column. We gladly print his letter, in accordance with the invariable policy of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to give a fair presentation of both sides of any question discussed in its columns.

Accounts of the Pittsburg meeting had already appeared broadcast in the newspapers, from which it was evident that the evangelist had followed his usual habit of free and unrestrained criticism, but in this case to a point which seemed almost beyond precedent. Some of his more vigorous sentences characterizing ministers were printed with exclamation points, as illustrative of "hot-shot" evangelism, while his comments on preachers, professors and churches were such as could not be regarded as in good taste or in harmony with the occasion. That any one could have been edified by such a diatribe as the newspapers described, is exceedingly doubtful.

But Mr. Sunday, in his letter to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, repudiates the use of the language attributed to him in the newspapers, upon which our original comment was based. As even the best newspapers may err in statement occasionally, we are willing to set them wholly and absolutely aside in the present case, accepting Mr. Sunday's frank assurance of their inaccuracy. From other quarters, however, we have better information and better light on Mr. Sunday's remarks at the Pittsburg meeting. While not literally as represented in the newspapers, still they were of a character to justify criticism, and a number of those who heard the address admit this to be the case, even while expressing the fullest confidence in Mr. Sunday and his evangelistic work. It is only just to the evangelist to say that those auditors, while admitting that Mr. Sunday used the expressions recorded in the newspapers, almost unanimously agree that their application was different from what had been represented. That he had used language which in the general judgment was objectionable, is beyond question, and a fair proportion of those who heard him so understood him. On the whole, we should be disposed to completely exonerate him from any intention to abuse the pulpit or its occupants, and to accept his explanation that his acerb criticisms had reference only to those ministers who fail, and the causes of failure. As to the reflection on the seminarians—whom he proposed to stand on their heads in mud puddles—it would seem that many of his hearers understood it to refer to professors in theological seminaries generally, while others accepted it in a more limited sense, as the speaker intended, and as applying only to those who taught what he regarded as an objectionable theology.

We may add that there has not been, in the information which has reached us, the slightest trace of hostility to Mr. Sunday or his evangelistic work. On the contrary, almost without exception, we have received assurances which convince us that there is a genuine admiration for the good work his ministry has accomplished up to the present time and an unshaken confidence in his sincerity. But the right of legitimate criticism is one which belongs to every individual. It is a right which Mr. Sunday himself frequently exercises in the largest measure, and it is one which he should be willing to concede to others. In his calling of evangelist he is a public character, and when he showers his invectives upon the heads of God's servants, successful or unsuccessful, he invites censure.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has nothing but the kindest feelings toward Mr. Sunday and his work. On several occasions it has mentioned that work with approval, and it trusts there may be no reason why it should withhold its approval in the future. But as a conservative Christian paper, representing the largest constituency of any religious paper in the country, it would be delinquent if it did not exercise its proper prerogative in opposing the introduction of methods in the pulpit of which it can not approve. It has exercised this legitimate prerogative in the past and will do so whenever occasion demands. It is in this sense only that we have criticized Mr. Sunday, with reference to his methods, manner and language. For his ministry as a whole, apart from these, we have no word of condemnation, but only praise. We can understand, too, how an evangelist, carried away by his own cyclonic oratory, may use expressions to which in calmer moments he would never give utterance.

Ministers, as well as evangelists, may profitably give heed to the lesson of this controversy. There is ample place in the Christian ministry for all degrees of talent and for every variety of method and manner, but there is no place on any Gospel platform for slang or vulgarity. Moreover, if we are to be accepted even at the cheapest valuation as followers of Christ, we should refrain from exaggeration in speech and manner, and hold fast to that earnestness, dignity and reverence which are the hall mark of the consecrated preacher.

Vacation Hints

THE vacation idea has taken deep root in our soil. Business is so engrossing and we live and spend ourselves so generously and at so great a pace that we are very tired when we reach the time that we may take a fortnight off. How attractive that fortnight has looked ever since its date was fixed nobody knows half so well as a weary clerk, stenographer, saleswoman or other person whose duties day in and day out are monotonous.

Where shall the vacation be spent? If possible, somewhere in an atmosphere different from the ordinary one. The country girl may enjoy an outing to the city and a chance to see the tall buildings, the broad streets, the gay shops, the shipping in the harbor and the well-groomed parks, fully as much as the city girl enjoys the cool depths of the forest, the murmur of the brooks and the vesper song of the thrush. Do not let dress form too important an item in your vacation. A simple wardrobe that is suitable for going about and that affords a change for afternoon and evening, need not cost a great deal of money. Make every arrangement beforehand.

One of the greatest mistakes is to go unprepared to a place, leaving to haphazard the choice of lodgings. If you are going to a country inn alone endeavor to join a friend there, so that you may be introduced to her special group. If you are a good walker visit a place where the roads may daily tempt you to pleasant excursions. If you feel too exhausted for violent exercise, do not be ashamed to spend most of your time loafing in the sun, reading a book that you like under the trees or swinging lazily in a hammock. The vacation that you enjoy will be the vacation that will send you back to your work best equipped for a new campaign.

Evangelist Sunday's Letter

EDITOR CHRISTIAN HERALD:

You do me a gross injustice in your editorial. If winning one hundred thousand to Christ is reckless, then you are right. If turning thousands of drunkards to sobriety, fallen women to virtue, thieves to steal no more, driving saloons out of a score of cities and towns is reckless, then I am deserving of your rebuke.

The report that I said "ministers are grafters and fudge-eaters and mollycoddles, and fit for the funny house," is a lie pure and simple. I never in my life have attacked the ministry; if occasion required rebuke, I have never been abusive.

I said many a minister accepted a call to a church, intending to do good work, but found himself pastor of a worldly, godless, card-playing, dancing, Sunday golf-playing, novel-reading, wine-drinking, mollycoddle crowd, that were useless as soul-winners, and when he applied the remedy, they said, "You preach our way or go." That's the truth and every one knows it. I am fighting the sins in the Church with every ounce of my being. I love the Church with every hair in my head and every brain lobe and drop of blood, and as a faithful son will not stand by and see these things going on, and not rebuke them.

Yours truly,
W. A. SUNDAY.

Fighting Fire in New York

THE first test of the high-pressure hydrants was made recently in New York City, which demonstrated clearly that the fire engines of to-day are to take their places in the scrap-iron heap with the hand engines of olden time, and that the fire pumping stations, with their tremendous pressure, and the hydrants scattered through the city, are to take their place. At the first trial there were fifteen lines of the hose measuring two hundred and fifty feet, and nine others were six hundred feet long. The pressure was three hundred pounds to the square inch and twenty-four tremendous streams were shot to the top of a twelve-story building. The flood pouring down made four inches of water in the street. Fire pumping stations will be installed in all parts of the city and immeasurable advance will be made in fighting the fires. Fire Chief Croker was asked what effect it would have on a fire in any of the skyscrapers. "It would hardly have any effect," he answered. "We could string no hose high enough to cope with a fire in a tall building; but the fire regulations which demand stand-pipes with outside Siamese connections would be our hope under those circumstances. Besides, we expect to have 500 pounds' pressure in all the high structures."

Science has not only busied itself with multiplying the conveniences of civilized living, but has set itself also to the work of saving values, material and moral. Dense populations and high buildings in large cities bring greater perils; they also suggest scientific inventions with which to avoid these perils. The added danger from fire in large cities admitted by all, is to be provided against by fire pumping-stations and by enormous streams of salt water from the ocean as well as fresh water sent through great distances upon the buildings. This important saving of property and life only suggests the merciful instrumentalities God is using for the saving of men's souls.

Who redeemeth thy life from destruction. (Psa. 103: 4.)

Dime Novels

While the dime novel trade is flourishing in Russia, Spain and other countries of Europe, it is declining very rapidly in this country. On this subject, The Pathfinder has this to say:

"Free circulating libraries have given dime novels a solar-plexus blow. In the days of five-dollar membership to public libraries the small boy, not being a plutocrat, was unable to draw out books and had to content himself with five cents' worth of 'Tenderfoot Pete's Last Leap' taken surreptitiously in small doses in the first vacant lot beyond range of the parental eye. But now all this has changed. Libraries are free. The small reader saves his five cents for candy, and, instead of patronizing the corner newsstand, goes to the nearest library for his reading-matter. Naturally he comes in touch with a better class of literature, which can not fail to improve his taste. The next generation of youngsters will probably know dime novels only by name, and the 'last of the dime-novel-writers,' whoever he may be, will mark the extinction of a peculiar literary trade which at one time gave lucrative employment to nearly half the writers of the country."

The dime novel period was a very disastrous one to the mental development and moral character of our children, especially the boys. The library of well-selected books is one of the greatest blessings of our times. Mr. Carnegie, in the foundation of his libraries, is building a monument more enduring than one of marble or brass. Good books are not only invaluable as a means of education, but they are necessary as moral safeguards to the young.

When thou comest, bring with thee the books, but especially the parchments. (II. Tim. 4: 13.)

Conjugal Devotion

Josephine Marasco, a bride of only nine months, was at the point of death in one of the New York City hospitals. Her heart action was imperfect and she was perishing for want of blood. One of the surgeons remarked that he believed that if it were possible to transfuse a large quantity of healthy blood into her veins, she might possibly recover. Dominick Marasco, her husband, said: "Take the blood from my body; she can have every drop of it if it can save her." The offer was accepted. The wife was strapped to the operating table with her right arm hanging over its edge. The young husband was seated in a chair beside his wife and his left arm was bared to the elbow. An incision was made in the arm of each and a three-inch tube, placed in each opening, drew the current of blood from the healthy man into the arm of the sick woman. Slowly the color which had faded from Mrs. Marasco's face returned to her cheeks until they were actually rosy. Her pulse gained strength and her breathing became easier and stronger. As his wife gained, however, Dominick slowly lost his strength. His lips, compressed together tightly, turned slowly from a rich red to an ashen color. The color left his cheeks and the perspiration started from his face. The tube was then removed, the wounds were cared for and the life of the young wife was saved. She began to improve from that moment and is now convalescing.

The Bonfire of Opium Pipes in Shanghai

While there are so many States that are lax in their divorce laws and while there are so many in high life and in low life who hold the marital relation lightly, there are many beautiful examples of conjugal fidelity like the one of the man willing to give his life's blood for the restoration of his wife.

For this cause shall a man leave father and mother, and shall cleave to his wife: and they twain shall be one flesh. (Matt. 19: 5.)

Julia Ward Howe's Vision

Julia Ward Howe had a vision recently and thus described it to the reporter of a daily newspaper: "I saw men and women of every clime working like bees to undo the evils of society, to discover the whole web of vice and misery, and to apply the remedies, and also to find the influences that should best counteract evil and its attending suffering. There seemed to be a new, a wondrous, ever-permeating light, the glory of which I cannot attempt to put in human words—the light of the new-born hope and sympathy blazing. The source of this light was born of human endeavor—the immortal purpose of countless thousands of men and women who were equally doing their part in the world-wide battle with evil, and whose energy was banded to tear the mask from error, crime, superstition and greed, and to discover and apply the remedy. I saw the men and women, standing side by side, shoulder to shoulder, a common, lofty and indomitable purpose lighting every face with a glory not of this earth. All were advancing with one purpose in view, one foe to trample, one everlasting good to gain. I saw them advancing like a mighty army, laden with the fruits of their research, their study, their endeavor, in this battle with the powers of darkness, and ready to tear vice from the earth, to strip away all selfishness of greed, of rapine. Then I seemed to see them stoop down to their fellows and to lift them higher and higher. Men and women, a vast host whom none could number, working unitedly, equally, with super-human energy, all for the extirpation of the blackness of vice and for the weal of the race. And then I saw the victory. All of evil was gone from the earth. Misery was blotted out. Mankind was emancipated and ready to march forward in a new era of human understanding, all-encompassing sympathy and ever-present help."

This is the same vision Mrs. Howe had when she began the Battle Hymn of the Republic, "Mine eyes have seen the coming of the glory of the Lord." And the reason for the glorious consummation described is expressed in the last stanza of the hymn:

In the beauty of the lilies Christ was born across the sea,
With a glory in his bosom that transfigures you and me.

That good time the prophetic saw will come when the Christ love and the Christ life shall have transfigured the hearts of men.

Thy kingdom come, thy will be done in earth, as it is in heaven.
(Matt. 6: 10.)

Opium Pipes Destroyed

A Chinese syndicate of anti-opium reformers, having bought the goodwill and effects of one of the largest opium-palaces in Shanghai, decided to impress the populace by holding a solemn burning of the implements. They advertised the ceremony, and amid music, speeches, and a fusillade of crackers, the opium-pipes, saturated with kerosene, were burned. The parts not easily destructible by fire were smashed with hammers. Some of the pipes were made of ivory and silver, and were valued at $500.

The poppy was known and used by the ancients. Frequent mention of its culture and nature is made in the Roman and Grecian classics. Opium was introduced into India and Europe by the Arabs in the sixteenth century. In the middle of the seventeenth century, China began the use of it as an intoxicant. The opium habit finally became so disastrous that in 1820 the Chinese government prohibited its importation. But it was smuggled into the country in such quantities as to lead to the opium war between China and England, resulting in the treaty of Tientsin in 1858. It was one of England's disgraces to have forced opium upon China. Cursed by this crime, China now has 60,000,000 habitual users of the drug. To save the subjects of the Empire from being literally rotted to death in body, mind and heart, the Chinese government in 1906 issued an imperial edict forbidding the importation of opium and its production at home, and outlining a distinct plan for the total suppression of the use of this noxious drug throughout the Chinese Empire within the space of ten years.

It is in keeping with that governmental action, and the righteous public sentiment that accompanies it, that the people brought their pipes and made a vast chimney for the fires that were to destroy them. The smoke of the fires of freedom and reform will perfume the world. If the United States government were to have passed a law forbidding the importation, manufacture or sale of alcoholic liquors and fixing a limit of ten years for a completion of the work, the revolution would not have been so tremendous as this decree of the Chinese government to put an end to the opium habit. This action of China is only an expression of the upheaval of the moral conscience of the world which is prompting the people of all nations to resist and overthrow the things that are wrong and that make for physical and spiritual degradation of the race.

...but overcome evil with good. (Romans 12: 21.)

THE MESSAGE OF A HYMN

MANY congregations and thousands of individual Christians must have been uplifted by a beautiful hymn of which the first stanza is:

O Love that wilt not let me go,
I rest my weary soul in thee;
I give thee back the life I owe,
That in thine ocean depths its flow
May richer, fuller be.

This hymn was written by the Rev. George Matheson, D.D., well known in Scotland during his useful ministry of more than thirty years in the parishes of Innellan and St. Bernard's, Edinburgh. Dr. Matheson was a preacher of wonderful spirituality and great eloquence. He wrote a number of devotional books that are the joy and inspiration of Christian hearts in Europe and America. From childhood George Matheson was blind, and was obliged to struggle hard for the high honors he attained in scholarship and the eminent position which he reached in the pulpit. His biography is one of the works that will live. It is full of light and cheer. The hymn, "O Love that wilt not let me go," was written by Dr. Matheson on a day when he passed through a deep personal experience of sorrow. It was written within an hour, and only one word in it was afterward changed from the original draft. An interesting story told in the memoir has so impressed me that I copy it for the benefit of those who read this page. The letter was sent to Dr. Matheson's biographer by a missionary in India.

"It was in March, 1904, and the sunshiny scene still lives in my memory. I had left my hotel and made my way through the picturesque crowds in the streets of A—. The Sabbath was essentially a French one. By force of habit I had turned aside that day from globe-trotting pursuits, and taken my place in the church of the United Frees among some three-score of God's people, whose mother-tongue was English.

"On my right and left were missionaries of the North African Mission. They found it refreshing to assemble for worship in the midst of their labors among a fanatical Mohammedan people; they were from Africa and I from India. It seemed to me a meeting of the oceans, that we should stand for worship in the same pew, and sing out of the same hymnal. I could not, of course, turn round to see who sat behind, but worshipers in front looked like those who might be residing in this watering place for purposes of health or trade—some were certainly, like myself, of the tourist type. Immediately in front of me was the English Consul, a man well over six feet, with shoulders like Sandow's. On his left was his wife—also tall and well built.

"The church was not built for show, but for use. By this I do not mean that it was common. There was an aisle on each side, and the seats ran right across the width of the structure. A platform was placed in front, on the side of which the organ stood. The pulpit was at the rear of this platform, and suitably raised for its purpose. Thus minister and organist were in our full view.

"The organ was in keeping with the building: a plain instrument of the American type. The organist was a lady.

"What the minister preached about I really forget. Perhaps that was not the preacher's fault. He was a pastor there for his health, and displayed no special vigor. I have no objection to a written sermon, but that morning the read sermon seemed, though an able treatise, to fall flat. The order of service was what I had been used to in Wellesley Square United Free Church, Calcutta. To me it was all lifeless, formal, uneventful, messageless, comfortless. Even the words and music of the hymns had failed to stir the deep of my nature that day. I blame no one. Perhaps I was not in a receptive spirit. I cannot tell—but so it was. On went the minutes, and I was not sorry.

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

"The hour had at last fled. Invocations, lessons, prayers, sermon, collection, announcements were all over. What had been a most uneventful service to me was now to be punctuated by a hymn and a benediction. The minister announced George Matheson's 'O Love that wilt not let me go.' When a much loved hymn is announced in Wales, the land I know best, the people stir with joy, and cast meaning glances at each other. The worshipers stand as if to pour out their hearts, and one gets thrilled before a chord is struck. That morning it was all confound. If a seraph had come to wake me with song of Zion, the surprise would not have been greater. The organist seemed in the third heaven. Here and there he made pauses not in the book. I sang and played and carried us on irresistibly. Then we plunged into the second verse:

O Light that followest all my way,
I yield my flickering torch to thee;
My heart restores its borrowed ray,
That in thy sunshine's blaze its day
May brighter, fairer be.

"I could not fail to notice the deep emotion of the Consul's wife, for she stood in the next pew in front. She had ceased to sing; her trembling was manifest. The music was like the sound of many waters. The volume of it increased. The third verse was reached

O Joy that seekest me through pain,
I cannot close my heart to thee;
I trace the rainbow through the rain,
And feel the promise is not vain,
That morn shall tearless be.

"With a strange suddenness the Consul's wife fell on her knees and was convulsed with emotion. With her hands she covered her face while the majestic music swept on. The husband knew not what to do for all eyes were turned towards his wife. With inborn calmness and strong sympathy he then bowed in prayer at his wife's side. The sight was beautiful, and there were many wet eyes near where I stood. But what of the organist? He was in rhapsody. Down his furrowed face tears made their way. His head of curls added impressiveness to the scene. Bending over the keys, he poured out his very soul. Of time and space he seemed ignorant. The emphasis was that of intense feeling, born of rare experience, controlled by musical ability—both instrumental and vocal.

"When we reached the last verse I, for one, wished blind Matheson had provided us with more. And yet we might not have been able to bear it.

O Cross that liftest up my head,
I dare not ask to fly from thee;
I lay in dust life's glory dead,
And from the ground there blossoms red
Life that shall endless be.

"The scene continued the same to the end, only with deeper feeling. Great was the relief when the last note died away, and the minister, as awed as the rest of us, pronounced the benediction. So great was the solemnity of the occasion that no one wanted to disturb the silence by rising from their knees.

"When the congregation did rise to disperse, several went forward to thank the organist. I was one of them. In the group were several Americans, and one said to the organist, still bathed in tear-marks, 'We knew your wife.' The one answer was a quiet smile, followed by a quick retirement from the church. This man did not feast on plaudits or compliments. He was gone before we could say a tithe of what we felt.

"In the aisles and at the church door I learned that the man who had waked up everybody's soul was a distinguished singer of England and Scotland. Two years before his wife lay a-dying—and she was an American, equal to him in musical talent. She had asked him to sing to her, as she entered the valley of the shadow of death, 'O Love that wilt not let me go.' He did so, but had not ventured to sing it again until that memorable morning. Ah, that was a sufficient explanation. Sorrow had wrought the power.

"I wended my way hotel-wards, but my thoughts were on the wings of the music—'blossoming red.' Such music (that lost chord), set to such words, I can never hope to hear again until I stand within the gates of the New Jerusalem."

O Love That Wilt Not Let Me Go

trary. 'Listless' could have been written over the whole service. The announcement of even that hymn seemed to stir no one.

"While the minister was reading the first verse I noticed a man of, perhaps, fifty change seats with the lady organist.

"It was nothing to mark. 'He is the local organist,' I thought, 'and the lady is a visitor.' Suddenly the notes were touched and the little American organ seemed to have been 'born again.' Bar followed bar. We all brightened up. There was a master at the keys. We stood and sang:

O Love that wilt not let me go,
I rest my weary soul in thee;
I give thee back the life I owe,
That in thine ocean depths its flow
May richer, fuller be.

"Was the change in me or in my environment? I cannot tell. The lost chord seemed to have been

A New Serial Written for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

By MRS. ELEANOR H. PORTER

Author of "Into Still Waters," etc.

STRAIGHT ahead the road ran between lines of squat houses with men, women and children swarming on the doorsteps or hanging on the fences. Beyond rosetier upon tier of red and brown roofs flanked on the left by the towering chimneys of the mills. Still farther beyond and a little to the right, just where the sky was reddest, rose the terraced slopes of Prospect Hill crowned by the towers and turrets of Belcourt.

"We can at least see where we want to be," laughed Brandon, grimly. "Fine old place, isn't it?"

The girl at his side did not answer. Her eyes had widened a little, and her cheeks had lost their bright color. She was not looking at the pile of brick and stone on top of Prospect Hill, but at the ragged little urchins and pallid women that fell back from the roadway before the car. The boys yelled derisively, and a baby cried. Margaret shrank back in her seat, and Brandon, turning quickly, saw the look on her face. His own jaw set into stern lines.

"We'll be out of this soon, Miss Kendall," he assured her. "You mustn't mind them. As if it wasn't bad enough to come here anyway, but that I must needs come just now when the day-shift is getting home."

"The day-shift?"

"Yes; the hands who work days, you know."

"But don't they all work—days?"

Brandon laughed.

"Hardly!"

"You mean, they work nights?"

"Yes." He threw a quizzical smile into her startled eyes. "By the way," he observed, "you'd better not ask Frank in that tone of voice if they work nights. That night-shift is a special pet of his. He says it's one great secret of the mills' prosperity—having two shifts—not that his are the only mills that run nights, of course. There are plenty more."

Margaret's lips parted, but before she could speak there came a hoarse shout and a quick cry of terror. The next instant the car under Brandon's skilful hands swerved sharply and just avoided a collision with a boy on a bicycle.

"Narrow shave, that," muttered Brandon. "He wasn't even looking where he was going."

Margaret shuddered. She turned her gaze to the right and to the left. Everywhere were wan faces and sunken eyes.

With a little cry she clutched Brandon's arm.

"Can't we go faster—faster?" she moaned. "I want to get away—away!"

For answer came the sharp "honk-honk" of the horn, and the car bounded forward. With a shout the crowd fell back, and with another "honk-honk" Brandon took the first turn to the right.

"I think we're out of the worst of it," he cried in Margaret's ear. "If we keep to the right we'll go through only the edge of the town." Even as he spoke, the way cleared more and more before them, and the houses grew farther apart.

The town was almost behind them when Margaret gave a scream of horror. Almost instantly Brandon brought the car to a stop and leaped to the ground. Close by one of the big-rimmed wheels lay a huddled little heap of soiled and ragged pink calico; but before Brandon could reach it, the heap stirred and lifted itself. From beneath a tangled thatch of brown curls looked out two big brown eyes.

little feet and the ragged dress of the child before her.

"T'ank lucky stars," murmured the little girl again, putting out a cautious finger and just touching the fat rubber tire of the wheel that had almost crushed out her life.

Brandon shuddered involuntarily and drew the child away.

"What's your name, little girl?" he asked gently.

"'Maggie, what did they say to ye?' demanded Mrs. Durgin"

"I reckon mebbe I felled down," said a cheery voice, that yet sounded a little dazed. "I reckon I did."

"Well, baby, I reckon you did!" breathed the man in glad relief. "And you may thank your lucky stars 'twas no worse."

"T'ank lucky stars. What are lucky stars?" demanded the small girl, interestedly.

"Eh? Oh, luckystars—why, they're—what are lucky stars, Miss Kendall?"

Margaret did not answer. She did not seem to hear. With eyes that carried a fascinated terror in their blue depths she was looking at the dirty

"Maggie," said the child, wonderingly.

"How old are you?"

"I'm 'most five goin' on six, an' I'll be twelve ter-morrow."

Brandon smiled.

"And where do you live?" he continued.

A thin little claw of a finger pointed to an unpainted, shabby-looking cottage across the street. At that moment a shrill voice called: "Maggie, Maggie, what ye doin'?" Come here, child." And a tall, gaunt woman appeared in the doorway.

Maggie turned slowly; but scarcely had the little bare feet taken one step when the girl in the automobile stirred as if waking from sleep.

"Here—quick—little girl, take this," she cried, tearing open the little jeweled purse at her belt, and thrusting all its contents into the small grimy hands.

Maggie stared in wonder, then her whole face lighted up.

"Lucky stars!" she cried gleefully, her eyes on the shining coins. "T'ank lucky stars!" And she turned and ran with all her small might toward the house.

"Quick—come—let us go," begged Margaret, "before the mother sees—the money!" And Brandon, smiling indulgently at the generosity that was so fearful of receiving thanks, lost no time in putting a long stretch of roadway between themselves and the tall gaunt woman behind them.

CHAPTER XVII

"STARS—t'ank lucky stars," Maggie was still shouting loudly and gleefully when she reached her mother's side.

Mrs Durgin bent keen eyes on her young daughter's face.

"Maggie, what was they sayin' to ye?" she began, pulling the little girl into the house. Suddenly her jaw dropped. She stooped and clutched the child's hand. "Why, Maggie, it's money—stacks of it!" she exclaimed, prying open the small fingers.

"Stars—lucky stars," cooed Maggie. Maggie liked new words and phrases, and she always said them over and over until they were new no longer.

Mrs. Durgin shook her daughter gently, yet determinedly. Her small black eyes looked almost large, so wide were they with amazement.

"Maggie, Maggie, tell me—what did they say to ye?" she demanded again. "Why did they give ye all this money?"

Maggie was silent. Her brow was drawn into a thoughtful frown.

"But, Maggie, think—ther must 'a' been somethin'. What did ye do?"

"Ther wa'n't," insisted the child. "I jest felled down an' got up, an' they said it."

"Said what?"

"T'ank lucky stars."

A sudden thought sent a quick flash of fear to Mrs. Durgin's eyes.

"Maggie, they didn't hurt ye," she cried, dropping on her knees and running swift, anxious fingers over the thin little arms and legs and body. "They didn't hurt ye?"

Maggie shook her head. At that moment a shadow darkened the doorway, and the kneeling woman glanced up hastily.

"Oh, it's you, Mis' Magoon," she said to the small, tired-looking woman in the doorway.

"Yes, it's me," sighed the woman, dragging herself across the room to a chair. "What time did Nellie leave here?"

"Why, I dunno—mebbe four o'clock. Why?"

The woman's face contracted with a sharp spasm of pain.

"She wa'n't within half a mile of the mill when I met her, yet she was pantin' an' all out o' breath then. She'll be late, 'course, an' you know what that means."

"Yes, I know," sighed Mrs. Durgin,

OUR FIRST ESPERANTO CONVENTION

Dr. Zamenhof

Prof. A. M. Grillon

Prof. G. B. Viles

Mr. Edmond Privat

AN ESPERANTO CONVENTION, the first in the United States, will be held at Chautauqua, N. Y., July 20-24. The Chautauqua Institution invites all Esperantists to take part in it. The interest in Esperanto leading to this invitation began one year ago, when a course in Esperanto was given at Chautauqua by Professor Benedict Papot of Chicago. Bishop John H. Vincent, Chancellor of Chautauqua, has shown great interest in promoting the Convention. A long list of kunlaborantoj (fellow workers) from Canada, Mexico, Cuba, and the United States is published in connection with the call for the Convention. M. Privat of Switzerland, who for several months has been vigorously conducting an Esperanto propaganda in the United States, will be a prominent person in the Convention; indeed, he will prepare the way for it by conducting an Institute of Esperanto for two weeks previous to the opening of the Convention.

It was the hope of promoting peace between nations that led Dr. Zamenhof to construct the international language, and in the word "Esperanto" (which means "one who hopes") we have the expression of his desire. The Esperanto flag bears the green star of hope, and with it goes the motto: Sub la verda stelo paco venkos: Under the green star peace will conquer.

On Monday, July 20, the Esperanto flag will be raised at Chautauqua with ceremonies. Bishop Vincent will make an address of welcome. M. Privat and others will make short addresses.

The programme for the Convention has been arranged by the executive committee, consisting of Dr. Walter H. Fox, Mr. Edwin C. Reed, and Prof. Benedict Papot. The mornings will generally be devoted to the study of Esperanto; how to acquire it, how to teach it, and how to converse and speak in public, all under the direction of M. Privat. On Tuesday afternoon, July 21, the entire influence of the Chautauqua Institution will be used to fill the great auditorium, which seats ten thousand people.

Dr. D. O. S. Lowell of Boston will make the address on that occasion. There will be an address at one of the sessions by Mr. E. K. Harvey of Boston, which will be delivered in Esperanto, and illustrated by the stereopticon. Other addresses will also be made in Esperanto, also in English, and there will be discussions of live topics connected with Esperanto. And there will be considered the advisability of inviting the "Tutmonda Esperanta Kongreso" perantist." Her mother is Mrs. Winifred Sackville Stoner, president of the Indiana Esperanto Association. M. Privat has given the child a diploma for being able to read, write and speak Esperanto. She will probably sing and recite at some of the meetings of the Convention.

Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts will represent THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, also the Washington Esperanto Society, and she hopes to meet many of the students of the Christian Herald Esperanto Course. It is now generally conceded by leaders in the new movement that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has "the largest propaganda for Esperanto in the United States, if not in the world."

It is expected that practically all the leading American Esperantists will attend. Among those who will participate actively in the work of the Convention are the following:

Prof. G. B. Viles, Columbus, O.; Prof. Geo. Macloskie, Princeton, N. J.; J. F. Twombly, Brookline, Mass.; Dr. D. O. S. Lowell, Boston, Mass.; H. J. Forman, New York City; F. B. sympathetically. "She—she hadn't orter gone."

Across the room Mrs. Magoon's head came up with a jerk.

"Don't ye s'pose I know that? The child's sick, an' I know it. But what difference does that make? She works, don't she?"

For a moment Mrs. Durgin did not speak. Gradually her eyes drifted back to Maggie and the little pile of coins on the table.

"Mis' Magoon, see," she cried eagerly, "what the lady give Maggie. They was in one o' them 'nautymobiles,' as Maggie calls 'em, an' Maggie fell down in the road. She wa'n't hurt a mite—not even scratched, but they give her all this money."

The woman on the other side of the room sniffed disdainfully.

"Well, what of it? They'd oughter give it to her," she asserted.

"But they wa'n't ter blame, an' they didn't hurt her none—not a mite," argued the other.

"No thanks ter them, I'll warrant," snapped Mrs. Magoon. "For my part, I wouldn't tech their old money." Then, crossly, but with undeniable interest, she asked: "How much was it?"

Mrs. Durgin laughed.

"Never you mind," she retorted, as she gathered up the coins from the table; "but thar's enough so's I'm goin' ter get them cough-drops fur Nellie, anyhow. So!" And she turned her back and pretended not to hear the faint remonstrance from the woman over by the window. Later, when she had bought the medicine and placed it in Mrs. Magoon's hands, the remonstrances were repeated in a higher key, and were accompanied again with an angry snarl against the world in general and automobiles in particular.

"But why do ye hate 'em so?" demanded Mrs. Durgin, "them autymobiles? They hain't one of 'em teched ye, as I knows of."

There was no answer.

"I don't believe ye knows yerself," declared the questioner then; and at the taunt the other raised her head.

"Mebbe I don't," she flamed, "an' 'tain't them I hate, anyway—it's the folks in 'em. It's rich folks. I've allers hated 'em anywheres, but 'twa'n't never so bad as now since them things came. They look so—so comfortable—the folks a leanin' back on their cushions; an' so—so free, as if there wa'n't nothin' that could bother 'em. 'Course I knew before that there was rich folks, an' that they had fine clo's an' good things ter eat, an' shows an' parties, an' spent money; but I didn't see 'em, an' I do now. I see 'em, I tell ye, an' it makes me realize how I ain't comfortable like they are, nor Nellie ain't, neither."

"But they ain't all bad—rich folks," argued the thin black-eyed woman, earnestly. "Some of 'em is good."

The other shook her head.

"I hain't had the pleasure o' meetin' that kind," she rejoined grimly.

"Well, I have," retorted Maggie's mother with some spirit. "Look at that lady ter-night what give Maggie all that money."

There was no answer, and after a moment Mrs. Durgin went on. Her voice was lower now, and not quite clear.

"Thar was another one, too, an' she was jest like a angel out o' heaven. It was years ago—much as twelve or fourteen, when I lived in New York. She was the mother of the nicest an' prettiest little girl I ever see—the one I named my Maggie here for. An' she asked us ter her home, an' we stayed weeks, an' rode in her carriage an' ate ter her table, an' lived right with her jest as she did. An' when we came back ter New York she come with us an' took us out of the cellar an' found a beautiful place fur us, all sun an' winders, an' she paid up the rent fur us 'way ahead whole months. An' thar was all the Whalens, an' me an' the twins."

"Well?" prompted Mrs. Magoon, as the speaker paused. "What next? You ain't in New York, an' she ain't a-doin' it now, is she? Where is she?"

Mrs. Durgin turned her head away.

"I don't know," she said.

The other sniffed.

"I thought as much. It don't last—it never does."

"But it would 'a' lasted with her," cut in Mrs. Durgin, sharply. "She wa'n't the kind what gives up. She's sick or dead, or somethin'—I know she is. But thar's others what has lasted—that Mont-Lawn I was tellin' ye of, whar I learned them songs we sings, an' whar I learned 'most ev'rythin' good thar is in me—that's done by good folks. They pays three dollars an' it lets some poor little boy or girl go thar an' stay ten whole days jest eatin' an' sleepin' an' playin'. An' if I was in New York now my Maggie herself'd be a-goin' one o' these days—you'd see! I tell ye, rich folks ain't bad—all of 'em; an' they do things 'sides loll back in them autymobiles!"

Mrs. Magoon stared; then she shrugged her shoulders.

"Mebbe," she admitted grudgingly. "Say—er—Mis' Durgin, how much was that money Maggie got—eh?"

The Soul's Turning-Point*

IN THE theological sense, conversion simply means the "turning" of a sinner to God, from darkness unto light. In the general sense, heathens and infidels are converted when they abandon paganism and openly accept the Christian faith. In the individual sense, a person is converted when the whole life becomes changed through the influence of divine grace upon the heart. It is not merely a change in our religious professions; it must include the transformation of our thoughts, desires and inclinations. This is the result of saving faith in Christ Jesus.

"The immediate gift of God to the convert," writes Rev. George Matheson, "is a sense of insufficiency. He had not felt it yesterday. His prevalent feeling yesterday was a sense of individual power. But to-day the light has come and the self-sufficiency has died. He is unable to find his way along the same road; what makes the difference? An inward something—light. It is that which makes him feel the sense of impotence, and causes him to cry out for the leading of the Father."

Robert Aitkin, a bookseller of Philadelphia, was the first person who printed a Bible in that city. A man called on him and inquired if he had Paine's Age of Reason for sale. He told him he had not; but having entered into conversation with him and found that he was an infidel, he told him he had a better book which he usually sold for a dollar, but would lend it to him, if he would promise to read it; and after he had actually read it, if he did not think it worth a dollar, he could return it. The man consented; and Mr. Aitkin put a Bible into his hands. Some months later he came back, and expressed the deepest gratitude, saying it had made him what he was not before—a happy man; for he had found in it the way of salvation through Christ.

"I do not remember you," said Dr. Lyman Beecher to a man who accosted him in Ohio. "I suppose not," said the stranger; "but we once spent two hours together in a house alone in a storm." "When was it?" "Do you remember preaching, twenty years ago, in such a place, to a single person?" "Yes," said the doctor, "I do, indeed; and if you are the man, I have been wishing to see you ever since." "I am the man, sir; and that sermon saved my soul, made a minister of me, and yonder is my church. The converts of that sermon, sir, are all over Ohio."

In conversion we recognize three points: (1) The fact. Attested by millions whose lives have been transformed. (2) The features. Some conversions being almost like volcanic upheavals and others so quiet as to be almost imperceptible. (3) The philosophy. St. John describes it as a new birth, or as Christ planting new life in us which crowds out sin and death.

Let us not doubt the fact of a man's conversion because it happens to differ with our own in some non-essential features. Some have visions and tears and emotions and others do not. Some have hard struggles before they enter the kingdom; others find the gate wide open and simply walk in. Test conversion not by the attending features but by the fruits of the Spirit, and by the attitude of love to God.

A majority of the conversions are of the young. In one notable revival, it was ascertained that the ratios of conversions at different ages were

From 10 to 20 years old	47 per cent.

" 30 to 40 "	9 "
" 40 to 50 "	9 "
" 50 to 60 "	7 "
" 60 to 70 "	2 1/4 "
" 70 to 80 "	1 "

The importance of early Christian training is here so obvious that it needs no comment. Hard indeed is it for the aged sinner to abandon his sin.

Value of Home Missions*

MISSIONS have been a prominent feature of Christianity since its foundation. Jesus designed his Gospel for all nations, and its field was the whole world. In the highest sense, therefore, he himself was the first missionary and his special field was in his own land and among his own people.

During the last half century, home missions in the United States have multiplied greatly and the general work has acquired a momentum which promises well for the future. To Bible Societies, Tract Societies and Sunday School Associations doing work on a broadly evangelical basis, there have been added many denominational organizations which are now doing excellent work in the home field. Northfield and the various Training Schools are co-operating magnificently in the training and equipping of skilled workers. Our foreign population is not overlooked, for there are societies specially organized to care for the spiritual welfare of immigrants from other lands.

On our frontiers and in our newer States and territories, a remarkable home missionary work is in progress. Newly or sparsely settled neighborhoods are receiving spiritual attention, churches and Sunday Schools are being organized and the Gospel is being preached by faithful pastors.

In the Alleghenies and the Cumberland and Tennessee mountains the educational and religious effort that is being put forth among the "mountain whites" is one of the best features of the home mission work of our day. Lincoln University at Cumberland Gap, with its excellent organization and its far-reaching influence, is the ideal training institution for these neglected people. Another is the Society of Soul Winners, with headquarters at Wilmore, Ky., and with a score or more preaching stations in the mountains.

Among the negroes, Tuskegee is the largest practical experiment in applied Christianity, Booker Washington's aim being to make the black man a trained, intelligent, self-supporting, moral citizen and a good Christian. There are other negro settlements, like the Mayesville Institute in South Carolina, and the Steele Orphanage in Chattanooga, Tenn., which are doing excellent service along the same lines in educating and Christianizing the poor, ignorant, neglected negro children.

Our Indian wards present a rather difficult problem, but the Federal government is spending $4,000,000 a year in the earnest endeavor to solve it by supplying suitable schools for the Indian children. There are now 257 schools with 23,000 Indian pupils under government care. It will require more than a generation, however, to eradicate the old savage instincts and the desire for nomadic life and struggle which are the Indian's inheritance. Mission schools have been established by the American Missionary Association and other societies among all the Indian tribes, from the frozen North to the Mexican border. Good buildings with competent teachers and suitable equipment have taken the place of the old log-house. Among the Omahas, Winnebagoes, Foxes and Sacs, Nez Percés, Chippewas, Kickapoos, Chickasaws, Dakotas, Senecas, Sioux, and other tribes much spiritual work has been done in recent years and many native churches and Sunday Schools are now in operation. All the leading denominations are represented.

We have given only a partial glimpse of the great home mission work that lies before us as a Christian nation. This vast field, right at our doors, must not be neglected. It is the individual duty of every Christian to be represented in it and to remember that Jesus himself was the model for all home missionary workers, as in his own native land he went about preaching, teaching and "doing good."

Beans are 84 per cent nutriment.

Yet note how cheap they are. See what you would save if you served them daily—served them in place of meat. And you can. Your people will never get tired of them when you serve Van Camp's. We pay $2.50 per bushel to get the best beans grown. To have them picked out by hand from the choicest Michigan crops. We could buy beans for 30 cents.

We spend five times as much to make our tomato sauce as the price of some sauce ready-made.

But we use only vine-ripened tomatoes. Not tomatoes picked green; not scraps from a canning factory.

The difference shows in that sparkling zest, that richness, that tang. You don't know how much you are missing until you once try Van Camp's.

Van Camp's pork and beans baked with tomato sauce

Van Camp's beans are all baked alike—baked until they are mealy. Yet they are nutty because they are whole. We bake in live steam—that's the reason.

Van Camp's have a delicious plend. That comes from baking the beans, the tomato sauce and the pork all together.

Van Camp's are not heavy, not hard to digest. That's because we apply more than twice the heat that you do. We separate the particles so the digestive juices can get to them.

In home-baking this is impossible. You lack the steam—lack sufficient heat.

Leave the choice to your people. See if they want their beans broken and mushy, or prefer them nutty and whole. See if they like the tomato sauce baked into the beans. See if they want the beans digestible.

They will always choose Van Camp's. And their choice should be your choice. For think what it means to have beans cooked for you; to have them always ready to serve.

Prices: 10, 15 and 20 cents per can

SAPOLIO

Our Sunday School Lesson

BY DR. AND MRS. W. F. CRAFTS*

"LET NO MAN TAKE THY CROWN"

"BLESSED be thou of the Lord." In these words Saul greeted Samuel, the aged prophet, now eighty years old, when he came to Gilgal to deliver a message of doom to King Saul.

"I have performed the commandment of the Lord." So spake Saul. In part he had, but not altogether. God had commanded him to destroy the Amalekites, men, women and children, sheep and cattle, but he had not done it. He had saved King Agag alive, that he might make a grand show as a conqueror, and he had also saved the choicest of the cattle and of the flocks for his own enrichment. It has been said of Saul and the host of Israel that they were executioners of God's will, not marauders seeking plunder, that they were doing a high duty, and it would degrade it in their own eyes and in the opinion of others if they had made it a gain to themselves.

"What meaneth then this bleating of the sheep?" That was circumstantial evidence not only that Saul had disobeyed God, but that he was also a

"The people spared the best of the sheep and of the oxen to sacrifice unto the Lord thy God." Did "the end justify the means?" This is a proverb of the devil. Nothing can ever justify wrong doing. And Saul blamed the people for doing what they would not have dared to do if they had not either been permitted or commanded by their king to do. Responsibility for wrong doing is something that cannot be shifted; it will in the end fall back upon the one to whom it belongs and bear him down. Again, even in stronger terms, Saul repeated his charge against the people, but Samuel was not deceived even though God was mocked.

"To obey is better than sacrifice." Samuel's stinging reproof to the wily king. And Samuel gave Saul a sum in proportion: Rebellion, witchcraft, stubbornness, idolatry.

"He hath rejected thee from being king." Five hundred and fifty years afterwards similar sentence was passed upon King Belshazzar through the prophet Daniel: "Thou art weighed in the balances and found wanting." Saul's sin was something he could not hide from God. He was too much of a coward to own up. Very much wiser was that simple laboring man who said, "Truth must be spoken at any cost. I am to blame and there is nothing for it but to say so."

"I have sinned. . . . I pray thee pardon my sin." He wanted to make Samuel his father confessor. But that was not Samuel's way nor God's way. But Saul was so determined that he took hold of Samuel's mantle, which garment he wore as insignia of his office, a prophet. So vehement was Saul and so opposed was Samuel, that the mantle tore.

"The Lord hath rent the kingdom of Israel from thee this day." Samuel used the incident to impress Saul with the rupture between himself and God.

The Sin of Disobedience

The central truth of this lesson is the sin of disobeying God. To obey or not to obey is a question each individual must decide by himself or herself.

The Bible in its laws is to be thought of, not as a code of new enactment, but as a Deuteronomy—a second utterance of spiritual laws already existing in the nature of things with penalties for their violation. But while the Bible does not enact laws it informs us of them that we may not violate them and thus incur their penalties. God does not punish us arbitrarily, but rather causes us to suffer the consequences of our own evil doing; in a way we may be said to punish ourselves. "Say ye to the righteous that it shall be well with him, for they shall eat the fruit of their doings." Isa. 3: 10. "Woe unto the wicked. It shall be ill with him; for the reward of his hands shall be given him." Isa. 3: 11.

This law of the moral seed time and harvest has an important bearing on the use of rewards and punishments as an incentive to righteousness. How often we hear the expression, "I won't be frightened into religion."

Suppose a man is sowing thistle seed in the rich soil of his prairie farm, either through ignorance or carelessness or recklessness. A friend comes to him and says: "Don't you know the seed you are sowing will fill your ground and your neighbor's with Canada thistles? Get some first-class wheat and corn and sow that for a profitable harvest." He replies, "Oh, you can not frighten me into sowing the right kind of seed, nor will I be influenced in favor of wheat by the reward of the harvest. If I sow wheat it will be only that it is right and beautiful to do so." The fact is, God has made us in such a way that we are influenced by rewards and retributions, and wisely so in the inner as well as the outer life, and the person who pretends to be above the influence of rewards and retributions is either deceiving others or himself. Those who think themselves wiser teachers than Christ, and attempt to do Christian work without applying motives of reward and punishment, become unconscious helpers of those who deny these truths, and the result is the revival of vice, such as stains many a page of history. Cicero, about fifty years before Christ, taught that sin is not to receive retribution or punishment. His heaven corrupted the whole lump. Even the best fabric of the Roman Empire went down in the mire. From the twelfth to the sixteenth centuries Rome sold indulgences, and for money took up divine retributions. Soon immorality engulfed the Papal States. Sin became too vile for record, and nothing saved the world but the Reformation.

The Harvest of Youth

Let us not forget that the law applies to the soul as well as to the soil. "Whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap," not only in eternity but also here. Manhood and womanhood are the harvest of youth's seed time, and that harvest in one's body, mind and soul depends on the sowing. A young minister was staying over night in a gentleman's house. A little girl, about four years of age, began to chat and play with the guest. The minister took the little girl upon his knee and began to talk to her in a very interesting way about Jesus. He said: "Now I am going to tell you one thing I hope you will never forget. Will you remember what I am going to say?" She looked with her bright clear eyes into his face and said: "Oh, yes, what is it?" Then putting his hands gently on her head he slowly said: "My dear, if you don't love Jesus you never can be happy." And again he asked: Will you remember that? The child said: "Yes." About thirty years after that visit the minister was called to that same village. When they were seated at the breakfast table, the hostess, whose husband and children were also at the table, all at once looked very earnestly at him, and inquired whether he had ever been there before. He could not remember. She then mentioned one or two things that brought the circumstance to his mind that he had been there in the beginning of his ministry. Presently he remembered the house in which he was a guest for one night. The lady reminded him how he spoke those impressive words of counsel to a little girl. "If you don't love Jesus you never can be happy." She said, "I was that little girl. Often your words came to my memory and remained in my mind even when I was giddy and thoughtless. Those words were the means, many years ago, of bringing me to love my Saviour."

We do not know what was done for Saul in the seedtime of his life. We can hardly think the parental instruction which he received was of a very good quality, although the family name was "Matri," which means "the reign of Jehovah." Had he learned obedience at home it is not probable that he would have given so notorious an example of disobedience to the God of the Universe.

But the goods thus gained under false pretense were not left for Saul to enjoy. Samuel slew King Agag; "hewed him in pieces before the Lord in Gilgal." I. Sam. 15: 33. We are not told as to the flocks and herds, but certainly they were never sacrificed to the Lord, but undoubtedly the commands of the Lord were carried out by Samuel, who had them slain as was done with the flocks and herds of Achan. Saul was forsaken of both God and man. Some one has said "that stolen goods are sweet." Are they?

One does not need to go to Beluchistan to learn of a stolen bicycle, but a story is told of a Pathan, living in that wild land, who stole a bicycle. He went off to the hills with his spoil. Away from the haunts of men he rested the bicycle against a stone, as he had seen the owner do, and got on. It did not move. Then he hit it with his stick. Still it did not move. He spoke to it in Pushtu. But that had no effect upon it. Then he went and found a friend who understood English, for now he was sure that, being the property of an Englishman, it needed someone to bid it move in the English tongue. "Go on," shouted his friend. Still the bicycle remained just where it was. The two men took it to a sloping road. The friend who understood English pushed while the Pathan rode the bicycle. Then the bicycle began to move merrily and swiftly down the hill. But the rider soon lost his nerve; he guided it against a rough stone and he was thrown heavily to the ground. He rose in a great rage and beat it once more with his stick. At length, thinking that the English "horse" was uncanny, he hoisted it on his back, carried it to the edge of the precipice, and threw it over.

In one way or another, stolen articles never bring much satisfaction to those who steal them; generally they bring misery; frequently they bring them to grief.

MADE RIGHT

It Won the Banker.

"At the age of seventeen I was thrown on my own resources," writes the cashier of a Western Bank, "and being low finances I lived at a cheap boarding house where they served black coffee three times a day."

"At first my very nature rebelled, but soon became accustomed to it, and after while thought I could not get along without it."

"I worked hard during each school term (I was attending college) and taught count school between times."

"At the end of three years I had finished my course—my nerves, too, and I went back to the farm to rest up. This did me some good, but I kept on drinking coffee, not realizing that it caused my trouble, and later accepted a position in a bank."

"About this time I was married and my acquaintances called me 'Slim.' On the advice of a friend, my wife began to serve Postum and she made it right from the start (boiled it 15 minutes after boiling actual starts). I liked it and have used it exclusively for three years. I am no longer dubbed slim, my weight has increased 6 pounds and I have nerves to stand any strain without a flinch. And I have increased my salary and my shares of bank stock. I can work 15 hours a day, sleep soundly and get up feeling like a healthy boy." "There's Reason."

Here's THE Great FIRELESS COOKER So Much Talked About

Write for Low Price Direct to You

COOKING teachers are lecturing about THE Fireless Cooker—Magazines are printing articles about it—it is talked about everywhere as one of the greatest inventions that was ever granted to mankind—and THE Fireless Cooker is a proved success.

Get either a 1 or 2 or 3-compartment Fireless Cooker according to your needs. Each is shipped Complete READY TO USE in cooking your meals at once.

Each includes Improved Agate Ware Cooking Utensils with Patented Locking, Non-Rusting Aluminum Covers and Non-Rusting Metal Compartments which are easily kept perfectly clean. Everything absolutely sanitary.

Here is one of thousands of voluntary testimonial letters received from customers who are using our Fireless Cookers. Joseph W. Estabrook, Treas. of Brotherhood Accident Co. of Boston, writes:

"We immediately made use of the cooker as soon as it was delivered to us, and it certainly has proved ten times its worth at the present time. My wife would not take $100.00 for it if she could not replace same. It is doing all that you have advertised to do, in the most satisfactory manner. Meats and vegetables both retain their flavor and are cooked in better shape than could be done on a coal or gas fire. You can use my name in this matter if you so desire."

ALL we ask is permission to let THE Fireless Cooker prove itself at home, that it will—Save three-fourths of your fuel bills—Save three-fourths of your time—Save your cooking utensils and your food—Make your food twice as delicious and nutritious—Keep odors of cooking food from circulating through your home—Keep your kitchen many degrees cooler on hot days—Do away with practically all of the trouble, hard work, worry, care and inconvenience of hot fire cooking.

With our genuine Fireless Cooker boiling, steaming or stewing food becomes thoroughly done in the airtight metal compartments without watching—without fuel and without trouble—it is impossible for anything to spoil, burn or boil dry.

You can plainly see that THE Fireless Cooker will pay for itself in a very short time on the fuel it saves alone, and then it will pay back its cost to you many times over every year.

Now, we want to send you THE Fireless Cooker Direct From the Factory At Lowest Wholesale Prices With Complete Cooking Utensils On 30 Days' Free Trial —and then if you think you can afford to keep house without it, we will take it back and refund every penny you have paid us. Simply send us your name and address on a postal and we will send you absolutely free, postpaid, a book on Fireless Cookery, with recipes, prepared expressly for us by a Culinary Expert. Every housewife needs to know the things this book tells. Address now:

Questions and Answers

Subscriber, Ottawa, Ont., Can. Can you name some cities and towns in the United States and Canada that would be ten miles or more away from where intoxicating liquors can be obtained?

Such towns and cities may be easily found in prohibition States, ten miles or more away from the State line. Of course, we refer to obtaining liquors legally. It is possible that liquors may be secured illegally anywhere.

J. H. B., Wichita, Kan. What was the difference between the resurrected body of Christ and the resurrected body of Lazarus?

Lazarus' resurrection was the revivification of his corporeal body, the complete restoration of the life which had passed out of it at dissolution and the effacement of every trace of disease and decomposition. It was different in the case of the Saviour; his body, unbroken on the cross, lay uncorrupted in the grave until the moment when he reassumed it, perfect and whole. It had not seen corruption. Our Lord took special pains to impress upon his disciples the fact that in his crucified body he was actually raised to life. He appealed to the testimony of their own senses. He remained forty days on earth after his resurrection in the same body in which he was crucified.

Mrs. Victoria C., Utica, N. Y., writes:

We received your nice Bible at Easter. It cheered the heart of my husband, who has been ill of nervous prostration. We love THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. It cheers us with the sweet words of the dear Master. The good your paper does gladdens our hearts.

Mrs. W. S., Menominee, Mich. 1. Where in Jeremiah do you find the record of the prophet hiding the Ark of the Covenant? 2. What is the New Theology? 3. Can you tell me what Christian psychology is?

1. The passage to which you refer is probably Jer. 3: 16, but it is nowhere stated that Jeremiah hid the Ark. Nothing is known of its hiding-place, and all conjecture is useless. It may have been taken away or destroyed by the Babylonians. 2. It is a species of doctrine formulated by Rev. Reginald Campbell, of London, and is set forth in his book, The New Theology. It discards much of the Scriptures, gives new interpretations and leaves the divinity of Christ in doubt. It is regarded as heterodoxy by the regular churches. 3. We are not familiar with the cult you mention, which is one of many that have sprung up of late years.

Teacher, Vancouver, B. C. Didymus being a "twin," is Matthew supposed to be his other half?

It is not positively known who Thomas' twin brother or sister was. One tradition is that he had a twin-sister named Lysia; another that he was a twin-brother of Jesus. In the catalogue of the apostles, he is coupled with Matthew. There is nothing absolutely authentic on the subject.

Mrs. C. A. S., Red Wing, Minn. Will you kindly solve to us the meaning of the "unjust steward" in Luke 16?

This parable, more than all the others, has excited discussion and varied opinions. It divides men into two classes: the children of the world and the children of light, and points out that the former excel the latter in the shrewdness with which they prosecute their proper business—they are wiser "in their generation." Yet all their efforts and their wisdom are wasted on perishable things. At the same time, they should not excel the children of light in anything. By the help of the "mammon of unrighteousness"—the money at their control—the children of light should make friends for themselves and their righteous cause. They should put their wealth to the best and highest advantage. The unjust steward was selfishly shrewd and worldly wise; the Lord's people should be able to make their riches and influence serve a good cause at least as effectively as the world's people make theirs serve an ignoble one.

Mrs. John D., Atlantic, Pa. What do you consider the tenth?

The first law on the subject ordained that the tenth of all produce of the ground and of all animals should be devoted to the Lord. In modern usage it is usually construed to mean one-tenth of the gross income.

The rector of Christ Church, Chicago, kindly sends the following in regard to a recent query about the Reformed Episcopal Church:

The revision of the prayer book came after the consecration of the Bishops. The revision of the prayer book was not the work of Bishop for recalling it; or unless both parties consider they have made a mistake and agree to dissolve the obligation.

N. A. I., Soo, Mich. What is the injunction process?

An injunction is "a decree in a court of equity requiring a party named therein to abstain from doing an act or to do something which in justice he should do for the benefit of another. The first," says Nelson's Encyclopædia, "are restrictive injunctions, and the latter mandatory. Injunctions are not issued to restrain the commission of crime, but will be to prevent nuisance or interference with contract rights and rights of property."

D. E. W., Boston, Mass. 1. What do you consider is gambling? 2. If a man buys a house on instalments, is it gambling? 3. If a man buys butter, eggs or other goods and puts them in storage for a rise is that gambling?

1. Any investment or outlay the result of which depends upon chance is gambling. Any game of chance. 2. No.

He taught the doctors in the temple 12, was baptized at 30, began his public ministry at 30 (or 31), which continued approximately three years, ending with the crucifixion.

Mrs. M. C. K., Orlando, Fla. Please explain passage of Scripture occurring in Christ's conversation with Nicodemus (John 3), "no man hath ascended up to heaven but that came down from heaven, even the Son of Man which is in heaven."

Commentators agree that the meaning of the passage is that "perfect knowledge of God is not attained any man's going up from earth heaven to receive it—no man hath ascended; but He whose proper habitation is his essential and eternal nature is heaven, hath, by taking human flesh, descended as the Son of Man disclose the Father."

H. J. C., Blooming Prairie, Minn. 1. Why is pride so often spoken of as a laudable trait? Christian character when in God's word is only spoken of in terms of condemnation. 2. Why are the Scripture passages contained 1. Tim. 2: 9, 10, and 1. Peter 3: 3, 4 so generally ignored by professing Christians?

1. Pride, or inordinate self-esteem is a sin and can not be truthfully spoken of as a laudable trait. Some speakers and writers, however, use the phrase "proper pride," meaning self-respect or dignity, which should not be confounded with pride. 2. At a time in which Paul wrote the epistle Grecian society was corrupt and the scale of public morals very low. It was therefore, especially needful that I should warn believers against the besetting sins of the day, which included immodesty and extravagance in dress. His advice holds good for the Christians of our day. The same remark apply also to Peter's epistle.

M. S. H., Lakeland, Fla., writes:

One of your correspondents asked about rice when it was brought to America. A captain from Madagascar stopped at Charleston, S. C., and was invited to dine with Governor Smith, who was governor in 1694. They spoke of agriculture the colony, and the captain said: "Governor, this climate is like Madagascar, and I have grain they raise there very successfully. I would give you a quart or two if you would like to try it." The governor cultivated it in his garden, watering it bountifully, and raised enough to be able to give it to his friends to experiment with. From these small beginnings the vast rice culture grew.

A. W. H., Parkhill, Ont., Can. The coming of Christ was the fulfilment of the promise of the ages. He came to give light to a world sunk in sin, yet for which the Father had an infinite love (see John 3: 16). The Saviour's redeeming work, by virtue of which all penitent believers are reconciled to God and freed from the penalties of sin, cannot be properly defined in a brief paragraph. We advise you to read up the whole subject of the Atonement thoroughly, first in the New Testament itself and next in a good Biblical encyclopedia, which you will find in any good library.

Using X-Rays to Locate a Ring Swallowed by an Elephant

IN an effort to locate a diamond ring, valued at $450, which an elephant had swallowed, three expert X-ray operators and four elephant trainers worked a whole day, photographing by the X-ray process the interior of the elephant. It was the first time that X-ray pictures had been made of an elephant. In making the plates, the largest X-ray machine ever made was used. The side of the elephant was marked off into sections and numbered. A diagram was also made with corresponding numbers to serve to locate the exact spot in which the missing ring is lodged, after the plates are developed. At first it was necessary to allow the elephant to become accustomed to the crackling of the X-ray coil. Then, when she was induced to lie down upon the plateholder containing the sensitive X-ray plate, and the Crooke's tube was held over the first section, she became frightened at the glare in the tube. At last she lay comparatively still until several plates had been exposed. Then the elephant accidentally received a shock from one of the wires. With an ear-piercing trumpet she leaped to her feet and she was quieted only after receiving a liberal portion of hay and about three pounds of sugar. She gave no more trouble.

F. L. C., Millwood, Calif. 1. Did Jesus teach unfaithfulness when he said to Judas, "What thou doest, do quickly"? 2. Should the engagement vow be considered sacred? Is a Christian justified in breaking such without a cause other than his own fickle heart?

1. No; he knew that the betrayal had already been arranged and that it would shortly be consummated. The presence of Judas was a restraint on the others at that last solemn gathering, and Jesus had certain things to say to them which could not apply to Judas, therefore he bade him go. 2. It is sacred and should be kept, unless substantial reasons can be given

3. It is a speculative investment, but not gambling, as it is not governed by chance but by the laws of trade, i. e., of supply and demand.

C. F. W., Leavenworth, Kan., writes:

B. M., Pittsfield, N. H., asks the question, "Can a man be saved without a change of heart or being born again?" and then quotes John 3: 16. I want to call his attention to I. John 5: 1: "Whosoever believeth that Jesus is the Christ is born of God." John 3: 7: "Ye must be born again" (margin, "from above"). It is very plain that he that believeth according to John 3: 16, is born again.

E. H. J., Coaldale, W. Va. How long was it from the time Christ began to teach in the temple before the doctors and wise men until he was baptized by John? Did he perform any miracles before he was baptized? What was his age when he was crucified?

The Scriptures record no miracles by Jesus before his baptism, although early writers mention many that are purely legendary or traditional, connected with his infancy and childhood.

Waiting for the Boat

The Boston Floating Hospital

Leaving the Boat

THE WHITE SHIP OF HEALING

WHAT a blessing it would be if on the hot, sweltering days of midsummer the infant hospitals of the dusty, crowded streets of our great cities could be transported far down the harbors, away from the noise and dirt and confusion of the tenements, down where the cool, life-giving breezes blow, and the fresh salt air might have a chance to revive the little, drooping, wilted bodies!

There are a few boats which do make daily trips down the harbors of some of our cities in the summer months, carrying sick babies and children for a day's excursion; but as yet there is, in all the world, but one boat on whose decks the merciful work of a modern, fully-equipped hospital goes steadily on, day and night, in the hot summer season. This "great white ship of healing" is the Boston Floating Hospital, a palatial refuge to the anxious mothers of the tenements in Boston's historic North End. And what a refuge it is! For most mothers have a horror of the word "hospital," largely due to the fact that it means separation from their little ones, who are so often taken there by the dreaded ambulance. To the Floating Hospital the mother brings her baby in her arms and after it is admitted as a patient she can remain with her child all day, if she likes. If she is obliged to go home to care for other children the mother feels satisfied that everything is being done for her child that can possibly be done, and that her dear little sick baby can rest much better in its cool white bed, surrounded by every medical care, than in the hot, crowded tenement which she calls home.

When a mother brings her baby to the Hospital's pier at North End Park, she finds many other mothers carrying other sick little ones. Near the gangway several young doctors are examining the applicants and filling out admission cards. Her baby is passed on in turn to the head doctor, who makes some notes on the admission card and says a few words to the waiting nurse. The latter takes the baby from the mother and they hurry on board. The baby's clothes are removed and she is put into a little white cot in the permanent ward; all about are many other cots, filled with very sick babies. An interpreter tells the mother that she can stay on board all day with her baby, but she remembers her other little ones at home and says, "No, I will come again this afternoon when the boat gets in at five o'clock."

Meanwhile the doctors and nurses are rapidly caring for many other cases; soon the two hundred and fifty little beds are filled and there is no more room. Two-thirds of the babies are very ill and have been assigned to the permanent wards, to remain on board until cured; the other third must be taken ashore after they have had eight hours of invigorating sea air.

Many of the nurses are busy with the children's mothers, answering their anxious inquiries and instructing them in proper care and feeding. Not the least of the benefits of the Hospital has been the education of the mothers, who, while accompanying their children on the trips or in the intervals on shore, learn from the trained attendants many simple rules of hygiene. So many ignorant mothers have given their babies pickles, onions, green apples, tea, beer and even whisky. Not infrequently has a mother come down to the boat with a sick baby who had a pickle in his mouth!

While the boat is at the pier the visiting physician comes aboard. He is a busy city doctor with a large practice, who gives up a part of his summer vacation to help the good cause.

Every day at nine o'clock the boat leaves her pier, steams slowly out past the Navy Yard; Christ Church on her right, old Bunker Hill monument on her left. She is greeted by the whistles of many other vessels on her way down the harbor, but her captain only dips the flag in reply, lest the sharp sound of the whistle on board might disturb the precious cargo. No sight in Boston Harbor arouses more interest and enthusiasm, not even Old Ironsides herself, than does this beautiful "white ship of mercy," her funnels bearing the red cross, on her way to the life-giving air of the outer harbor.

Accessibility is the secret of her superiority over all other summer hospitals for infants. All during the hot days she is stationed where ozone and cooling breezes can do their energizing work, but after sundown, when anxious parents wish to see their dear ones, she returns to her pier in the heart of the tenement district, and no long expensive trip to a distant seaside hospital has to be undertaken by the mothers and fathers to whom every cent and every minute is precious.

Very modest were the beginnings of Boston's floating hospital. In 1894 five experimental day trips were made on a hired barge with only volunteer service. In 1895 thirteen day trips were made under this same system. In 1897 the barge Clifford was bought and equipped to care for 150 sick infants and children.

Until 1898 only day-patients were cared for, as is the case on the two large boats of the St. John's Guild of New York City, but in that year a change was made which revolutionized the work and multiplied its good results. This was the establishment of two permanent wards and the organization of night service.

So many, many times the doctors and officers had seen desperately-ill babies taken back to hot, stuffy rooms in the dismal tenements, only to lose all the benefit gained in the day's trip, that they could

A SERMON BY Bishop William F. Anderson*

The Doctrine of Immortality

TEXT—JOB 14: 14
“If a man die, shall he live again?”

THIS is an ancient, universal and important question. That it is ancient is immediately apparent. It comes to us from one of the greatest documents of the world of antiquity, and must have been in the minds of men even before thus formulated by Job. We can easily believe that the first man who ever stood upon the earth must have propounded it to himself as he came face to face with death.

It is also true that the substance of the inquiry has been more or less distinctly in the minds of all men from the beginning. It has now become a well established fact that no race of men has ever been found without the religious ideal. All heathen worlds have had their conception of God and a future life. When the Indian died his comrade buried him with bow and arrow by his side, that he might be equipped for new triumphs in the happy hunting ground of the fathers. Crude though these conceptions have been, yet they are very significant. St. Paul has stated the deepest truth in the life of heathenism in the passage, “That they might seek the Lord, if haply they might feel after him and find him.” So it is not an overstatement of fact to characterize this as a universal question.

Denials of Immortality

The due appreciation of the importance of the question is begotten in our hearts by the experiences of life. So long as the circle of our immediate loved ones remains unbroken, and while we ourselves are in possession of vigorous health, we are likely to leave the question in the realm of our remoter thought. But on that day when we stood by a loved form and tried to follow the departing spirit into the vast unseen, the question betook to itself a new and deeper significance. And as the loveliness of earth's scenes fades from our own sight away, it will become to each of us in turn, an inquiry of tremendous import. “If a man die shall he live again?” To whom shall we turn for a trustworthy answer to a question of such transcendent significance?

Listening to one class of minds we hear a categorical “No.” There are those who reply very promptly, and with great show of confidence in their opinion, that there is no life beyond; that death ends all. But there is something in each of us which protests strongly against extinction, and we can not accept this conclusion without at least inquiring carefully into the grounds of it. How do these men know that death means the obliteration of all the powers of the soul? We recall the established law of logic that “it is never safe to predicate a universal negative.” No man is warranted in saying there is no future life until, with clear and penetrating vision, he has ranged the whole universe of God and found nothing. Who endured these unbelievers with such insight that they are able to give an emphatic no, with reference to a fact so spiritual in its nature as the fact of a future life? The truth is, that the men who so answer pay little heed to spiritual reality of any sort whatever. For the most part they are of the earth, earthy. “The natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God: for they are foolishness unto him; neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned.” Upon purely logical grounds, therefore, we may reject their verdict as of no consequence.

Science and the Hereafter

The reply of another class demands a more respectful hearing. I refer to the men who devote their lives to the study of science. They are not to be characterized unworthily. The world owes them a large debt of gratitude. They include all phases of opinion as to religion, from the shallow skeptic to the devout believer. What is their answer to this question? They are accustomed to proceed carefully at each step of the way towards a conclusion. Can they throw any light on this important inquiry? Strictly speaking it is a question which entirely transcends their realm. Were it not that the heart presses the issue, they might fulfil every requirement of their chosen profession, and leave the question forever untouched. They tell us of the discovery of two laws in their realm which may possibly have some bearing upon the subject. These laws are known as “the indestructibility of matter” and “the conservation of energy.” No particle of matter and no ounce of force, they tell us, has been destroyed from the beginning. Both matter and force may be changed in outward form, but neither may be obliterated. Now if this be true, it would seem no violation of the law of reason to infer that spirit, which is confessedly above matter and material force and master of them both, may not be destroyed. Reasoning from analogy, it seems a sort of prophecy of the immortality of the soul; an intimation at least that death may not end all. But this form of reasoning is neither conclusive nor satisfying. The best word the scientist, unaided by revelation, has for us is a “perhaps”; “it may be so.” We are still in mid air. But this is no fault of science. Our question does not belong properly to this realm.

The Searchings of Philosophy

But we now turn to the highest class of the world's teachers—its philosophers. Proceeding upon the foundation work of the scientists, they have gone far beyond into the regions of pure thought. Certainly they can bring us an answer which will satisfy our minds and bid our hearts cease from fear. They tell us of this universal longing for enduring existence; that “the hope of the future life has always been nestled in the heart of the race and found wings upon occasion.” Plato and others have reasoned that there must be an outward reality answering to this universal postulate of the human mind. Else what is its significance? Is it probable that the mind of man unaided would conceive for itself a destiny greater and more enduring than that provided by its Creator? If man is not immortal “nature has imposed upon her sons and made them a lie.” The form of the argument has force. It appeals to us as rational, and points to the probability of a future life. But, as with the reasoning of the scientist, the conclusion is not satisfying. It is at best only a sort of prophecy—an intimation. It lacks the authority, the certainty, which the heart demands. We have not yet proceeded beyond the twilight.

The spirit and teaching of the Old Testament do not advance much beyond this point. There are some indistinct anticipations of the doctrine of eternal life. But death still holds sway. Its pall has not been lifted. “The prevalent conception in the Old Testament time is illustrated by the figures which are used in the Old Testament to illustrate death; and very marked is the contrast between the figures in the Old Testament and the figures in the New Testament. My life, says one writer, is like water poured out upon the ground: there is no hope of gathering it again—it is gone, absolutely, hopelessly, entirely gone. My life, says another, is like a shadow: it is here this moment, it has disappeared the next. My life, says another, is like a cloud: it hangs in the heavens for an hour, then the sun rises, blots it out of existence, it disappears—other clouds may come, that cloud will not return again. Life, says one, is like a shepherd's tent: it is taken down—will it be set up again? He does not know, he does not suggest. The tent is gone. Life is like a thread in a weaver's loom: it is broken, it is cut—will some skilful hands gather the ends of these threads and knot them together again and go on with the weaving? He does not know. It is cut—the end has come. These are the figures of the Old Testament. I fail to find one that has in it the hopes which run through the figures of the New Testament.” If the question were left here then might we say with the apostle, “We are of all men most miserable.”

What Jesus Revealed

But we hear another voice speak. It is that of the Man of Nazareth, supreme among all earth's teachers. What has he to tell us? We are struck with his behavior at the death scene. He does not act like other men here. In its dread presence every other man in history meekly acknowledges defeat. Not so Jesus of Nazareth. He carries in himself to every death hour which he meets, a conscious and sublime superiority to its power. His perfect composure in the house of Jairus, at the gates of Nain and by the grave of Lazarus is striking, impressive. Death is present at these scenes, but Jesus is still Master. At will he touches a hidden spring of power and the dead come forth. Well may Napoleon exclaim, “I know men and I tell you that Jesus Christ is not a man.”

Listen to his words at the grave of Lazarus: “I am the resurrection and the life: he that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live; and whosoever liveth and believeth in me shall never die.” There is no suggestion here of a mere prophecy—a vague intimation. “Perhaps,” “probably,” “it may be so,” have no place in the utterance of that solemn hour. The form of his speech is the most positive and emphatic known to language. “He that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live; and whosoever liveth and believeth in me shall never die.” His words have the clear ring of authority. They beget confidence in the certainty of their fulfilment.

But did not our Lord become subject to death? Ay, for a time he did. The only way really to conquer an enemy is to meet that enemy fairly and squarely, to enter into actual conflict with it; to let it do its worst, and to determine in the light of the issue who is victor. This is what Christ did by submitting to death. And after it had exploited its full power upon him, he came forth from its horrid grasp, triumphant, alive for evermore.

The resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead may, with all confidence, be now accepted as the best established fact of ancient history. There is not time to-day to enter fully into the argument. Every honest man can easily do that for himself. Suffice it here to say that the argument is both cumulative and convincing. The power of a living Church to-day alone attests it sufficiently. We have found certain intimations of immortality, but here is the proof of it, clear, positive, trustworthy, absolute. And this conscious victor declares, “Because I live, ye shall live also.” Immortality for the children of God by faith in his dear Son is no longer a debatable question. It is an assured fact, certain as God. “Now is Christ risen from the dead, and become the first fruits of them that slept.”

What the Church Needs

The Church of God needs to develop in its life a new and stronger consciousness of this all-glorious truth. The minor strain is heard too often in song, in prayer, in testimony and in sermon. Let the fact be fully accepted and we shall have the note of victory everywhere. And then shall the joy of the Lord be our strength as in the olden time. The Christ whom we serve lives. He triumphs by the power of an endless life. So should his church.

“Jesus and the resurrection” was the burden of the preaching of the early Church. It must be so of every age, if the age is to be strong in faith. As preachers of the Gospel of the everlasting Son of God, we have little to do primarily with the speculations of science and philosophy. The hearts of men under the stress of life's burdens call for a teaching upon this important subject which shall beget strength for life's daily conflict. To be content to speculate about it, is to weary their souls and to give them a stone for the bread of life.

The note of certainty on this great doctrine is one of the strong points in the poetry of Robert Browning, and makes him pre-eminently the preacher's poet. How a sure confidence in the life eternal rings out from his rugged verse! If there be a clearer note in the age's poetry than in its preaching, the poetry will command the larger hearing, and the preachers will have no just ground for complaint. One of Browning's lovers has thus beautifully addressed him:

Thou art so sure! Thy song is fraught
With that which saint and seer have sought
In vain to demonstrate. What spirit brings Thee surety? Others hope; thou say'st “I know
The spirit is immortal!” And for thy confidence
In that which was our mothers' ground of trust
We thank thee—thou so nobly learn'd, so just
In judgment, thought, and feeling; so intense
In all that makes a man—we give thee praise
And thanks, thou trusting soul, midst doubting days.

Moreover, the immortal life to the sons of God is not a speculation as to the distant future. It is a present possession, a conscious experience. There is but one life and we are now living it; and those who have gone beyond, share with us a life which to them has deepened and broadened, but which is the same life they lived by our side. We are not to become immortal by some mysterious change at death. We are immortal; the life of immortality is ours to-day. “I feel in myself the future life,”

BRYAN CHOSEN AT DENVER

AFTER two exciting conventions the country has again settled down for a short breathing spell before the opening of the great political campaign in the fall. All were interested in the work of the delegates at Chicago and Denver, for, though it seemed a foregone conclusion as to who would be chosen at both places as standard-bearers of the respective parties, yet there is always a chance that something, even at the last moment, may change the drift of events. Hardly had the echoes of the cheers for Mr. Taft died away at Chicago before all eyes were turned towards Denver to see who would be named there. Mr. Bryan's large majority at the Democratic Convention settled on one ballot who was to be the standard-bearer of his party in the forthcoming struggle for the presidency.

Denver threw wide its hospitable doors to the visiting delegates and gave them a hearty Western welcome. A large amount of money was pledged by citizens and the decorations and entertainment were on a most lavish scale. Outside of the convention hall was a huge pile of snow bearing a banner inscribed, "From summer's glow to winter's snow." The interior of the hall was gay with bunting, trees and palms stood in the corners, while thousands of plants softened the harsh outlines of posts and platform. Roses were everywhere, a unique decoration for a political convention auditorium.

On the first day over 9,000 people crowded in, though less than 1,000 were delegates. The time was given to the work of organization and to speeches by Judge Parker and other prominent delegates. The second day was notable for the demonstration in favor of Mr. Bryan which was started by Senator Gore of Oklahoma and which lasted over an hour.

Mr. Bryan was nominated at half past three on the morning of Friday, July 10. The convention met at seven the day before for its evening session. All felt that no matter how long they might wait, the standard bearer of the Democrats for the campaign of 1908 would be chosen before the delegates left the hall. Although from the drift of sentiment among the delegates every one was practically certain as to who would be chosen for the first place on the ticket, there was, nevertheless, a feeling of excitement that pervaded both those on the floor and those who were mere watchers in the galleries. The hall was densely packed with people, all of whom were suffering more or less from the intense heat and close atmosphere. Many of the men removed their coats and sat in their shirt sleeves, but they remained good natured. The cowboy band played incessantly, and the crowd sang popular airs and waved small American flags, thousands of which had been distributed. From the upper gallery the entire hall seemed a tossing sea of color.

The committee on platform was late in making its report and a committee of three was appointed to find out when the report might be expected. Meanwhile prominent Democrats came to the platform and made speeches to fill in the time until the real work of the evening might be commenced. When it was found that the platform would not be ready until midnight, it was moved that the convention proceed at once to the nomination of candidates and the rules were suspended to allow this.

The Secretary began the roll-call of the States. Alabama came first and the chairman of the State delegation announced that they would yield its place to Nebraska. Mr. I. J. Dunn, of Omaha, a personal friend of Mr. Bryan, advanced to the front to present the name of the Democratic leader. As he finished the nominating speech the delegates of most of the States jumped to their feet and cheered wildly. "Hail to the Chief," played the cowboy band, but they might as well have saved their strength, as they could hardly be heard in the tumult which surged up from below. The flashlight guns were turned on and the delegates, bearing the State banners, marched and counter-marched about the hall. The band played "Auld Lang Syne," and the audience began to sing it, and about half way through a large oil painting of Mr. Bryan was lowered from the roof above the speaker's desk. Time and again it seemed as if both the delegates and spectators were exhausted, but the racket would be resumed, flags moved and troops of delegates would again parade around the hall.

Live pigeons were released from the galleries and they flew hither and thither in fright at the clamor from below. The Chairman rapped for order, but the audience in reply swung the stuffed eagles through the air on their perches. The "Red, White and Blue" and "Tammany" were played by the cowboys and then the Chairman tried the expedient of turning down the lights. This had some effect and the band was ordered to stop playing. At last order was restored and the delegates again turned to the business of the evening.

It is said that Mr. Bryan had a private wire run to his house at Lincoln and that, standing by the receiver, he was able to hear the ovation accorded him by his followers when his name was presented.

Ex-Senator Gearin of Oregon seconded the nomination on behalf of the States of the Pacific slope. Governor Glenn of North Carolina and Governor Swanson of Virginia also seconded the nomination. Connecticut gave its place to Minnesota, and Representative Hammond, in a stirring speech, presented the name of Governor Johnson of Minnesota. A great demonstration was at once started which the chairman tried at once to quell, but it lasted many minutes, though the band did not play to help them out. When quiet was restored Delaware presented the name of Judge Gray.

Mr. Bryan's friends said it would be ill luck to have him nominated on Friday, so the clock was stopped when it reached midnight. The roll was called shortly after three and when Mr. Murphy, the leader of Tammany Hall, arose and announced that New York cast its vote for Bryan, there was no doubt as to the result. Mr. Bryan received 892½ votes; Judge Gray received 59½, and Mr. Johnson 46. The total number of votes cast was 998. It was at once moved that Mr. Bryan's nomination be made unanimous. At 3.42 in the morning the delegates made their way from the hall, glad to get to bed after the exciting events of the night, and to snatch a few hours' sleep before they were called upon to consider candidates for second place on the ticket.

The last day's session was one in marked contrast to the one of the night before. There was little cheering and the delegates seemed to be very much in doubt as to who would be chosen to act as Mr. Bryan's running mate. Hardly any of the States seemed to be ready to present a candidate. Indiana began to work earnestly for John Worth Kern. Thomas Taggart of Indiana is a personal friend of Mr. Kern and worked hard for him. Three other names were presented to the convention, but when the question was put Mr. Kern was nominated by acclamation.

In a coming number of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will appear an article on the home life of Mr. Bryan.

wrote Victor Hugo. "I am like a forest once cut down. The new shoots are stronger and livelier than ever. I am rising, I know, toward the sky. The sunshine is on my head. The earth gives me its generous sap, but heaven lights me with the reflection of unknown worlds. You say that the soul is nothing but the resultant of bodily powers. Why then is my soul more luminous when my body begins to fail? Winter is on my head, but eternal spring is in my heart. There I breathe at this hour the fragrance of the lilacs, the violets, and the roses, as at twenty years. The nearer I approach the end, the plainer I hear around me the immortal symphonies of the worlds which invite me. It is marvelous, yet simple. It is a fairy tale, and it is history. For half a century I have been writing my thought in prose and verse, history, philosophy, drama, romance, tradition, satire, ode, and song—I have tried them all. But I feel I have not said the thousandth part of what is in me. When I go down to the grave I can say like so many others, 'I have finished my day's work,' but I cannot say 'I have finished my life.' My day's work will begin again the next morning. The tomb is not a blind alley; it is a thoroughfare. It closes on the twilight to open with the dawn."

Concerning the blessed in that future state, two things are clearly revealed in the New Testament.

They are to be with Christ, and they are to be like Christ. "I go to prepare a place for you. And if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again and receive you unto myself; that where I am there ye may be also." In Christ's immortal prayer he reveals his perfect humanness in the petition, "Father, I will that they also, whom thou hast given me, be with me where I am." Here is a revelation of that natural, tender sentiment, in the heart of Jesus, which makes our homes on earth a foretaste of heaven, and it will make heaven a home-like place. And St. Paul declares that to depart is to be with Christ.

Note what our Lord's presence meant to his followers during the years of his life in the flesh. With him at hand neither hunger, nor disease, nor storm, nor devil, nor death had any terror for them, because he was Master of them all. How touching the confidence of the two sisters at Bethany! "If thou hadst been here my brother had not died." What then shall his glorified presence mean to those who are with him? To be with Christ—this means safety, security. If through the ages of eternity I am permitted to be with him, I shall fear the power of no dread foe which can come from out the nether worlds of darkness and despair.

But this is not all. We are not only to be with him. We are to be like him. "Beloved, now are we the sons of God, and it doth not yet appear what we shall be; but we know that, when he shall appear, we shall be like him; for we shall see him as he is."

To be like him! This means blessedness of character—the fulfilling at last of all our earnest strivings after excellence, attainment fully realized, complete.

Again and again my poor powers have tried in vain to picture to the imagination the high estate of heaven's blessedness. It is useless. But with these two facts clearly revealed I care not. To be with him—this is the guarantee of safety from all harm. To be like him—this is the fruition of all hopes and aspirations. It is enough.

And now since "life and immortality have been brought to light through the Gospel," we behold no longer a dim star shining but faintly through the mists. Our sure doctrine of immortality has become the star of humanity's hope, fixed, full-orbed, and splendid, beaming high upon our pathway, lighting us on to glory and to God.

The pall of death is lifted. Man's enemy is conquered. Let it be peeled forth in song, let it be the grateful acknowledgment in prayer, let it be oft proclaimed in sermon. "There is no death." "Mortality is swallowed up of life. This corruptible must put on incorruption; this mortal must put on immortality."

PEARY SAILS FOR THE ARCTIC

AFTER months of careful preparation the Roosevelt, Commander Peary's ship in which he hopes to at last reach the pole, that long-sought goal of many brave men for generations, is heading up the eastern coast of America on the way to the Arctic. She had been fitted out at New York and the President of the United States, after whom the ship was named, boarded her off Oyster Bay to inspect the vessel and wish her gallant commander godspeed and a safe return.

The Roosevelt is well fitted for the perilous work it will have in the ice-strewn sea that lies between the open Atlantic and the point at which the explorers will disembark for the dash by sledge across the unknown wastes that girdle the top of the world about the pole. She is a screw steamer with three masts, so that sail power can be used both to save coal and also for sole means of propulsion in case anything should happen to the engines. Her bows are high, reinforced and built with the purpose of cutting through the ice. Along the water-line is a belt of steel which will defend the hull from the impact of the ice floes and also help it in cutting through frozen stretches of water. Her engines are most powerful for the size of the vessel. The vessel is to carry provisions for three years. One-half of the supply was taken on at New York, the other half will be put aboard at Sydney, Nova Scotia, the ship's first stop after leaving Oyster Bay, N. Y.

Every bit of available space is utilized for storage of articles needed during the long cruise and stay in the far North. The question of reading matter was brought up the week before the ship sailed. The public heard that the sailors wanted books and periodicals and the way they poured in filled the crew with astonishment. There was enough to start a small town library. Important acquisitions were two active kittens. At present they are quite small, but by the time the ship is settled in the ice, they will be ready to make war on the rats which otherwise would work sad havoc in the hull. Visitors came in large numbers to see the ship before she sailed from New York. Next to the sturdy hull itself, probably the most interesting objects to the general public were the two flags flying from the masts, the flags that had once before gone "farthest north" with Peary, and which may yet wave at the pole.

On July 7, in the early morning, the explorer's ship cast off her lines and started up the East River toward Oyster Bay, on Long Island Sound. Tugs gave three hearty toots as she hove in sight, and the captains of the sound steamers jerked their whistle cords and the whistles shrieked farewell and good luck.

It was an hour before noon when the ship put her nose toward shore at Oyster Bay and the anchor chains rattled into the water as she was made fast for the first stop on her long journey. Captain Bartlett was in command as Commander Peary had come down Long Island on the train to lunch with the President and escort him to the vessel. The ship had started so soon after taking in supplies at New York that the decks were still encumbered with boxes and packages which were yet to be stowed away. The crew, however, hustled about and did all possible to put things shipshape. They strung her with bunting from stem to stern until she had a most festive appearance.

At three in the afternoon the watching crew saw two launches belonging to the presidential yacht Sylph put off from shore. The water was rough and when they came alongside they were with difficulty held steady enough to permit the guests to come on board. The first one to come over the side was President Roosevelt himself, who came up the side ladder as if he had spent his whole life on board a man-of-war. He turned instantly to give a helping hand to Mrs. Roosevelt, Mrs. Peary and Mrs. W. Emlen Roosevelt. The first one to greet the President was little Robert Peary, son of the explorer. The little lad was dressed in a white sailor suit. He stood gravely at attention and brought his hand to his hat brim in salute. The President was greatly pleased, tossed the little sailor up into his arms and then shook hands with him.

Commander Peary showed the party all over the vessel. Glancing down into the forehold they saw four or five Eskimo dogs crouching on the lower deck and panting from the intense heat, which was enough to exhaust a New York City dog, to say nothing of one born and bred amid the Arctic snows. The crew smiled appreciatively when Mr. Roosevelt remarked that they would have cold weather enough before long. The crew themselves have suffered greatly from the "hot wave," and expressed hope, while at the dock in New York, that they would soon be in the more congenial atmosphere "farthest north." Miss Peary, the commander's daughter, started the piano player to show what kind of music the crew would have to help pass the weary hours of the long winter that will intervene. When Mr. Roosevelt was going over the side his launch, he again shook Commander Peary's hand and wished him a safe voyage. "I will reach the pole if it's humanly possible, Mr. President," said the commander earnestly.

Nova Scotia, with his wife, where he will again meet the vessel and take her north to the Arctic. The Roosevelt hoisted anchor soon after the departure of the President, and proceeded up the sound. She carried as passengers little Robert Peary and his sister. The love of exploration seems hereditary, for these young people are keenly interested in all that pertains to the frozen North. Members of the Peary Arctic Club who have done much to push the enterprise feel sanguine that this time the commander will plant his colors near the pole.

THE WHITE SHIP OF HEALING

stand it no longer, and although the accommodations on the old barge Clifford were poor and cramped, yet heroic work was done on her for eight years, until the present beautiful boat was made possible through the generosity of thousands of New Englanders, rich and poor, young and old contributing to her building fund.

And no other boat was ever so admirably planned and adapted for sick babies. She is a twin-screw steamboat, 171 feet long and 44 feet wide. A seaman would at once notice her peculiar superstructure, which is built out almost to the edge of the boat, especially on the hospital deck. Just enough space is left for a narrow passage-way for those who manage the boat on its harbor trips.

The seven permanent wards have a capacity of 150 beds. One of these is an outdoor ward, located in the stern, where patients remain in the open air day and night. The inside wards are supplied with air from which excess of moisture has been removed, and which has been cooled to the proper temperature of 70 or 72 degrees by being passed through the refrigerating plant. So, when outside conditions make it necessary, the windows in certain of the wards can be closed to shut out fog, mist or heat, and the suffering patients still be supplied with fresh, pure, constantly-changing air, at an even temperature.

Articles have been written about the Hospital's wonderful food laboratory. Not dead, sterilized milk for these babies, but milk so pure that its bacterial content is as low as 100 per cubic centimeter, the Boston Board of Health requiring a standard of not more than 500,000 bacteria per cubic centimeter.

From New York, from all parts of the United States, from England, Europe, Australia, come visitors and letters inquiring about the work. It is to be ardently hoped that the ideal facilities of the Boston Floating Hospital will be widely copied, and that its noble work may be carried on in all other cities where little ones suffer with diseases in the summer heat.

AT "THE LADDER OF HEAVEN"

Keepers of Buddha's Shrine

The Lord Abbot of the Temple

At the Temple Gate, Hashidate

By MRS. EVELYN CLARK MORGAN

HASHIDATE means "Ladder of Heaven." The peninsula, a narrow stretch of land which lies like a delicately shaded green ribbon between Miyazu Bay and Iwataki Lake, is beauty-crowned and legend-haunted. We visited it from Kyoto and found our fellow passengers so interesting that five hours seemed but a short railway journey. At every station picturesque groups were coming and going. Priests with shaven heads and large-sleeved coats predominated. They didn't mind fingering your clothing and asking its price or inquiring your age, your "venerable age" if your hair happened to be gray. Women came trooping in, all hatless and with shining black hair. They dropped their straw sandals and in "tabi" (stocking with a toe) mounted the seats and tucked their feet beneath them. Then the babies, the pudgy, cunning, almond-eyed babies, happy and smiling whether making pigeon-toed attempts to walk or hanging on the back of a child a trifle older. At one station we saw a troop of girls going into town to dance the "Cherry Dance." They were young, pretty and whitened and rouged to an astonishing degree. The only place the natural color of the skin could be seen was around the throat and there it was in pointed effect representing peaks of Fujiyama. Now and then along the route bottles of hot milk were served and at noon time dainty little boxes of Japanese or foreign food.

Our train was somewhat belated, so the noon boat had gone when we reached the little town of Miyaza. This gave us time to visit a temple which stood on the summit of a hill in a perfect bower of cherry bloom and commanded a wonderful view of town and bay. When we came down we stopped at a tea and rest house where, dropping our shoes, we reclined upon cushions spread on the spotless matting and sipped sugarless, milkless Japanese tea from tiny cups.

Finally our boat came, an odd little native one. The cabin was reached by ladder-like steps and a seat on its narrow benches or floor did not tempt us, so we spread our rugs on an elevation at the stern of the boat and prepared to enjoy the beauties of the Sea of Japan. In and out among its islands we sailed, thinking each one more beautiful than the last. Before we reached our destination the full moon rose over the hilltops, shedding its light upon the waters with weird and beautiful effect.

When we arrived at Hashidate a messenger met us at the wharf. He came from the Master of the Temple asking us to come directly to the temple, as arrangements had been made to entertain us there. This courtesy was extended to us through an English lady who knew the Master of the Temple and who also accompanied us.

It was indeed a new experience to me to be a temple guest. Before we reached the outer gate we were met by several priests come out to welcome us and to escort us. At the entrance to the temple we had to remove our shoes, but we had come provided with a kind of canvas slipper which we tied on our feet and had some trouble in keeping there.

The cushions upon which we took our seats had been cosily drawn to the centre of the room and hibachi brought to warm us, for the wind was blowing fresh from the sea. Several priests came in to join our circle, they, and every person in the room, bowing low at their entrance. At last, at the close of a service that he was holding, the Master of the Temple came. All remained seated, but bows were lower, foreheads almost touching the floor as he took his place among us. His coming was the signal for the younger priests to serve "temple food," which they did in great variety. The chopsticks now proved very helpful in keeping me fully occupied with but small results.

It was midnight before our lengthy feast was ended and the last priest had departed. Then young disciples brought our futons, soft, thick, silken affairs between which we were soon lost in sleep.

Temple bells, gongs and intonations seemed to follow me into slumberland, till suddenly I realized that tinkling bells and sounding gongs were not all a dream, but that the junior priests were holding their three o'clock A. M. service in the next room.

The Gateway of Am-no-Hashidate

Every one was astir early at the temple. There was a corridor outside of our room, opening to the sea, and there primitive bathing arrangements had been made. A small wooden tub rested on the stone balustrade and beneath it a larger vessel containing icy cold water. There was a long-handled dipper close at hand, a rock was the towel-rack, on which hung blue figured towels of the thinnest texture, and the green turf was the ample jar to receive waste water. When we had breakfasted we were shown through the temple and told that later the Lord Abbot of Nanzen-ji Temple, Kyoto, now visiting Hashidate, would receive us and serve "ceremonial tea."

Serving of ceremonial tea, like the arrangement of flowers, is only acquired by study and long practice. There are different colored dishes for certain seasons of the year and certain occasions, and the ways of preparing and serving it are various and require, I am told, years of study. The process, however, looked simple enough. When we entered the shrine room the Lord Abbot was sitting Buddha-wise upon a cushion. We tried to assume a similar position, but I must confess with rather indifferent success. Then one of the priests began to make the tea. He took a spoonful of tea from the caddy and dropped it in a lacquered bowl, then he poured boiling water over it and stirred it briskly with a little whisk that looked like a bunch of twigs. In this way he prepared each cup separately and another priest placed them before us. When all had been served, the Lord Abbot lifted his cup in both hands and, turning it around three times, drank from it with great gusto, emptying the bowl in three mouthfuls; then, turning it in his hands, he looked in the empty bowl as if to be sure he had consumed every drop. The tea was the greenest and bitterest I have ever tasted in my life.

After we had drained our cups, I had an interesting conversation with the Lord Abbot upon Buddhism, the foundation-stone of which, he informed me, is meditation. It meant sitting motionless for two hours in the position in which Buddha is represented, and repeating incessantly the words, "What is my mind?" for, said the Lord Abbot, "the knowledge of Buddha must come from within; a man must first know himself, and I can only instruct persons when they have shown me their minds." As I listened to him, it seemed to me that Buddhism strongly resembles Christian or mental science, control of the mind over the body being the fundamental principle in each. I tried to get his idea about the creation of the world. I asked him if he did not think that a Supreme Being or Intelligence must have made the earth and all its wondrous beauty. Beyond the statement that Buddhism acknowledged no Creator, I could not get him to go, without, as he expressed it, showing him my mind. I had a feeling that at the end of two hours' meditation in a cramped position I should not have much mind to show, so I turned the conversation upon the beauties of Hashidate. Much to my surprise the Lord Abbot asked me if I would write my impressions of Hashidate in verse. I wrote the following verses and that evening at the request of the Master of the Temple read them in an audience room of the temple before some two hundred priests, disciples and worshippers gathered there upon a festive occasion:

Am-no-Hashidate

Full rises the moon o'er a sapphire sea,
A pillar of fire her light seems to be.

To the water's edge the somber pine grows,
The shore of the islet with pink blossom glows.

I ask in my heart, can scene be more fair?
Murm'ring waves whisper: More fair and more rare.

Then lifting my gaze, a vision I see:
Beauteous temple of Hashidate.

The next morning we left, carrying with us gifts of fans, pictures, and a bowl with a temple text upon it. After reaching Kyoto I received a letter from the Master of the Temple thanking me for the verses and saying that he would have them translated into Japanese, framed and hung in the temple.

The incident seems to me quite a remarkable one. The fact of a woman, a foreigner and a Christian (none of them supposed to be very popular in Japan) being asked to take part in temple exercises, shows a spirit of toleration that I confess I had not looked for in Buddhist or Japanese.

Preaching Discontent

A READER in Angus, Minn., sends this letter apropos of a recent article in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD:

Socialists are charged with sowing the seed of discontent. We plead guilty to that charge. The minister is supposed to sow the seed of discontent. He is anxious to have the people discontented with a life of sin. The Socialist who talks to people from the platform and the soapbox, wishes them to become very discontented with a system that makes poverty the portion of the toiler and is the source of ninety-nine per cent. of the crimes committed to-day. Discontent is the mainspring of progress.

Our correspondent errs in his supposition that the Christian preacher has a mission "to sow the seed of discontent." On the contrary, his duty is to urge men to come out of the Adullam cave into the sunlight of the Gospel and of freedom, where discontent is impossible. A discontented Christian would be an anomaly. He has a zest and a direct purpose in existence; his spiritual attitude and relationship emancipate him from discontent. He works with all his might, but never with a growl.
He has the right perspective of things, and even while he strives the hardest to make the world better, there is a song in his heart—the song of hope and of perfect confidence in God, that he will make all things right in his own good time.

So, while there are undeniably many wrongs to be righted, reforms to be urged and defects in our public system to be remedied, let us look at them sanely and as men who have broader views and higher ideals than those who are mere stirrers-up of strife. This widespread sowing the seed of discontent is an ominous sign of our times. It makes the hapless and unfortunate still more miserable, and kindles in them the blind passions of hate and revenge. If we would raise men to prosperity and success; if we would make them happier and better, it must be done by leading them to nobler aims and greater effort. Your best type of Socialist is not a provoker of disturbance and a riot-breeder, but one who, seeing present evils, wisely plans to remedy them by the peaceful methods of education, frank, intelligent discussion and suitable legislation. He knows that there is always, somewhere, some common ground on which the extremes of interests may converge. He knows that all talk of human equalization is about as foolish as if Luther Burbank were to undertake to make all the flowers bear a uniform blossom and yield the same fragrance.
And he scorns to work on the passions of the ignorant and thoughtless, because he knows that to sow discontent in their hearts now, would mean to reap sorrow and bitter repentance hereafter.

This Year's Harvest

BRIGHT indeed are the prospects of the American farmer, according to the statistics recently sent out by Secretary Wilson of the United States Department of Agriculture. The Secretary, as is well known, is a practical farmer himself and consequently figures which have been prepared under his supervision meet with a more general acceptance than if they were the work of some one who had had no practical experience with the problems that confront the tiller of the soil. Taken all in all the prosperity of the whole country depends in great measure on the prosperity of the farmer and the condition of the crops. A poor harvest, and the city dweller living in cramped apartments far from the green fields is one of the first to realize the fact from the way prices begin to soar on the first rumor, of a small yield from nature's store. On account of the recent financial depression the news from the Agricultural Department is doubly welcome.

The statisticians took a certain period this year and compared it with the same period last year.
Every crop except one was in better condition than ever before since figures have been kept. The figures of the bounty of the soil are almost staggering even to the American people, who are used to big figures.
For instance, there will be 1,250,000,000 bushels of corn, and the yield of the other cereals will be in proportion. When this great crop is harvested it means a renewal in freight business, as it must be got to market. The increase in freight business can not help fail to help many other lines of business and industry connected with it.

In fact, there are not cars enough to move all the loads at one time. It would take over a million and a half of cars and over eighty thousand engines if they were to move the corn crops in one day. The train would reach nearly fourteen thousand miles.

As it is, every freight car near the agricultural districts will be moving early and late for many weeks over the network of tracks to distribute the earth's increase.

Of course, a great harvest arouses the fear among the farmers that there will be a slump in prices, but it is thought that the demand will be so large that every farmer will receive fair prices and wish that he had more to sell than at present. The banks of the country are not retiring many of their notes, as they realize what a demand there will be for currency. It is said that it will take $275,000,000 to move the harvest. There is much glamor about the business done in great cities and we regard great factories with a certain amount of awe, little thinking of the greatest business of all, until the country holds up before us the facts of its industry—facts so large as to be almost beyond comprehension.

At Denver

IT WAS certainly a mark of distinguished confidence, such as few men in public life have ever received, which the Denver Convention paid to the great Nebraskan, when it chose him for the third time as a Presidential candidate. It proves beyond a doubt, what a tremendous hold Mr. Bryan has upon the affection and esteem of a very large section of the American people, especially in the West and Northwest. Politics abounds in surprises, and the outcome might show that he is a much stronger candidate than in the Presidential contest of 1900, when he received nearly six and a half million votes.

Now that both the great parties have chosen their standard-bearers, let us hope that the campaign soon to begin will be characterized by clean and wholesome methods. Both the candidates are men of high ability, sound principles and unquestioned patriotism. They stand upon platforms that have much in common. Both recognize that the old platforms and party declarations, while not forgotten, have necessarily changed to meet the needs of national development and the new conditions that have arisen.

We leave to others, however, the discussion of platforms and policies in detail, recognizing that with men of high character at the helm, the national honor and the best material interests of the people will be safe, whichever way the battle goes. The people demand certain reforms, the need of which both parties fully recognize. The curtailment of official extravagance, the firm punishment of corruption, the establishment of sound principles of finance, the integrity of the courts, the regulation of corporate interests and equal justice to capital and labor are among the issues concerning which there should be no misunderstanding.

Between now and November the people will have ample time to make up their minds as to their duty.
This they can not do while the smoke of the early skirmishing and the clamor of the nominating conventions are still filling the eyes and deafening the ears.

A Coming Danger

COUNT VON ZEPPELIN, the German scientist, probably the ablest living authority on aerial navigation, and who has spent a large part of his lifetime in experimentation, has announced his conviction that the air is navigable only for bodies of great size and that the power-driven, dirigible balloon of the future will be a machine of vast magnitude. Octave Chanute, a leading authority on aviation in America, predicts that, as the experimental stage has now been passed, the world may prepare in the very near future to see genuine aerial warships; but he differs from Von Zeppelin in believing that the aeroplane will be the practical machine, and not the gas bag. These airships, he believes, will be under perfect control, and their automatic mechanical appliances will render them practically safe. They will be utilized for sport, for reconnoissance in war, and for exploration.

If man is destined to achieve the mastery of the air, it will be a revolution indeed. Who knows whether the next generation may not see the day of transatlantic air lines, polar excursions, a pleasure tours over the world's great mountaranges? Already we have the news of a Germacompany organized to run a regular line of pasenger airships between the continental cap-cities from St. Petersburg to Paris, and Vienna London. It would be a beautiful and desirable resu-if science were thus to add to the sum of huma-knowledge and enjoyment. But if the coming air ship is to be chiefly a new agent of destruction, flying battleship, then let us hope that the day of its completion may be still far distant. Our war-torn world would be better off without it. Science which ought to be beneficent always, laboring for the good of man, would be maleficent indeed if peopled the very air above us with winged destroyer

The Deadly "Hot Wave"

SWEEPING over a large part of the country, the "great hot wave" of July, 1908, will long be remembered for the suffering and discomfort it brought and for the number of its victims. In the Eastern and Middle States, where the mercury climbed to a record height, the mortality from sunstroke and heat was the heaviest in many years.
Nor was it confined to the cities, for the sea beaches and the public parks yielded their quota of those who died in giving battle to the deadly heat which they could not escape. In New York the temperature was like that of an oven, and the climax was reached only after the record had reached twenty-four deaths and eighty-eight prostrations in a single day. Then there was a sudden change of wind and the superheated, gasping millions took fresh courage and a new lease of life. The "hot spell" for the time being was over.

Perhaps the saddest feature was the suffering of the little children in the crowded tenements. During the torrid visitation our Children's Home at Mont-Lawn has been a genuine boon to the little sufferers.
We trust that the day may soon come when Fresh Air Homes on the Mont-Lawn model may be established within easy range of every large city for the saving of the children.

Among the Workers

—IT IS ESTIMATED that 26,000,000 pupils are studying the International Sunday School Lesson throughout the world at the present time.

—REV. O. H. DENNEY, pastor of the Congregational Church at Candor, N.Y., which has just celebrated its centenary, has added to the membership over one thousand names during his pastorate.

—THE PRAYER CONFERENCE at Rockhurst, Mill Valley, Calif., was a memorable gathering. The power of God was present in a wonderful way. About twenty-five pastors and a dozen missionaries were in attendance.

—THE TOPKKA Capital, which has been testing the sentiment in Kansas concerning prohibition, announces that nine-tenths of all the letters received from the State as a whole heartily endorse the prohibition policy. They show that prohibition has greatly benefited the State, notwithstanding the loud assertions of the liquor interests that business has suffered and that the State revenues have been dangerously diminished.

The Pan-Anglican Congress

ONE of the most remarkable gatherings of the year was the Pan-Anglican Congress held in London. It was the first of its kind ever held. Five and a half years have been spent in its organization and representatives from 195 dioceses, in communion with the Anglican Church, were present. Live, up-to-date topics were selected for discussion and the ablest men, archbishops, bishops, clergymen and laymen, from all parts of the world, gave carefully prepared and exceedingly entertaining and instructive addresses. Under the theme, "Possibilities of Union," Canon Erskine Hill, of Glasgow, made an incisive speech abounding in such flashes as "The conformity of a duke is of far less importance to the Church than the conversion of a drunkard." Mr. A. J. Balfour, whose appearance drew a storm of cheering, spoke most ably on Christianity and modern thought. Religion and science was treated in a masterly manner by Mr. G. F. C. Searle, F.R.S., and Dr. F. R. Tennant, of Cambridge University. In the discussion of religion and the press, Dr. McClure surprised his hearers by saying that he had examined carefully 206 penny novels and that he failed to find moral obliquity in any one of them. The divorce question elicited the most spirited discussion. The deepest interest in the Congress, upon the part of the audiences and delegates, was manifested in the discussion of the question of capital and labor and Socialism, where the most divergent opinions were expressed, there being a general tendency to lean toward Christian Socialism. The crowning service of the Congress was the great thanksgiving at the gathering at St. Paul's Cathedral, which was crowded to suffocation with a distinguished throng. At noon the two hundred archbishops and bishops, with the Cathedral clergy and choir, entered the west door. The Archbishop of Canterbury took his stand on the highest step before the altar. He asked the audience to give thanks to their Heavenly Father for the inspiration the Congress had given them. After a most beautiful address calling upon the clergy and members for a higher consecration and more diligent service, the great offering was taken. The bishops laid their respective offerings upon the altar, which amounted to the superb sum of a million pounds. One of the distinguishing features of the Congress was the ability, character and efficiency of the archbishops and bishops and leaders in the church.

This is a true saying. If a man desire the office of a bishop, he desireth a good work. (I. Tim. 3:1.)

A Penny Cable

At a dinner given by the American Society in London on the fourth day of July, John Henniker Heaton made the significant statement that the world, in the near future, would have a penny cable—that for a penny a word, people would be able to speak to any nation of the earth. Mr. Heaton, it will be remembered, has been trying for forty years to secure an arrangement for penny postage between Great Britain and America and was successful in his undertaking. In response to a toast at that dinner in London, Mr. Heaton said that the great electricians were lending their help to this cheap and universal method of communication and that he confidently predicted that the expense of using the wires and cables would be so small that the people would use them instead of writing letters.

The tendency of modern invention is to multiply the conveniences of civilized living, so that the masses of the people may have the advantage of them. It would be a great advance in this direction if the telegraph wires and Atlantic cables, which are now an expensive luxury, outside of the reach of the plain people, could be brought to their use. The cheaper the means of communication, the better people will know each other; the more they know of each other the higher will be their respect and the more intense their affection, so that the penny cable which Mr. Heaton predicts would be an instrument of a better civilization, a harbinger of good will, and would be another hand in preventing war and another arm in bringing people close to each other and closer to the cross of Christ. We hardly realize how much scientific investigation, practical invention, increased communication by travel and message have to do in ushering in the kingdom of God in the earth, in promoting the reign of Jesus Christ in the world. For six thousand years, till the time of our grandfathers, letters were sent by man or beast or breath of wind against a sail; and now there is impatience with any communication slower than the lightning that conveys the message with the swiftness of thought.

In the name of King Abasuerus was the letter written, and sealed with the king's ring. And the letters were sent by posts into all the king's provinces. (Esther 3:12-13.)

Cleveland and the Bible

About the last thing that fell from the pen of the late Grover Cleveland was an estimate of the Bible. He said: "I very much hope that in sending out this book you will do something to invite more attention among the masses of our people to the study of the New Testament and Bible as a whole. It seems to me that in these days there is an unhappy falling off in our appreciation of the importance of this study. I do not believe, as a people, that we can afford to allow our interest in and veneration for the Bible to abate. I look upon it as the source from which those who study it in spirit and truth will derive strength of character, a realization of the duty of citizenship and a true apprehension of the power and wisdom and mercy of God." These sentiments are almost identical with those expressed by Gen. Grant while President, in a message to the children of America: "Hold fast to the Bible as the sheet-anchor of your liberties; write its precepts in your hearts, and practise them in your lives. To the influence of this Book are we indebted for all the progress made in true civilization, and to this we must look as our guide in the future." Theodore Roosevelt, in an address, claimed that almost all the great men of America had employed the Bible as a foundation of their character, stating that Lincoln studied the Bible so constantly that he became a man of one book and that he put instinctively into practice what he had learned from that Book. The man of small parts, who doubts God's word, appears a pigmy when compared with the great men of our time who put the chief estimate upon the Bible as the foundation of individual and national character and life.

Thy word is a lamp unto my feet, and a light unto my path. (Psa. 119:105.)

Returning Prosperity

It is pretty generally understood that the panic in this country is over and that there will be a return gradually to good times. There are some signs of a speedy resumption of prosperity. For instance, on the sixth day of July 50,000 men, who had been laid off from work in Pittsburgh and vicinity, returned to their tasks and the manufactories, mines and coke ovens made a heavier demand for laborers than could be supplied. The promise of an abundant harvest is giving great encouragement to the railroads and to the people whose produce is to be transported, bought and sold. Periods of financial depression are often seasons of religious awakening. Whether the one we have passed through has had its spiritual compensations or not we do not know, but it is hoped that a return to material prosperity will also bring the largest spiritual success to the individual and the Church. Judge Gary, an authority on steel and iron interests, before going to Europe the other day for his vacation, said that the worst of the trouble was over in this country and that prosperous times would follow and that he believed that capital and labor would enter upon a new era of prosperity with a better understanding of each other. Amidst the frictions and irritations caused by the division of the products of human industry, it is to be hoped capital and labor will each measure their wares by the Golden Rule, as neither can be happy or prosperous without the help of the other.

Therefore all things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them. (Matt. 7:12.)

Mistaken Safety

Mr. Fred G. Engel was giving an exhibition of the workings of a new automatic life-saving device at Springfield, Mass., when the cylinder wire which was intended to convey him safely to the earth, broke and sent him from the sixth story window to the ground, where his body lay lifeless. The device consists of a metal cylinder fastened in the room, in which is coiled a slender wire cord controlled by a spring which is supposed to let a man down slowly and then coils up again when the weight is taken off. As Engel jumped from the window the chain he had passed under his arms broke, and sent him to his death.

It was peculiarly disappointing that a device that had been intended to save life should have been turned by accident to a means of its destruction. In the salvation of the soul there are many devices offered, promising to effect a rescue, but which in reality are sources of destruction. There is nothing so untrue as the statement made so often, that it makes no difference what a man believes if he is only honest in that belief. The poor fellow was perfectly honest in his belief that he had a life saver, when in reality it was a life destroyer with which he was dealing. There are systems of theology that have so much error in them that they can not be relied upon as life savers and honesty in their belief will not prevent the thin wire from breaking, and the destruction that shall follow. Christ is the only means of escape from sin, its danger and its penalty.

All other devices are fatal failures. No one who relies upon Christ the Crucified Saviour will ever fail to escape the peril and consequences of moral evil.

Neither is there salvation in any other: for there is none other name under heaven given among men, whereby we must be saved. (Acts 4:12.)

Rooster Mistakes His Calling

A red bantam rooster belonging to a gentleman at Riverhead, Long Island, is setting on seven eggs, trying to hatch out a flock of chickens. He drove the hen from the eggs and will not leave the nest even to eat. This rooster has mistaken his calling. He ought to have left the hen to take care of the nest. It would have been better for him to have scratched and found worms for the rest of the brood in the barnyard or to have strutted on the lawn with pride at his gorgeous plumage, or to have flown to the fence and given a crow of defiance or victory, than to have undertaken the work of raising the brood, which belonged to the hen. It is often the case that men and women get mismatched in the tasks of life. Whatever may be the opinion of people as to the respective duties of men and women, it is pretty generally understood that it is not the husband's place to brood over the eggs, that it is the woman's place to care for the nest. Into what fields of competitive labor women may enter, is a question that may be safely left to the judgment and conscience of the women themselves. But true women must admit that there can be no wider field nor higher honor for women than that of caring for home, than that of culturing the young. How like the providence of God is the sympathy and protecting care of a devoted mother! When the boy was sunstruck in the harvest field in olden time, the father knew what to do with him—ordered a man to carry him to his mother.

And when he had taken him to his mother he sat on her knees till noon. (II. Kings 4:20.)

EVERY BOY TO BE A KING IF HE WILI

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts*

"How long wilt thou mourn for Saul?" God asks this question of Samuel. Saul was not physically but morally dead. He had forfeited the favor of God and his days as king were numbered.

"I have provided me a king." God told Samuel where to find him, among the sons of Jesse in Bethlehem.

"Fill thine horn with oil and go." The anointing oil consisted of olive oil, cassia, cinnamon, calamus, and myrrh. Samuel was to use this to anoint the successor of Saul.

"Say, I am come to sacrifice to the Lord." Samuel was accustomed to visit different sections of the country and offer sacrifices. God told Samuel to make a sacrifice on his visit to Bethlehem to guard against arousing a spirit of rebellion, which would probably have resulted if it was seen that he had come for the purpose of anointing a new king in place of Saul.

"The elders of the town trembled at his coming." They expected there would be a searching of hearts and lives, when their spiritual leader should come.

"He sanctified Jesse and his sons, and called them to the sacrifice." There was first the public sacrifice, participated in by all the Bethlehemites, then followed the sacrificial feasting by families. For the second stage of the feast Samuel went to Jesse's house to be with him and his family.

"Jesse made seven of his sons to pass before Samuel." Jesse was in the secret that one of his sons was to be anointed king, but neither he nor Samuel knew which one.

"Surely the Lord's anointed is before him." Samuel said this to himself, of Eliab, the oldest of Jesse's sons and the first to pass before him, because he was grand in appearance. As to looks Saul was still Samuel's measure for a king. God reproved Samuel for his misjudgment. Not high looks but a pure life is God's preference.

"The Lord has not chosen these." One by one the seven sons of Jesse had passed before Samuel and Samuel was restrained from anointing any one of them.

"Are these all thy sons?" David, the one God would choose, was so young it was not thought worth while to take him from the sheep he was shepherding.

"Arise, anoint him: for this is he." David was a mere boy with red cheeks and large bright eyes, and so filled with fresh young strength that it has been said of him: "In swiftness and activity, he could only be compared to a wild gazelle with feet like hart's feet, and with arms strong enough to break a bow of steel. Hear the words that Browning put into the lips of David:

Oh, our manhood's prime vigor! No spirit feels waste,
Not a muscle is stopped in its playing nor sinew unbraced,
Oh, the wild joys of living! The leaping from rock unto rock,
The strong rending of boughs from the fir tree, the cool silver shock
Of a plunge in the pool's living water!
How good is man's life, the mere living! How fit to employ
All the heart and the soul and the senses forever in joy!

"Then Samuel took the horn of oil and anointed him." Geikie says: "Josephus can hardly be wrong when he describes Samuel as taking David apart and whispering into his ear the meaning of his act as he performed it."

"The spirit of the Lord came upon David from that day forward." The divine afflatus was upon the soul of David. What that influence was is best described by Milton:

O Spirit, thou
Dost prefer above all temples
The upright heart and pure;
Instruct me, for thou knowest
What is in me dark,
Illumine, what low raise and support.

Other Boy Kings in the Bible

King Joash was seven years old when he was crowned. When a babe one year old, his aunt, the wife of Jehoiada the high priest, had rescued him from the murderous designs of his grandmother, Athaliah, who had usurped the throne. For six years the child royal was kept in the seclusion of the temple, a safe place then, because not much frequented, as the queen led the Israelites to worship idols rather than the true God. When Joash became seven years of age Jehoiada made a league with the Levites and such men as could be trusted, and they crowned little Joash king in the court of the Temple with great solemnity. Queen Athaliah met a violent death that same day. Jehoiada, until the time of his death, was regent, Solomon was another young king, crowned when David, his father, was upon his death-bed, in order to prevent his brother Adonijah usurping the throne. A solemn charge was given the young king by his dying father (I. Kings 2: 1-10). Solomon showed that he had a wise head upon young shoulders when God said to him in a dream: "Ask what I shall give thee," and Solomon answered: "I am but a little child, I know not how to go out or come in. Give therefore thy servant an understanding heart to judge thy people, that I may discern between the good and the bad." And the speech pleased the Lord and he promised him wisdom and riches and long life (I. Kings 3: 5-14). Solomon has the reputation of being the wisest man that ever lived, and yet he was not without some serious faults, which in the end brought about his downfall.

Other Young Kings and Queens

A little boy named Alfred, five years old, was consecrated king of England in 844, but not until the age of twenty-two was he declared king. During the a speech to those who had elected him to Congress before he was chosen President, that while he wished please his constituents, there was one man whom he wished above all to be on good terms with, and that was a man with whom he had to eat, to sleep, to die. It was a unique way of saying that he must be a self-respecting man.

One day a beautifully dressed young lady went to a mission Sunday School and told the superintendent that she wished to be the teacher of a class of his worst boys. "There they are in the corner," said he. "They have exhausted the patience of five teachers. You may try them if you desire." There were about a dozen of them; they were ragged and unwashed and had their hats on, and were chewing tobacco and saying all sorts of rude things. The young lady sat down in front of them and said: "Young gentlemen, I am very happy the superintendent has assigned me this class and I hope to be your teacher all summer. When we meet in the street I shall say, 'There are some of my scholars,' and I shall expect you to raise your hats and bow to me (off went all the hats), and you will point me out as your teacher, and know you will not like to see my dress covered with tobacco juice." The quids were furtively dropped. Then she asked each boy his name, writing it carefully down and in turn she gave each boy her card with her address on it and said: "I want you all to come there one afternoon every week. I have so much to tell you that I can not crowd one-half what I desire to say into the short half-hour we have together on Sunday; and, boys, as water is plenty here where we have this great Lake Erie, I would like you to all come clean." Many interesting details might be given of the meetings of those boys at their teacher's home; how it made clean Christian boys out of them and how over three thousand boys, under the influence of that teacher, developed into true men of the kingly sort.

This is a very inadequate description of the work of Miss Mulligan, of Buffalo, N. Y., who says: "I could have saved ten thousand as easily as I have three thousand, could I have changed their environment."

Because of the good king stuff and good queen stuff there is in the children of our land and every land, they should be guarded against all that will hinder their development. It is stated on good authority that one child in every six in the United States is at hard labor in factories, coal mines, glass works and the like. Miss Jane Addams, of Hull House, says: "It is no figment of the imagination to say that the human system breaks down when it is put to monotonous work before it is ready to stand up to it and that general debility and many diseases may be traced to premature labor. Miss Addams tells of a tailor who died at the age of thirty-three, whose death certificate bore the record 'premature senility' which was due to the fact that he had run a sewing machine since he was six years old. This state of things has been going on unchallenged until quite recently. Some States have passed child labor laws and Congress has passed a law for the District of Columbia forbidding the labor of children under the age of fourteen, excepting the pages in the Senate and House.

When we study into the ways by which princes are educated to become kings under the most gifted and wisest of teachers and according to most rigorous rules, we can not fail to be impressed with the importance of training the young for positions of large responsibility and trust.

Copyright, 1904, by de Brunoff

"Jesse made seven of his sons to pass before Samuel"

and the young king was wisely guided by him. After the death of Jehoiada King Joash was influenced by wicked counselors, and idolatry was revived. When warned by the son of Jehoiada, King Joash ordered him to be stoned to death between the Temple and the altar. What a return for the loving watch care he had himself received in that same Temple from the parents of the man he murdered!

Josiah, another boy king, was crowned when he was eight years old, and he reigned thirty-one years. He lived a little more than two hundred years after Joash. It is recorded of Josiah that "he did what was right in the sight of the Lord, and turned not aside to the right hand or to the left." When he was only eighteen years of age he began the repair of the Temple. It was then that the book of the law was found among the rubbish which was being cleared away. Josiah caused the book to be read to him and then discovered the doom that was hanging over his idol-worshipping, Sabbath-breaking people. He called a national conference and inaugurated a crusade against idolatry which resulted in its abolishment from his kingdom. Idols were broken and idol groves were cut down.

thirty years of his reign his wise rule was based on a great code of laws, which he formed and which has since been influential in all law-making. Trial by jury is credited to him. He was called Alfred the Great.

The Princess Victoria was a mere child when called from her bed to hear that her uncle, the king of Great Britain, was dead and that she must shortly be crowned queen. Her reply was: "I will be good." During her long reign of nearly seventy years, she ruled as a truly Christian queen.

Our Own Boy Kings

In our republic all boys are to be sovereign citizens and should be trained as carefully as princes. In order to rule they must first learn to obey. Obey your parents, obey your rulers, obey your God. No king who does not obey God can have a long and prosperous reign. Every loving and obedient child is to be a king or queen throughout eternity.

Abraham Lincoln was a poor boy, but he was true and noble, industrious and obedient. He became a wise and learned man and was chosen to be the President of the United States. And James A. Garfield came to be President of the United States. He once said in

In Sisterly Candor

I DON'T know how long it is since you read The Mill on the Floss," said Mrs. Jamieson, as she seated herself comfortably with her knitting in the vine-shaded veranda just as the clock struck four. Other ladies were arriving and they had brought some light fancy-work, one an embroidered centre-piece in which she was putting the finishing stitches, another a fleecy shawl that she was crocheting for a Christmas gift, and still another a dainty frock for her two-year-old daughter. The ladies of Rockville Centre met during the summer at one another's houses for social purposes, reading and conversation. Sometimes they worked for the missionary box, and again they might take up a collection for the repairs of the church. To-day the meeting had no other object than recreation, and Mrs. Jamieson set the ball rolling by her remark about George Eliot's famous novel. Two or three of the friends had never had time to read the book, although they had heard of it. One woman said that she had read Middlemarch, and another that Felix Holt was her favorite, but Miranda Joyce, who had been graduated from college in June, had the whole of George Eliot at her finger's end, and being the daughter of the hostess she ran into the library for the volume Mrs. Jamieson had mentioned.

"What I was thinking of," said that lady, "was the trouble that is made in families by too much candor. Turn to the seventh chapter, Miranda, and read a little of the talk between Mrs. Glegg and Mrs. Tulliver." Miranda did so, introducing to the circle the belligerent Mrs. Glegg, who at fifty was a formidable matron who dared to be as rude as she pleased, for the double reason that she was older than Mrs. Tulliver and that she had more money. Even a worm will turn, and when Mrs. Glegg had driven a coach and four over all the proprieties, criticised everything in sight, and abused her sister for yielding to her husband in the matter of the dinner hour, Mrs. Tulliver put an end to the talk by saying firmly, "Mr. Tulliver says he always will have a good dinner for his friends while he can pay for it, and he's a right to do as he likes in his own house, sister."

The conversation, having started with the quotation from The Mill on the Floss, lifted itself above the mere happenings of the neighborhood into a region of impersonal thought. It touched presently upon frankness in the family.

"We all know," said the minister's wife, "how ready one's own people are to tell one the precise truth without any soft shading or gentle deprecation. 'You are looking dreadfully sallow,' Edith will say to Ethel, or 'What possessed you to buy a green frock, when green fairly kills your complexion?' Or at the table, 'This steak is tough,' 'These peas are dry,' 'The bread is not up to the mark,' 'Where do you buy your butter? There certainly is better butter in the market than this.' These are criticisms heard every day in the family, and they do not help to make life move without friction."

"Yes," plaintively added Mrs. Judson, as she creased another tuck in her baby's frock, "there is too much sisterly candor in this world, at least where 'in-laws' are concerned. Bob's sister Jane has been making me a visit and I declare that I never was more uncomfortable in my life than when her eyes were on my children, for I knew that she considered them most ill-behaved. I have to admit that Florrie and Lilly always show their worst side to their Aunt Jane. She told Bob that I was spoiling my children by my indulgence, that Willie was stubborn and disobedient, and that Florrie was clumsy and stupid. She even found fault with my management of my poor wee baby, and said that I ought to spank her when she cried with the prickly heat. Jane declares that her children get their first spanking by the time they are six months old."

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

"The wretch!" exclaimed a tender-hearted woman sitting next the little mother. "She had no babies of her own and the hunger of the childless was in her eyes. 'I fairly hate these martinetts in nursery discipline,' she exclaimed."

"I don't hate Jane; she is a good woman and kind-hearted," said the baby's mother, but she is a very uncomfortable guest in a relative's house because

To Be an Agreeable Guest

THE young girl who is going away to make a visit of a few days or a few weeks at this season should bear in mind several rules that would serve to make her an agreeable guest. Last summer a lady who is an extremely careful housekeeper, and whose manners have a flavor of old-world courtesy, gave a house-party that included a number of friends of her daughter, who was a junior at college. The girls, who arrived one afternoon by train, were well dressed, well bred and well educated. Each had behind her the traditions of good birth and careful training, but there was a wide difference in the way they acquitted themselves in the role of guests. One girl, for example, was always late to meals. It happened that the man of the house especially disliked a lack of punctuality at the table, and he was correspondingly annoyed when Estelle floated in morning after morning in a bewitching toilet, when breakfast was nearly finished. Louise, to whom had been given a dainty room, furnished in green and white, was so untidy and took so little care of bureau covers, spreads and curtains that her hostess was horrified. She wondered that a daughter of hers should entertain friendship with so heedless a young woman, and she was further disturbed when she found this girl's belongings lying about promiscuously in the drawing-room, the hall and the porch, with not a thought of order or fitness.

Another girl who fancied herself a brilliant conversationalist had an unfortunate habit of seizing the word on all occasions and of monopolizing the talk so that no one else had a chance to be heard.

For more than we think we reveal ourselves unconsciously, by looks, speech and deportment, when we are away from home. Whoever would be an agreeable guest must as soon as possible find out and conform to the ordinary ways of the household into whose privacy she is admitted. If there is an opportunity to save her hostess trouble, she must not overlook it, yet there are guests whose determination to be helpful verges on the officious and intrusive. It is as well to remain in one's room in the morning until breakfast is ready, or if one goes for an early walk or finds a seat on a porch, let one stay away from the living room and other parts of the house that are not yet in order for the day.

A certain young woman who violated this rule and established herself at ease in an upper hallway in a window seat commanding a beautiful view, was intensely mortified when by accident she discovered that she had prevented several members of the family from taking their morning plunge in the bathroom in their usual comfort.

Never visit a kitchen unasked, and never venture into any part of the house in which you have no concern. Arrive at the time you are expected and take your leave on the day and at the hour when it was understood that your visit would terminate. If there are old people or children in the family where you are a visitor, be at pains to give them some portion of your attention. Try not to monopolize grandmother's chair and do not show yourself bored by the baby. If you are musical and are asked to play the piano, do not wait to be urged.

The Bride's Attendants

The Bride and Groom

The Wedding of an Ambassador's Daughter

BOTH America and Great Britain were greatly interested in the recent wedding of Miss Jean Templeton Reid, daughter of Hon. Whitelaw Reid, American Ambassador to the Court of St. James, to the Hon. John Ward. Miss Reid has made herself very popular during her father's service as Ambassador, and the King and Queen attended the wedding at the Chapel Royal. The Hon. John Ward is a brother of the Earl of Dudley.

she deems it her duty to say precisely what she thinks, on every occasion."

"There is no greater fallacy," said Mrs. Jamieson, rounding the heel of her stocking, "than that which makes it incumbent on one's conscience to utter every word in one's mind. Society would split into a hundred pieces if every one acted on that theory. True courtesy oils the wheels of life. Unless we are polite in the family circle we are sure to have a good many recriminations and some quarrels that fray affection if they do not strain it to breaking." A tinkle of iced lemonade closed the discussion.

Aunt Prudence Payson's Catch-All

H. G. M. A class of young ladies meeting in the evening might take up American history. The teacher could not select anything better for this purpose than the works of Winston Churchill. These, although novels, take up different phases in American history. Young women who have been in business through the day are a little too weary at night to attack work that is wholly in the line of drudgery. One of Mr. Churchill's books may be read aloud while the members of the class keep their hands folded or employ them in sewing, and the teacher's part will be to consult works of reference, verify dates and bring useful information incidentally to illuminate the narrative.

MIDSUMMER JOYS AT MONT-LAWN

REV. DR. DAVID C. HUGHES, FATHER OF THE GOVERNOR OF NEW YORK, SPEAKING TO OUR CHILDREN AND GUESTS AT MONT-LAWN

OUR "Children's Paradise," as Mont-Lawn has been picturesquely called, never looked so beautiful as this summer. Not only are the children themselves filled with admiration at the loveliness of the Home and its surroundings, but guests and visitors from many quarters who come there on Saturdays or to attend the chapel services on Sundays are unstinted in their expressions of pleasure and delight when they wander over the grounds or inspect the airy dormitories, with their serried rows of snowy cots.

Although "the Fourth" is now a thing of the past the children have not forgotten it. The enjoyment of that celebration will furnish a theme for them for weeks to come. They recall with interest the good advice the speakers gave them at the great gathering on the lawn, and especially the kind greeting and wise counsel they received from the Rev.

Dr. Hughes, father of the Governor of New York State. Rear-Admiral Sigsbee they already regard as an old friend, whose anecdotes and quaint witticisms never fail to excite pleasure and merriment, while his advice to the boys and girls they hold as precious and not to be soon forgotten.

There have been several interesting visitors at Mont-Lawn lately. At a single gathering there were guests from India, Japan, and China, and their picturesque costumes excited the deepest wonder of the children. Miss Gertrude Chew, a diminutive Chinese lady, now studying in this country and expecting to graduate next year and return to her native land, has been added to the corps of resident helpers at Mont-Lawn. She is quite efficient in speaking the English language. She is, moreover, a Christian, and an interesting and graceful type of Chinese womanhood.

On Sunday, July 5, services were held in the Chapel, which were attended by the three hundred and twenty-five children and their happy and apparently unfatigued teachers and caretakers. On the platform was Rev. Dr. Tolefree Parr, the celebrated British evangelist who arrived from England the day before and hastened to make his first visit to Mont-Lawn, of which he had heard much and in which he was intensely interested. He gave a helpful and eloquent address upon the tri-color which overhung the speaker—the red, white and blue; drawing a parallel—the red representing sin, the white salvation and the blue the royal family of God. Mrs. Sarah J. Bird, of the Gospel Settlement and Bowery Mission, and Rear-Admiral Sigsbee were also present. Mr. Rutnam, of India, spoke in a very pleasing way, comparing the opportunities of the children of his land with those of America.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S SOCIETIES

Overcoming Prejudice *

PREJUDICE and ill-will, whom the pilgrims in Bunyan's immortal allegory met at Mount Innocence, were a pair of worthless fellows whose principal occupation seemed to be casting dirt at the white garments of those around them. The dirt, however, did not stick, but soon dropped off, leaving not even a trace of soil.

There are other kinds of prejudice besides that which finds expression in detraction and insinuation. Saul of Tarsus was bitterly prejudiced against the Christians, until that hour when the scales fell from his eyes and his spiritual vision was made clear miraculously. Ananias, the Damascus disciple, was stoutly prejudiced against Saul, whom he had known only as a relentless enemy and persecutor of the Christians.

Our prejudices are not easily set aside or overcome. They may be founded in pride of race or of birth, or wealth or social position; in intellectual superiority, or in our own business ability, which we contrast with others to their disadvantage. We fail to see how God can possibly save and love and honor certain people, or how they can render acceptable service. We are simply using the lenses of our own narrow selfishness to measure the love and wisdom of the Almighty.

Prejudice blinds us to the good qualities of others. A certain Athenian voted to condemn Aristides, though he had never seen him, and was swayed by prejudice. So with the men who, without knowing anything whatsoever of John Huss's doctrine, were so bitterly prejudiced against him that they carried wood for the fire which was to consume the martyr's body. Huss, when he saw them, exclaimed in pity "O holy simplicity!"

An old gold-hunter asserted stoutly that there were no real gold fields outside of Mexico and Peru. Being shown a Klondike nugget, he said, "This metal, sir, is extremely like gold and may even pass for gold; but it is base, I assure you. The only true gold comes from Mexico and Peru." This was the prejudice of ignorance and obstinacy.

"Can any good thing come out of Nazareth?" was the expression of a prejudice that probably closed many hearts to conviction concerning Jesus' ministry. "There is nothing stronger than human prejudice," wrote Wendell Phillips.

In personal experience, we frequently encounter prejudice as a serious stumbling-block in the path of spiritual progress. This is true of both religious and social life. Two young men traveling by steamer on the Hudson were politely accosted by an older fellow-passenger. He was a stranger and was dressed in a rather dingy traveling suit. The two friends mutually agreed, without the slightest reason, that they did not like him. It was not instinct; it was prejudice. Next morning, they met him again on deck and were charmed with his conversation, which showed him to be a man who had traveled much and a careful observer. Before the journey's end the three were excellent friends.

Christ showed how prejudice may be overcome. "Come and see," he said to the doubting disciples. Do not judge by superficial acquaintance or outward appearance. Get a vision of the heart and look for the true gold beneath the surface. Cultivate generous, loving feelings, and be liberal in judging others. Above all determine with God's help that prejudice shall be sunk out of sight in your relations with others, and that you may become a spiritual evangel, a present help to all who need such service, regardless of race, position, or social surroundings.

Consecrated Service *

CHRISTIAN Service, the theme of the lesson, is one that is full of suggestion to the zealous and practical follower of Christ. In many different ways we may show our love for the Master and our desire to advance the interests of his kingdom on earth. By serving in worship, by the influence of our personal example, by teaching the Way of Life to others, we may justify our allegiance and show our love. In these days of many organized Christian activities, there is work for all.

There is no service more precious than that of leading the young to Christ. Early impressions are usually life-long ones. Daniel Webster once said in a speech on youthful impressions:

"My little friend wants to know what good it will do to learn the rule of three, or to commit a verse of the Bible or the Catechism. The answer is this: Some time you will need that very thing. Perhaps it may be twenty years before you can make it fit in just the right place. But it will be just in place sometime, and then if you don't have it, you will be like the hunter who had no ball in his rifle when a bear met him."

If we can lay the foundation of true religion in the hearts of the children, in the church, the Sunday School, or the home, we are doing real service.

Our influence is a part of the service demanded of us. Dr. Morrison was the first Protestant missionary to the millions of China. He traveled by way of America, and the first night he stayed in New York he was placed in an apartment where a little child had already gone to sleep. Awakening in the morning, she turned as usual to talk to her mother, but, seeing a stranger where she expected to find her parents, she raised herself with a look of alarm, and, fixing her eyes steadily on his face, she said, "Man, do you pray to God?" "Oh yes, my dear," was the reply, "every day. God is my best friend." She then laid her head back on her pillow and fell asleep, as if she felt there could be no danger with the stranger, if he prayed.

A minister once met a man to whom he wished a good morning. "I never had a bad morning," replied the man. "That is singular; I wish you may always be so fortunate." "I was never unfortunate," said he. "I hope you will always be as happy," said the divine. "I am never unhappy," said the other. "I wish," said the divine, "that you would explain yourself a little." "That I will cheerfully do," said he. "I said that I never had a bad morning, for every morning, even if I am pinched with hunger, I praise God. If it rains, or snows, or hails, whether the weather be serene or tempestuous, I am still thankful to God, and therefore I never have a joyless morning."

We can serve the cause of religion by cultivating a cheerful manner, by shining (Matt. 5: 13-16), by praise (Psalm 100), and by the cultivation of those Christian graces which are given to each according to his abilities and opportunities. We may not be eloquent, or talented above our fellows, but we can serve, simply and faithfully. Remember Tholuck's motto, which Count Zinzendorf adopted: "I have one passion—it is Christ—only Christ." Elizabeth Fry, who died at a ripe old age after a life of philanthropy, once said that her constant thought was "How may I best serve my Lord?" Livingstone penned in his diary the words: "Jesus, to thee again I dedicate myself."

Keep in touch with Christ, and by grasping every opportunity to do his will you will yield acceptable service to himself, his church and humanity.

The Transformation of Margaret

By MRS. ELEANOR H. PORTER

Author of "Into Still Waters," etc.

A NEW SERIAL WRITTEN FOR "THE CHRISTIAN HERALD"

CHAPTER XVIII

MARGARET KENDALL did not sleep well the night after the picnic at Silver Lake. She was very restless, and she tossed from side to side finding nowhere a position that brought ease of mind and body. She closed her eyes and tried to sleep, but her active brain painted the dark with a panorama of the day's happenings, and whether her eyes were open or closed, she was forced to see it. It was two o'clock when Margaret rose, thrust her feet into a pair of edslippers and her arms into the sleeves of a long, loose dressing-gown. There was no moon, but the stars shone in at the open window, and Margaret easily found her way across the room to the door that led to the balcony.

Margaret's room, like the dining-room below, looked toward the west and the far-reaching meadows; but from the turn of the balcony where it curved to the left, one might see the town, and it was toward this curve that Margaret walked now. Once there she stopped and stood motionless, her hands on the balcony rail.

The night was wonderfully clear. The wide dome of the sky twinkled with myriads of stars, and seemed to laugh at the town below with its puny little lights blinking up out of the dark where the streets crossed and re-crossed. Over by the river where the mills pointed big black fingers at the sky, however, the lights did not blink. They blazed in tier upon tier and line upon line of windows, and they glowed with a never-ending glare that sent a shudder to the watching girl.

"And they're working now—now!" she almost sobbed; then she turned with a little cry and ran down the balcony toward her room where was waiting the cool soft bed with the lavender-scented sheets.

In spite of the restless night she had spent, Margaret arose early the next morning. The house was very quiet when she came down stairs, and only the subdued rustle of the parlor maid's skirts broke the silence of the great hall which was also the living-room at elcourt.

"Good morning, Betty," she said crisply. "Good morning, Miss," courtesied the girl.

Miss Kendall had almost reached the outer hall door when she turned abruptly.

"Betty, you—you don't know a little child named—er—'Maggie,' do you?" she asked.

"Ma'am?" Betty almost dropped the case she was dusting.

"'Maggie'—a little girl named 'Maggie.' She's one of—the mill people's children, I think."

Betty drew herself erect.

"No, Miss, I don't," she said crisply. "No, of course not," murmured Miss Kendall, unconsciously acknowledging her reproach in Betty's voice. Then she turned and went out the wide hall door.

Twice she walked from end to end of the long veranda, but not once did she look toward the mills; and when she sat down a little later, her chair was so placed that it did not command a view of the red and brown roofs of the town.

Miss Kendall was restless that day. She rode and drove and sang and played, and won at golf and tennis; but behind it all was a feverish gayety that came sometimes perilously near to recklessness. Frank Spencer and his sister watched her with troubled eyes, and even Ned gave an anxious frown once or twice. Just before dinner Brandon came upon her alone in the music room.

"If you take me motoring with you to-night, Miss Kendall," he said whimsically, when the music had ceased with a crashing chord, "if you take me to-night, I shall make sure that the brakes are on my side of the car!"

The girl laughed, then grew suddenly grave.

"You would need to," she acceded: "but—I shall not take you or any one else motoring to-night."

In the early evening after dinner Margaret sought her guardian. He was at his desk in his own special den out of the library, and the door was open.

"May I come in?" she asked.

Spencer sprang to his feet.

"By all means," he cried as he placed a chair. "You don't often honor me—like this."

"But this is where you do business, when at home, isn't it?" she inquired. "And I—I have come to do business."

The man laughed.

"So it's business—just plain sordid business—to which I am indebted for this," he bemoaned playfully. "Well, and what is it? Income too small for expenses?" He chuckled a little, and he could afford to. Margaret had made no mistake in asking him still to have the handling of her property. The results had been eminently satisfactory both to his pride and her pocketbook.

"No, no, it's not that; it's the mills."

"The mills!"

"Yes. Is it quite—quite necessary to work—nights?"

For a moment the man stared wordlessly; then he fell back in his chair.

"Why, Margaret, what in the world—" he stopped from sheer inability to proceed. He had suddenly remembered the stories he had heard of the early life of this girl before him, and of her childhood's horror at the difference between the lot of the rich and the poor.

"Last night we—we went through the town," explained Margaret, a little feverishly; "and Mr. Brandon happened to mention that they worked—nights."

The man at the desk roused himself.

"Yes, I see," he said kindly. "You were surprised, of course. But don't worry, my child, or let it fret you a moment. It's nothing now. They are used to it. They have done it for years."

"But at night—all night—it doesn't seem right. Must they do it?"

"Why, of course. Other mills run nights; why shouldn't ours? They expect it, Margaret. Besides, they are paid for it. Come, come, dear girl, just look at it sensibly. Why, it's the night work that helps to swell your dividends."

Margaret winced.

"I—I think I'd prefer them smaller," she faltered. She hesitated, then spoke again. "There's another thing, too, I wanted to ask you about. There was a little girl, Maggie. She lives in one of those shabby, unpainted houses at the foot of the hill. I want to do something for her. Will you see that this reaches her mother, please?" And she held out a fat roll of closely folded bills. "Now don't—please don't!" she cried, as she saw the man's remonstrative gesture. "Please don't say you can't, and that indiscriminate giving encourages pauperism. I used to hear it so often at school whenever I wanted to give something, and I—I hated it. If you could have seen that poor little girl yesterday!—you will see that she gets it; won't you?"

"But, Margaret," began the man, helplessly, "I don't know the child—there are so many—" he stopped, and Margaret picked up the dropped thread.

"But you can find out," she urged.

"You must find out. Her name's Maggie. You can inquire."

"But, don't you see—" the man's face cleared suddenly. "I'll give it to

"I owe a debt of gratitude to Grape-Nuts," writes a W. Va. young lady, "and I am glad of this opportunity to pay a little interest on it, although the debt itself I can never hope to remove."

"A few years ago I broke down from overwork and improper food. I was then in a preparatory school and my fondest wish was to enter college the following year."

"But about the middle of the term my health failed, and my brain refused to grapple with the subjects presented to it. Finally, my eyesight giving way, I was taken from the school, and sent to my grandmother's in the country with orders not to open a book while I was there."

"The dear old lady tried every way to console and nurse me back to health, but it looked like failure until the day she brought back from town a box, which, had its contents been pure gold, would have been of less value to me than the little golden-brown granules which it actually contained."

"I did not care about being experimented on at first, but that was before I had tasted Grape-Nuts with Grandma's rich Jersey cream."

"Oh, it was too good to stop eating. And I never have stopped, for I still have Grape-Nuts for breakfast."

"In the course of a few weeks I was back at school again, my health so entirely restored that I was almost a new girl."

I am now in my junior year at college, president of my class and expect to take an A. M. degree next year. My good health has continued, and my eyes, having been strengthened by the general build-up of my whole body, enable me to study all I wish. "There's a reason."

Della," he broke off in quick relief. "She runs the charity part, and she'll know just what to do with it. Meanwhile, let me thank—"

"No, no," interrupted Margaret, rising to go. "It is you I have to thank for doing it for me," she finished, as she hurried from the room.

"Well!" muttered the man, as he looked at the denominations of the bills in his fingers. "I'm not so sure but we may have our hands full, after all—certainly, if she keeps on as she's begun!"

CHAPTER XIX

IT was after seven o'clock. The morning, for so early in September, was raw and cold. A tall young fellow with alert gray eyes and a square chin hurried around the corner of one of the great mills, and almost knocked a small girl who was coming toward him with head bent to the wind.

"Heigh-ho!" he cried, then stopped short. The child had fallen back and was leaning against the side of the building in a paroxysm of coughing. She was thin and pale, and looked as if she might be eleven years old. "Well, well!" he exclaimed as soon as the child caught her breath. "I reckon there's room for both of us in the world, after all." Then, kindly: "Where were you going?"

"Home, sir."

He threw a keen look into her face.

"Are you one of the mill girls?"

"Yes, sir."

"Night-shift?"

She nodded.

"But it's late—it's after seven o'clock. Why didn't you go home with the rest?"

The child hesitated. Here eyes swerved from his gaze. She looked as if she wanted to run away.

"Come, come," he urged kindly. "Answer me. I won't hurt you. I may help you. Let us go around here where the wind doesn't blow so." And he led the way to the sheltered side of the building. "Now tell us all about it. Why didn't you go home with the rest?"

"I did start to, sir, but I was so tired, an'—an' I coughed so, I stopped to rest. It was nice an' cool out here, an' I was so hot in there." She jerked her thumb toward the mill.

"Yes, yes, I know," he said hastily, and his lips set into stern lines as he thought of the hundreds of other little girls that found the raw morning "nice and cool" after the hot, moist air of the mills.

"But don't you see," he protested earnestly, "that that's the very time you mustn't stop and rest? You take cold, and that's what makes you cough. You shouldn't be—" he stopped abruptly. "What's your name?" he asked.

"Nellie Magoon."

"How old are you?"

The thin little face before him grew suddenly drawn and old, and the eyes met his with a look that was half shrewd, half terrified, and wholly defiant.

"I'm thirteen, sir."

"How old were you when you began to work here?"

"Twelve, sir." The answer was prompt and sure. The child had evidently been well trained.

"Where do you live?"

"Over on the Prospect Hill road."

"But that's a long way from here."

"Yes, sir. I does get tired."

"And you've walked it a good many times, too; haven't you?" said the man, quietly. "Let's see; how long is it that you've worked at the mills?"

"Two years, sir."

A single word came sharply from between the man's close-shut teeth, and Nellie wondered why the kind young man with the pleasant eyes should suddenly look so cross and stern. At that moment, too, she remembered something—she had seen this man many times about the mills. Why was he questioning her? Perhaps he was not going to let her work any more, and if he did not let her work, what would her mother say and do?

"Please, sir, I must go quick," she cried suddenly, starting forward. "I'm all well now, an' I ain't tired a mite. I'll be back ter-night. Jest remember I'm thirteen, an' I likes ter work in the mills—I likes ter, sir," she shouted back at him.

"Humph!" muttered the man, as he watched the frail little figure disappear down the street. "I thought as much!" Then he turned and strode into the mill. "Oh, Mr. Spencer, I'd like to speak to you, please, sir," he called, hurrying forward as he caught sight of the younger member of the firm of Spencer & Spencer.

Fifteen minutes later Ned Spencer entered his brother's office and dropped into the nearest chair.

"Well," he began wearily, "McGinnis is on the warpath again."

Frank smiled.

"So? What's up now?"

"Oh, same old thing—children working under age. By his own story the girl herself swears she's thirteen, but he says she isn't."

Frank shrugged his shoulders.

"Perhaps he knows better than the girl's parents," he observed dryly. "He'd better look her up on our registers, or he might ask to see her certificate."

Ned laughed. He made an impatient gesture.

"Good heavens, Frank," he snapped; "as if 'twas our fault that they lie so about the kids' ages! They'd put a babe in arms at the frames if they could. But McGinnis—by the way, where did you get that fellow, and how long have you had him? I can't remember when he wasn't here, and he acts as if he owned the whole concern, and had a personal interest in every bobbins in it."

"That's exactly it," laughed Frank. "He has a personal interest, and that's why I keep him, and put up with some of his meddling that's not quite so pleasant. He's as honest as the daylight, and as faithful as the sun."

"Where did you get him? He must have been here ages."

"Ages? Well, for twelve—maybe thirteen years, to be exact. He was a mere boy, fourteen or fifteen years old, when he came. He said he was from Houghtonsville, and that he had known Dr. Harry Spencer. He asked for work—any kind, and brought good references. We used him about the office for a while, then gradually worked him into the mills. He was bright and capable, and untiring in his efforts to please, so we pushed him ahead rapidly. He went to night school at once, and has taken one or two of those correspondence courses until he's acquired really a good education."

"He's practically indispensable to me now—anyhow, I found out that he was when he was laid up for a month last winter. He stands between me and the hands like a strong tower, and takes any amount of responsibility off my shoulders. You'll see for yourself when you've been here longer. The hands like him, and will do anything for him. That's why I put up with some of his notions. They're getting pretty frequent of late, however, and he's becoming a little too meddlesome. I may have to call him down a peg."

"You'd think so, I fancy, if you had heard him run on about this mill-girl half an hour ago," laughed Ned. "He said he should speak to you."

"Very good. Then I can speak to him," retorted the other, grimly.

NEWLY-ARRIVED IMMIGRANTS AT ELLIS ISLAND WAITING PERMISSION TO LAND

Questions and Answers

J. M. L., Jersey City, N. J. Where can I find the historical facts concerning the founding of America's first Temperance Society at Saratoga, a hundred years ago?

They are these, briefly: Dr. William Clark, a physician of Moreau, near Saratoga, was the moving spirit in the enterprise and took the first step. He saw intemperance prevalent in the community, and wrecking many lives. He enlisted the hearty co-operation of Rev. Mr. Armstrong, a Congregational preacher, and the two worked so effectively that within a month the "Union Temperance Society of Moreau and Northumberland" was organized. The exact date was April 30, 1808.

G. W. C., Miscouche, P. E. I., Can. 1. Why is there no latitude at, and for ten degrees north and south of the equator? Is there also no longitude for the same number of degrees? 2. What is the cause of the northern lights, or aurora, as they are sometimes called?

1. Latitude is the distance of a place from the equator measured on a meridian passing through the place. To the ancient peoples, the earth was larger east and west and they expressed that distance by longitudo (length), from which comes our word longitude, and north and south was latitudo, measuring breadth. Latitude is reckoned from the equator, regardless of distance. If a place be sixty miles north or south of the equator it will be one degree north or south. Reckoning does not begin at ten degrees, but at the equator. 2. Their cause is supposed to be magnetic and they are closely related to the sun.

SAMUEL PHELPS LELAND.

H. D., Ventura, Calif. Are we to understand by the 9th verse of the 3d chapter of John's first Epistle that those who sincerely profess Christ are absolutely sinless? If so, how are we to reconcile it with the 26th and 27th verses of the 10th chapter of Hebrews, also the 4th, 5th, and 6th verses of the 6th chapter of the same Epistle?

It means that in the regenerate, his higher nature, as begotten of God, does not commit sin. This principle within him is at absolute variance with sin and makes him hate all sin and desire to resist it. Luther, referring to this condition, wrote: "The child of God receives wounds daily and never throws away his arms, or makes peace with his deadly foe." His life is a continual warfare against sin, but he is kept by divine power from falling, although if he even momentarily permit his spiritual weapons to lie idle, he will feel the sharp attacks of sin. The ruling principle of his life is God's law, but the old nature may sometimes rebel. The passage from Hebrews 27 does not conflict with this. The passage in Hebrews 6 was written to urge advancement in the spiritual life and to warn them that the decline of spiritual energies would inevitably lead to a "falling away" and perhaps to ultimate apostasy. The warning was addressed not to the elect but to the lukewarm, who had shown a temporary faith, only to be followed by indifference.

S. B. L., St. Louis, Mo. What is the best method of determining the purity of honey?

A writer in the London Lancet of recent date says the ideal honey is a concentrated solution of sugar, i. e., of dextrose and levulose in equal proportions, with traces of formic acid, dextrin and other organic substances. Owing to the presence of impurities introduced by the bees, it is difficult to set up a standard of purity for commercial purposes. Another trouble is the artificial feeding of bees, and the introduction of adulterants, including cane sugar, starch, syrup, etc. Bees often fill their cells with molasses, honey dew and fruit juices other than pure nectar. Microscopical examination would be necessary to determine the quality and to ascertain the amount of glucose and other adulterants. Analysts can readily tell, from the character of the pollen, from what flowers the bees have been feeding and whether the claims regarding the purity of the honey are reliable.

S. T. R., Norwich, Conn., J. W., Steamboat Springs, Col., and others. 1. In what five States may an alien who has declared his intention of becoming a citizen vote after a residence of one year? 2. In what three States may he vote after six months' residence? 3. In what States must the voter be able to read and write English?

1. Arkansas, Indiana, Missouri, Oregon, Wisconsin. 2. Kansas, South Dakota, and Nebraska; in the latter he must declare his intention of becoming a citizen thirty days before election. 3. Massachusetts requires that all voters must be able to read and write English, and a test is given by the registration officer. Two States, Louisiana and Mississippi, have it as a partial requirement. In the former a man must be able to read and write or else own $300 of property, or his father or grandfather must have been registered as a voter before January 1, 1867. In the latter the voter must be able to read or understand the Constitution.

R. A. G., Stanberry, Mo. What did Paul really mean in the 11th verse of the 14th of Romans? Does it teach that all of us some time will confess Christ, either here or hereafter?

It has reference to the ultimate subjugation of the world to the true God, and implies also that the entire race will confess to him at the final accounting and will acknowledge his authority over their characters and actions.

Reader, Des Moines, Ia. In the Thousand Islands, the St. Lawrence summer resort, are there as many islands as the name would indicate?

There are more. There are 1,800 of them in a stretch of about forty miles.

Reader, McCool, Miss. 1. Are we to understand that the heathen will be saved even if the Gospel is not taught to them? 2. Are not those who are in the full possession of Gospel privileges liable to suffer greater loss, if they fail to carry to the heathen the plan of salvation, than the heathen are if we fail to give it to them? 3. Will not God raise up people of their own tongue to teach them his way?

1. They are under law, not grace, and will be judged according to their opportunities and their enlightenment. It is not ours to pass condemnation.

Judgment is of God. 2. We who know the Gospel and the command of Jesus to preach it to all peoples, have the greater responsibility. 3. He has his witnesses in every age and among all peoples.

A. B. H., Brookfield, Mass. Will you give some facts about the Great Chinese Wall?

The wall is about two thousand years old, and is said to have been built about 211 B.C. It is 1,728 miles in length. It starts from the sea on the Gulf of Pe-che-lee. Its northern limit is north of Peking; its southern near the city of Lan-choo. No regard was paid to the best route; regardless of obstacles it goes up mountains, down into ravines and across rivers. Its face is of cut granite, and the inside of earth and packed stone. It is twenty feet wide at the bottom, fifteen at the top and from twenty-five to thirty feet high.

Mrs. A. C. P., McLean, Tex. Was there any rain before the Flood? A minister asserted in the pulpit there was no rain until the Flood.

Read Genesis 2: 4-6. This, according to some geologists, indicates that the earth, being then in a cooling condition, had no rain; and they also affirm that there may have been none until the great precipitation at the Flood cleared the atmosphere, and established new conditions. (See chapters 8 and 9.) Of course, these are merely scientific speculations or conjectures, but they are not opposed to Scripture.

Reader, Omaha, Neb. When was the first electric light produced and who was the inventor?

In 1802, Humphry Davy produced electric light by the use of carbon points. An apparatus for regulating electric light was invented in 1845 by J. W. Star. Various improvements were made, but it was not until the last two decades that it was made practical for general use by the inventions of Edison and others.

Mrs. M. O. B., Minden Mines, Mo., writes:

The Roman Catholics may always sprinkle in baptism, but the Greek Catholics in Russia baptize by immersion. They immerse the infant three times—dip him clear under the water three times in succession. Several years ago, two of our friends made a tour around the world, and while in Russia witnessed this mode of the Greek Catholic baptism.

Mrs. M. J. M., Harvard, Mass. Matt. 12: 36. "But I say unto you, that every idle word that men shall speak, they shall give account thereof in the day of judgment." What is meant by idle words?

It means unseemly or improper conversation, levity, slander, scoffing, boasting, swearing, mocking at sacred things. The Saviour had been speaking of blasphemy and of the scoffing attitude of the Pharisees, who imputed his miracles to Beelzebub. The "idle words" presumably referred more particularly to their sceptical way of accounting for the miracles, of which they had spoken slightly.

The Missionaries' Rest Home

ELIM HOME at Belle Island, Conn., the summer resting-place for Christian workers of limited income, is now open for the thirtieth season, under the management of Rev. Mr. James and Mrs. James. The Home is located on Norwalk Harbor and Long Island Sound, one hour and a half by rail from New York. During past seasons, a number of workers among the poor of the cities and many returned foreign missionaries with small salaries have enjoyed the hospitality of the Home without charge. This has been made possible by the financial aid received from friends who were interested in the work. Others have paid a nominal sum according to their ability. Any readers who may desire to help the Home, and through it the workers who are its beneficiaries, may address Rev. William James, Belle Island, South Norwalk, Conn.

A Shan Talokeman

LIFE ON A BURMESE PLANTATION

By MISS SUSAN E. HASWELL

THE man who took our letters to post brought back to Alabama Plantation your very kind letter of March 31 and its enclosure of $50. do not think I can do better with the money than to apply it to the support of Nga Pong, the Shan-Yachim boy of whom I wrote to you. It will support him for two years. He was a strong Buddhist when he came, but now his faith in Buddhism is gone, and he believes in the Living God.

One night, being in real need, we began to ask very definitely for the wherewithal to bring the bamboo from the hills for our roof, for men to do the work and the money to pay them. We were also out of bran and unhusked rice for the fowls and pigs, and we asked that God would provide for them; that he would send rice and stores for ourselves, and rains and men and money for the plantation. Nga Pong looked at me very earnestly that evening after prayers and said, "Ma-ma, I am going to watch. If we get these things, I shall believe your God is the true God." And watch he did. One of our petitions was that the Lord would hold back the rain until our new roof was on.

One day, Nga Pong seemed to give himself up to the evil one. Late that afternoon I, too, gave way to irritation which had been gathering all day. That night came a tremendous down-pour, accompanied by a heavy gale of wind. Two big trees were snapped off short and nine plantain trees uprooted. I had brought a lot of pieces—remnants of oil-cloth, waterproof sheeting—from Moulmein, and with them we kept the balance of the cotton, the seeds, and my mattresses dry, but we ourselves were soaking wet for hours, and the whole house was afloat from stem to stern. My adopted daughter had a severe congestive chill followed by high fever. Things seemed dark indeed. I told Nga Pong that he had been wicked and I, too, had sinned in giving way to temper as I had, and that we both must confess our wrongdoing and ask God for Christ's sake to forgive us. We had no more rain after that till the roof was finished.

On the third morning after that came a man with a cart to beg me to visit a sick man in a village four miles away. I went and attended to that one sick man, and to a number of other suffering ones, preaching Christ wherever Burmese was understood. I had three men in the cart part of the way home and God gave me the right message for them. I reached home with five rupees in my pocket (fees for visiting the sick), and two bushels of bran for himself. I came home with three rupees in my pocket, two bushels of unhusked rice and another bushel of bran, to be sent in later in return for medicine. More plantains were sold. Another day a man came and bought three rupees' worth of medicine. The bamboo arrived and I had the money ready to pay the balance. Men came to put on the new roof and did it well and I had the money to pay them. We were still without stores, when a letter came saying the cotton, injured and stained by seawater as it was, had sold for nine pence per pound, and the balance of the money, after deducting expenses, was 92 rupees, which was at my disposal.

This bought rice for six months, cooking oil for the natives, onions, and 100 viss chillies. A viss is 3.60 pounds. I pay about 36 rupees for the 100 viss, and they retail here for one rupee per viss, giving me over 100 per cent. profit on what I sell, even after deducting expenses. I take the profit and use it for the carrying on of this work.

Besides all these blessings in answer to our prayers, my Burmese adopted daughter, Mah Thai Oo, who has charge of our Amherst home, writes that there is a registered letter waiting for me in her hands from England, and I know it must contain more help. Such wonderful loving kindness from the Lord kept sleep from my eyelids all night. I felt I had not the words to praise him.

After worship I said to Nga Pong again, "Has God answered our prayers, Nga Pong?" "He truly has," was the emphatic answer.

I may add to my letter that we have now plan-tains or bananas enough sold to supply the natives with six viss of fish condiment; also enough more to provide the whole establishment—barring myself—with fresh fish, just out of the sea, sufficient for today and to-morrow. This is one of the things we have been praying for.

Again thanking you for all your kindness, I am, etc.,

the pigs, given in exchange for medicine. I wish you could have seen Nga Pong's face as I counted out the money.

Some days afterward, while making another trip to the sick, my cartman told me that, unknown to me, he had heard me preach to a company of old men and had been deeply impressed. We talked of the things pertaining to salvation all the way to the village. I think the Lord has chosen that man for

THE American Pulpit

A Sermon by Robert Stuart MacArthur*

The Interrogative Confession

TEXT—JOHN 6: 68: "Then Simon Peter answered him, Lord, to whom shall we go? Thou hast the words of eternal life."

THE question in the previous verse was asked by our Lord in view of the defection of many disciples. They were merely formal disciples; they followed Christ partly because of the loaves and the fishes. You will observe by the preceding verses that Christ erected a very high standard of Christian living. The moment these followers discovered the test which he thus applied, they wavered in their attachment, and some of them turned away from following him farther. Our Lord was peculiarly sensitive to the treatment he received from men. He was the most perfect gentleman civilization has yet produced. He was the ideal man of the human race. His soul was poetic; his nature was esthetic; his heart was immaculate. Never was there a man, before nor since, who had so exquisite an appreciation of what is decorous between man and man, and between all men and himself; and when these disciples left off following him, his heart was deeply touched. There is great tenderness in his question, as he turned to the twelve disciples and asked, "Will ye also go away?" The pronoun ye in the Greek is emphatic; it puts the true followers in strong contrast with those who were going away. Christ was genuinely human while he was gloriously divine. There is an unspeakable pathos in his words when elsewhere he said, "The foxes have holes, and the birds of the air have nests; but the Son of man hath not where to lay his head." He was houseless, homeless, and often friendless. Jesus Christ on the earth was a prince in exile; he was the king of glory, absent from his palace, and from his throne. He had times of unspeakable longing for home. As he met the rebuffs, taunts, and scorn of men, homesickness often filled his soul. Voluntarily he became man, submitting to the limitations and humiliations of his earthly conditions; and there were times when he was distinctly and deeply conscious of those humiliations and limitations.

The Rising Tide of Unbelief

The question has often arisen as to whether or not our Lord really had any fear that these disciples intended to abandon his service. The true answer to that question seems to be that they were in danger of being swept away by the rising tide of unbelief, just as men are in danger to-day from the rising tide of historic criticism, and other forms of inquiry. In common with others, they saw that all their hopes of a temporal kingdom were taken away by Christ's declaration of the spirituality of the kingdom which he came to establish. The predominant idea of his question was one of tender solicitude; and his words must have had an influence in restraining the action of his disciples did they contemplate abandoning his service.

Peter became the mouthpiece of all the disciples. He was always ready to speak. An old writer quaintly says that Peter had not more of the ear of Christ than the other disciples had, but he had more of a tongue of his own. We may well ask, where else could they go, did they leave Christ? Where else can we go? Peter knew not; you know not; and I know not. Christ alone has the words of eternal life. His words were life-giving. He was, he is the fountain of life. Could they go to the scribes? Could they go to the Pharisees? They were blind leaders of the blind. Could they go back to Moses? That would be turning away from the sun in its meridian splendor to the gray dawn of the morning. John the Baptist was only a voice, telling us of Jesus the Christ. John the Baptist found his highest honor and his greatest glory in saying, "Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world!" Where could they go? To the world? To sin? To Satan? If you turn away from Christ, to whom or to what will you go?

I have often found it of great advantage, in determining my course of conduct, to ask myself this question, "If I do not this, what then shall I do? What course shall I pursue, if I do not adopt this course?" So the question became a very practical one for these disciples; it is equally a practical one for us now. Men are still asking this question; and to it various answers are given. I wish to speak of some of the answers that occasionally are given.

Shall we go to atheists and atheism? You must go somewhere. Shall we go to atheism? What is atheism? Look at the composition of the word. It comes from a, or alpha, privative, and theos, God. Many definitions of atheism have been given. Atheism meant one thing at one time, and another thing at another time. Among the early Greeks, atheism meant disbelief in the gods of the heathen mythology. Socrates was called an atheist, because he dared question the existence of these mythological deities. In the early days of Christianity, many Christians were called atheists by the heathen, because they repudiated heathen deities. What definition shall we give of atheism at this moment? I would say that atheism is any system of opinion which leads to the denial of God, as a living, personal being, and as the Creator, Ruler, and Lord of the world. In its scientific aspect, I think there are no atheists. Scientific atheism is practically dead; it is as extinct as the dodo. I do not know to-day in any literature, the literature of science or philosophy or theology, a great thinker who is a scientific atheist. The day of scientific atheism is past; I doubt much whether it will ever return. But in its practical aspect, atheists abound. Practically any man is an atheist who lives without God, who lives as if there were no God. Practical atheism is common, is dangerous, is deadly. Bacon has well said, "A little philosophy inclineth men's minds to atheism, but depth in philosophy bringeth men's minds to religion." Literally true also, is the observation of Plato in his Laws, when he says that "atheism is a disease of the soul before it becomes an error of the understanding." Men become atheistic in heart before they become even agnostic in head. According to the psalmist, it was a fool who said, "No God." The fool also said this in his heart; for the head even of a fool knew better. There are many men who live as if God were dead. If it could be authoritatively announced at twelve o'clock to-day that God was dead, no change would these men make in their modes of thought or their methods of life. They rise from their beds, and they seek their beds, and they eat their food, and they attend to their business as if there were no God. God is not in their thoughts; he is not in any of their ways. For them, to all intents and purposes, there is no God. This is a terrible picture of life. This conception takes away from us all that is above us to excite our awe and to evoke our adoration; it takes away from us all that is around us that is dearest in life, to awake our tenderness and to educe our affection. I beseech you, men and women, that you go this morning to Jesus Christ as personal Lord and Saviour. If you have not already gone to him, you are living without God, without hope, and without the highest and divinest life. To whom shall you go? To Jesus Christ. He alone has the words of eternal life.

Shall You Go to Materialism?

Shall you go to materialism? Materialism has many forms. Its lowest form is that which identifies mind with matter, and thought with motion. It is thus the twin brother of atheism. It must ever be so. He who denies the existence of God, must deny the spiritual personality of man. Atheism and materialism play into each other; practically they are one. Materialism is an old philosophical conception. We find it among the heathen of many types; we find it among the Sadducees in Christ's time. Pantheists in ancient and in modern days are, to a greater or less degree, materialists. Materialism is the gospel of the flesh; it is, as Carlyle called it, "the gospel of dirt." The moral of materialism is to produce plenty of phosphorus by good eating and good drinking; its practical suggestion is, "Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die." The lowest form of materialism is, according to the crude theories of Cabanis and Moleschott, that the brain secretes thought as the liver secretes bile. We are thus what we eat; we are animals. If we are only animals, and die as the beasts die, naturally we shall live as the beasts live. Here again I have to say, with sorrow, that many are practically materialists. They eat, drink and live without thought of their spiritual natures, or of their relation to God. They devote all their energies to gain and to pleasure. They live for time and sense; they are under the tyranny of the present. Like Esau, they sell their spiritual and immortal birthright for a mess of pottage. They rob themselves of their highest honor. They take the crown of manhood from their brow, and hurl it in the mire, and then trample it therein. What will you do? Go to Christ. He alone has the word of eternal life.

Shall You Go to Rationalism?

Shall you go to rationalism? I have sometimes felt that the preachers whom I heard in early years did a great injustice to truth, because they were always denouncing rationalism as opposed to religion. There is, indeed, a type of rationalism which is opposed to religion: it is a rationalism deduced from reason and opposed to revelation; it is an excessive deference to reason, but not reason in its highest form. True rationalism is in harmony with true religion. The irrational man is the irreligious man; the truly rational man is the genuinely religious man. Rationalism in religion has its place; religion may be above reason, but it is never contrary to reason. Religion is the highest reason. You climb the ladder of rationalism, round by round, until you reach its top, and then you reach out your hand in the dark; reason is unable to carry you farther, but there you can grasp the hand and hear the voice of God as your Friend, Saviour and Father. Rationalism has its sphere, and within that sphere it is authoritative. I repeat, reason and faith are not antagonistic to each other. They are working toward the same end.

When the great tunnel of Saint Gothard was constructed, workmen bored simultaneously from either side of the Alps. For nearly ten years, they worked in the dark; but in 1881, one of the parties of workmen began to hear, through the lessening thickness of intervening rocks, the sounds of the hammer and the voices of the workmen from the other side. They worked, listening, working; working, listening. One day they broke the intervening barrier down; men rushed from the other side, grasped hands and looked into each other's faces. They worked from opposite sides; but they were doing the same work. Precisely so it is with reason and faith; they are working from opposite sides toward the same end. It is a work of great spiritual engineering that brings these two sets of workmen, the disciples of reason and the disciples of faith, together in the heart of a mountain, or in the centre of a tunnel illuminated by the light of Jesus Christ. Whither shall you go? To Jesus Christ, bringing all your rationalism that is true with you; for Christ alone has the words of the noblest rationalism and of eternal life.

Shall You Go to Agnosticism?

Whither shall you go? To agnosticism, so some say. What is agnosticism? It is a theory of things that neither affirms nor denies the existence of God. It is the doctrine of nescience, or the theory which maintains that man cannot have any real knowledge of anything, but only impressions. With reference to theism, it is a condition of suspended judgment; it simply affirms that upon existing knowledge, the being of God is unknown. Sometimes the word agnosticism is equivalent to the belief that the being of God is not merely unknown, but is unknowable. What agnostics probably really mean, when they say that God is unknowable, is that God is unfathomable. It is true that, in the third century of church history, the term agnosticism was used by a sect, implying that God did not know all things; but that use of the word is unknown now. Agnostics are numerous. There is an agnosticism which is condemnable; and there is an agnosticism which is commendable. But there is also a reprehensible agnosticism. Who first used the word agnostic? It is comparatively a new word. You will not find it in the older dictionaries. We have become so used to it now, that it is difficult for us to realize that it was unknown until a few years ago. Mr. Huxley, in his Essays Upon Some Controverted Questions, tells us that almost all his colleagues in the philosophical society, to which he belonged, were "ists" of some sort; "and I, the man without a rag of a label, . . . took thought and invented what I conceived to be the appropriate title of 'Agnostic.' It came into my head as suggestively antithetic to the title 'Gnostic' of church history." We are thus indebted to him for this word. Regarding many things, every man is an agnostic. Regarding other things, all men are most joyously gnostic. Regarding still other things, a man may be neither a gnostic nor an agnostic. We may take refuge in another word recently coined, the word merognostic.

Celebrating Quebec's Ter-Centenary

Wolfe Monument

THRONED on its great gray crags high above the St. Lawrence River, Quebec, the most picturesque city on the North American continent, is celebrating the three hundredth anniversary of its founding. Its streets are filled with gaily dressed crowds, who climb up and down the narrow streets, throng the old cathedral and the church of Our Lady of Victory, and gaze with awe upon the great walls that gird it round and the massive ramparts of the citadel—"the Gibraltar of America." The accent of Paris mingles with the patois of the French-Canadian habitant and with the English of the British and American visitors. All mingle amicably on the ground over which the ancestors of the three peoples have struggled in the smoke of battle, and all have but the one purpose, to do honor to the ancient war-scarred city and the heroic figures which for a time seem to stand out against the twilight of the historic past. The entire Dominion of Canada contributed to the success of the celebration. Earl Grey, the Governor-General, was particularly active in securing contributions to save to the Canadian people the historic field on the Heights of Abraham, the dedication of which is a perpetual memorial to the bravery of both the British and French soldiers. It was an important part of the extensive programme.

The Prince of Wales comes as the guest of Canada. Thousands of soldiers are present to take part, and the streets are brilliant with gold lace and scarlet coats. Battleships came from France, Great Britain, the United States, Germany and many other countries to take part in the celebration. The programme is of great interest. All of the interesting events are announced some time in advance by mounted heralds, who ride about the city to deliver their proclamations. They are accompanied by men-of-the-watch dressed and accoutred as in Champlain's time. Their picturesque costumes find a fitting background in the old, mediæval-looking buildings and gates. These heralds-at-arms also announce the arrival of the Prince of Wales and other important guests. The Prince of Wales left England for Quebec on the battleship Indomitable, accompanied by four other battleships and two cruisers.

Although the city itself dates from 1608, soldiers and adventurous sailors and explorers from distant France were busy making history about the grim rock and the high shoulder of Cape Diamond many years before. These earlier events were also down on the pageant programme for commemoration. It was in 1535 that Cartier, with three small ships, sailed up the St. Lawrence and turned into the St. Charles, to the right of the present city. The exact spot of his landing is pointed out. Cartier had a vessel with high fore-castle and low in the waist, and with large square sails, painted with religious and heraldic emblems, the arms of France shown in brilliant colors. From its ports peeped the falcons and other light cannon of the early day, and from the masts floated the white flag sprinkled with the lilies of Bourbon. Cartier's landing is repeated in the pageant. The captain and crew dressed and armed after the fashion of the early sixteenth century, disembark and meet a swarm of Indians—real Indians in war paint and feathers. To them this Cartier of the twentieth century makes the same speech addressed to their ancestors by the explorer Cartier. The quaint ship, the glinting morions and corslets of the Frenchmen, the dignified figure of their leader, the circle of dark warriors, make a picture long to be remembered by all those fortunate enough to see it. It is an interesting fact that Cartier records the loss of one of his vessels and that a number of years ago it was found embedded in the banks of the St. Charles. Over four thousand men, women and children take part in the various scenes of the great pageant. Most of these scenes take place on the historic sites where the original events occurred.

Champlain's castle has been rebuilt in the lower town, copied from the drawing made by Champlain himself of the original "habitation." One of the great events of the celebration is the landing of Samuel de Champlain and the founding of the city. Then various events will be re-enacted that took place when New France was fighting for its existence against the Iroquois. Many readers will remember Mrs. Catherwood's famous story The Romance of Dollard.

Though Quebec is far from the battlefield, the whole event will be copied as nearly as possible and Dollard and the sixteen will hold a fort against the rush of overpowering numbers.

The concluding pageant of the years 1759 and 1760 show Generals Wolfe and Murray drawn up in battle array on the Plains of Abraham. Then all of the characters of the pageant are grouped in an effective tableau, there is a general salute by the massed troops, answered from the river below by a general salute of all the warships.

Regarding certain things, a man may emphatically say, "I know; he can say with Job, "I know that my Redeemer liveth." He can say with the blind man, whose sight was restored by Christ, "I know that, whereas I was blind, now I see." He can say with Paul, "I know whom I have believed, and am persuaded that he is able to keep that which I have committed unto him against that day." He can say with the beloved John, "We know that we have passed from death unto life, because we love the brethren." In regard to all these things, one may be a gnostic. Regarding many other things, one has to be agnostic. No man knows anything fully. I can apprehend God; I cannot comprehend God. Cennyson was right when he said:

Flower in the crannied wall,
I pluck you out of the crannies,
I hold you here, root and all, in my hand,
Little flower—but if I could understand
What you are, root and all, and all in all,
I should know what God and man is.

I can not understand this rose all in all. How then can I understand you? How can I understand God? How can I comprehend God? But I can know, and I do know, that God is my Father, that God is my Saviour, and that I am his redeemed child, born for eternity and on my way to his bosom; and all the skeptics in the universe cannot take that knowledge out of my soul.

I said a moment ago that there was recently coined a new word. It is a very suggestive word. Dr. Joseph Cook, when lecturing in Tremont Temple, Boston, used these words: "It is not true that we know everything, nor is it true that we know nothing. It is true that we know in part. Between gnosticism and agnosticism stands the sound philosophy of knowing in part." He went from Boston to Princeton, New Jersey; and talking with Dr. McCosh, said, "I want a word. It is in no dictionary. I want a word to express the idea of knowledge between gnosticism and agnosticism, of knowing in part." Dr. McCosh thought a moment, and then, in his quaint Scotch brogue, he said, "Wait a bit, till I get my Greek Testament." And away he ran, and got his Greek Testament. He asked, "What did the Apostle Paul say about knowing in part?" He turned to First Corinthians, the thirteenth chapter and the twelfth verse, where the apostle says, "Now I know in part;" and he took the Greek word for part, and the Greek word for know, and putting them together, he gave us the word "merognostic," descriptive of one who knows in part. Every thoughtful man must be a merognostic. Some things he knows, and he would die for them; some things he does not know, and never can know. Some things he knows in part, and this partial knowledge is peculiarly dear.

Shall you go to Churchism? Those who are accustomed to hear me, know that I never make light of the church of God; on the contrary, I honor the church as the bride of Christ. But there is a dangerous churchism. There is in some creeds an undue exaltation of the church. The church is made practically God. There is often a churchianity which is antagonistic to a true Christianity. The Roman Church is the most gigantic trust beneath God's heavens; it claims a monopoly of salvation. It makes the church the fountain of saving grace, and it makes the priests the channels through which grace flows. What is the distinctive element contra-distinguishing true Protestantism from Romanism? I might mention the mass; in important respects, the mass is the soul of the Roman Church. In Romanism, and in some branches of Anglicanism, the church claims a monopoly of salvation, and divine grace can flow only through the priest, the sacraments, and other appointed channels. In true Protestantism, every penitent can cry out to God directly, as did the publican, saying, "God be merciful to me a sinner," irrespective of any church, and irrespective of all priests. Every soul having so cried out to God, may have the answer, "Thy sins, which are many, are all forgiven thee; go in peace." I repudiate such churchmen as would give any church and any priests a monopoly on salvation. Away with such churchism! To claim such a monopoly of salvation is to be guilty of sacrilege. Come immediately to Christ. He alone has the words of eternal life.

Men and women, whither shall you go? You must go somewhere. The soul needs help and hope and life. Mysteries surround us; dangers are near. Whence came we? Whither go we? What are we? We want a man to sympathize with us, the Man Christ Jesus. We want a God to succor us, the God-Man, Christ Jesus. We want one near enough to love us, and to command our reverence and adoration. Oliver Wendell Holmes said truthfully:

Our midnight is thy smile withdrawn;
Our noontide is thy gracious dawn;
Our rainbow arch, thy mercy's sign;
All, save the clouds of sin, are thine.

Go now to Jesus Christ, that you may receive life eternal from him, its only and its divine source, to whom be glory now and evermore!

CUTTING THEIR IDOLS TO PIECES

FILIPINOS FORSAKING THEIR OLD RELIGION AND ENTERING INTO GOSPEL LIGHT

SOMETHING of the beauty of these islands you can imagine from this Cebu coast view. Here in the Protestant cemetery, overlooking just such scenery as this, rest the remains of the first martyr of Southern Cebu. It is in this village that we are now working, and in many ways it is a place of interest. Some four hundred of its inhabitants have given proof that they are willing to die sooner than turn from their new-found Saviour. Drinking, gambling, cock-fighting and in some instances the smoking of their strong tobacco has become with these native Christians a part of their past life.

Many are the reasons why such numbers of these Filipinos have relinquished their former religion, even before native evangelists and missionaries visited them. In this village, it was the fearful immorality of their priests which drove three hundred to leave the Church of Rome. Nearly all those who have followed in the steps of these three hundred men and women have done so through having the Gospel told them by the native Christians. Others of the converts have hesitated longer. They have had to see with their own eyes that their images were powerless before they dared to forsake them.

The discovery that idols "can be cut to pieces like coconuts," as many astonished men and women said, when they saw the heaped-up and broken heads of saints and virgins which the converts had thrown out in the street near their homes—had a great lesson in it for the superstitious souls who had put their trust in their images, burning daily lights before their special saints at the altar in their houses, and in times of sickness and death burning these lights before their images often both day and night.

"It is true what you told me. My image is no use. The new one I got is worm-eaten already," is a frequent remark between friends, where but a few years ago such words would have meant imprisonment, if not death. These villagers, speaking of themselves, say that "the only authority we have been taught to trust in for our rights is the bolo."

Some days ago, one of the poor farmers came to his village to pay his head and land tax. For this he proffered $4, which he had supposed was sufficient. The native treasurer received the money, and then told the man that he still owed another dollar. A short time later, the farmer returned to the treasurer's office and paid down the dollar due, which he had to borrow, having, with the $4 paid already, given all the money he had. The poor man was then roughly asked for the other $4, when he reminded the treasurer that he had already paid him. The only answer he got was an accusation that he had robbed the treasury box. The Filipino knew what it meant—imprisonment on false accusation; and, as there were none present who would dare to witness for him against the official, he went out and borrowed the other $4 and paid it. Injustices of this sort are often suffered by the villagers. The feeling of the people outside of the cities in which there is more American influence, is that "there is no redress for injustice." While this spirit of hopelessness remains, farms will lie well nigh untilled, and those who are without hope through the word of God for the life to come so to drown the miseries of the hour in drink and gambling. Here in this fertile southern Cebu staple village food is boiled corn. On this, with little else to nourish them, men and women do the daily work, they and their children rarely having more than the small fish or shell fish caught and gathered round the beaches, and many a villager eats more meals without these accessories than with them.

The village of Oslob has had a native evangelist—a Bible woman—for nearly a year. The 600 converts are many of them to-day the leading people in the village of 7,000 inhabitants. Their lands are well tilled, and their children get all the schooling they can obtain for them. They have organized evangelistic work and Sunday School. A committee has been formed to weave and make up clothing for orphan boys in their congregation, and to prepare them for going to the mission school in the island of Negros. Among the Protestants of Oslob to-day the public voice is too strong against wrong doing to permit open injustice. Where men and women stand for the teachings and principles of the Gospel, living their faith and preaching in homes, and in open air services where they have the public ear, injustice has to work in secret.

The gifts of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers to supply a mission boat for these people means for very many of them peace in this life, and hope for the life to come! How much the Gospel is appreciated by these Cebuans is fully proved. Night after night, men and women from around and within this village of Santander, where we are now working gather in our home to study the Bible. To many of those who live in other villages, this means nightly a walk of eight miles over rough paths, and up and down rugged hillsides. But none ever fail to attend. On Sunday they gather in to the morning service, and to Sunday School, in their recently built church, the dedication of which was sealed with the blood of one of their number. They return to their homes and villages, and again walk back, through the hot hours of the afternoon, to help in the open-air service. The crowd of hearers presses around us, as if forgetful of all else, as they listen to the Gospel message.

In this, and other villages too, before this year is past the word of God will have been heard and understood by multitudes to whom it will be brought by the messengers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD mission boat.

Bishop Bashford on Chinese Pastors

THE Chinese pastor has an important part in the scheme of evangelization. The missionary often has charge of a district of a million or more people. Hence he can spend only a small part of his time at any particular station. The native pastor lives at the station, preaches daily either at the principal station or somewhere on the circuit, sells books and portions of the Bible, receives visits from those who wish to inquire about the doctrine, and goes to the places of business and the homes of the people in order that he may become acquainted with them. His aim is first to win their respect, then their confidence, and last, to lead them to Christ. In a word, the Chinese pastor is the shepherd of his flock, the divine instrument in winning others to the Christian life.

The station at which the pastor lives is usually the centre of a circuit over which he travels, just as the missionary travels over a large section of country. I know one circuit which embraces thirty-six villages, and some of these villages number from one to three thousand people. The pastor goes from village to village, usually on foot, and he preaches and catechises, instructs inquirers in the way of life, and heartens the little band of Christians to remain loyal to the Master. When difficulties and disagreements arise, he is summoned to arbitrate them. In cases which require discipline, he learns all the facts, so far as possible, and reports them to the missionary. Many of the Chinese yet look upon all foreigners with suspicion, but they understand the native pastor, just as we understand an American neighbor. The Chinese pastor, therefore, removes misunderstandings and makes plain to the people the motives which bring the missionary from his far-off home to live and labor and die among a strange people.

In the absence of the missionary, the native pastor also has oversight of the day school for boys, and his wife may have charge of a day school for girls. Often the pastor is the teacher of the day school. Owing to the immense population of China and the smallness of the missionary force, it is plain that, unless the missionary is furnished with helpers, the evangelization of the empire is impossible. Counting the entire missionary force—ministers, physicians, teachers, missionaries of the Woman's Boards, and wives of missionaries—there is only one missionary in China to each 132,000 of the population. Omitting the wives of the missionaries, there is approximately only one missionary to every 250,000 of the population. Omitting those engaged in medical work and teaching, there is left for the direct preaching of the Gospel substantially one worker for every 750,000 or 1,000,000 of the population. These facts reveal at a glance the necessity of supplementing the labors of the missionary pastor by the labors of the Chinese preachers.

One missionary remarked at a small gathering of business men recently that, during the last five years, he had trained personally nineteen men who had entered the Christian ministry, aside from others who had become teachers; and that one of these nineteen men received into the church last year one hundred and nineteen members. It is only by the training and use of the native preachers that the Western churches can hope to evangelize the Chinese Empire in the not distant future. To appreciate this fact is to appreciate the place of power which the Chinese preachers hold and the imperative need for the church speedily to increase their numbers.

Among the Workers

—THE NATIONAL REFORM ASSOCIATION, an undenominational, non-partisan organization, will dedicate its new Auditorium on the Winona Assembly Grounds on August 9. A Christian Citizenship Conference will be held in the new building August 13-15.

—MISS ETHEL J. WHEELER, daughter of a wealthy New Yorker, has accepted a call to missionary work in China under the Protestant Episcopal Board. Her father, Everett P. Wheeler, is one of the leading lawyers in the State, and up to the present time the daughter has occupied an enviable position in society, with all the advantages that wealth and culture could command.

—THE INTERDENOMINATIONAL BIBLE CONFERENCE, of which Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman is Director, will be held at Winona Lake, Ind., August 16 to 25. Among the distinguished speakers announced are Rev. W. I. Watkinson, D. D., of London; Rev. W. J. Dawson, D. D., of London; Rev. C. L. Goodell, D. D., of New York; Rev. C. F. Aked, D. D., of New York; Gipsy Smith, the celebrated evangelist; Bishop J. C. Hartzell of Africa, and Commander Eva Booth of the Salvation Army.

MR. BRYAN'S SIMPLE HOME LIFE

Hon. Wm. Jennings Bryan

The Bryan Home near Lincoln, Neb.

Mrs. Bryan

MRS. ROOSEVELT was giving a reception to the distinguished men who were in Washington in attendance upon the Convention of Governors one afternoon last spring. It had been intended that the affair should be a garden party on the spacious lawn at the south of the White House; but an all-day rain had made that an impossibility and guests were being received in the Blue Parlor. Besides the delegates to the convention, everybody of social importance at the capital was there. After speaking to their gracious hosts, the guests passed into the Red Room or drifted into the long corridor, or into the State Dining Room, where from a handsomely appointed tea-table refreshments were served.

There were so many notable people present that the company soon fell into little groups around the different men whose success in statecraft, science, or literature had made them famous. Presently the Red Room became congested. Seemingly everybody was crowding in there, while the polite ushers were inviting the throng to pass on into the dining-room, which was almost empty.

"Who in the world is it whom everybody in here is stopping to speak?" asked a little lady, as she vainly craned her neck to see over the shoulders of those around her.

"It is William Jennings Bryan," said her companion, who had made his way through the packed room and had managed to return to her. "He certainly is the lion of the afternoon. Everybody is waiting to speak to him."

The peculiarity of the circumstances may have made it a little trying for Mr. Bryan; but if so, his frank, cordial manner did not desert him and his genial smile could not but disarm criticism. The congestion of the room grew worse and some of his friends finally steered him into the larger apartment, the State Dining Room, where with less crowding the ovation continued. While every one wanted to meet him, some of those who did so had silly ideas of what they should say. One man shook hands with him effusively, remarking heartily as he was about to pass on, "I like you, Mr. Bryan; I always have, but I may not wholly agree with your principles."

Mr. Bryan grasped the speaker's slipping hand firmly and brought him to a stand-still as he answered, "And yet, what would there be in me to agree without my principles? They are exactly what make me all that I am."

"Do you know," said one of the guests as he was leaving the White House a few moments later, "that Bryan meant that from the bottom of his soul? He believes in his principles with a depth of intensity which can not but make even his enemies respect him."

"And do you know that Mrs. Bryan is just as firm a believer in them, too?" said a woman of the party quickly. "I do not know of another man in public life whose wife has made such a study of the questions that engross him, and who has such unshakable faith in her husband and his policies."

The last speaker was quite right. Mrs. Bryan has made a remarkable study of the public questions which absorb Mr. Bryan, and her faith in him is simply limitless. That faith began more than twenty-five years ago, when she, Miss Mary E. Baird of Perry, Ill., was a student at the Presbyterian Seminary at Jacksonville, and he was finishing his collegiate course at the Illinois College in the same town. She had faith in him then, and a few years later, faith sufficiently strong to marry him despite the fact that neither of them had much money, and that he was almost a briefless barrister. She knew that it meant years of struggle to establish a practice which would bring them a comfortable home. Her faith strengthened with the years, and after a while, in order to help him prepare for the position in life which by this time she had become convinced he was destined to fill, she, in addition to her household cares and the duties of motherhood, studied law and was admitted to the bar. But not to practise; no, she never made a public speech on any subject in her life.

"I only did it in order to know how to help Will," she said quietly at the time; and she did not seem to think it was in the least remarkable.

But Mrs. Bryan is a natural student. She loves books and she is always studying something. A reporter on a New York daily paper went out to Nebraska to see Mr. Bryan last year. He was invited out to Fairview to breakfast at an hour which to him was "unconscionably early." There was an empty chair at the table.

"Where is Mrs. Bryan?" asked the New Yorker.

"Oh," replied her husband, "three times a week she goes to the university for an early class in German. You see," he continued with a smile, "I can't read German, and she thought it might be a good thing to have some one in the family who could get at first-hand the sentiments of the German press." Nor did it seem that her husband thought this was the least unusual in Mrs. Bryan.

Home does not depend upon the house we happen to occupy. Home is where our loved ones are about us, and Mrs. Bryan long ago learned to make the home environment for her family, no matter whether it chanced to be in the Lincoln cottage, the boarding-house at Washington, the innumerable hotels in which they have stopped in all parts of their own and other countries, or at the loved Fairview—"The Farm," as Mr. Bryan always calls it, and which has become so familiar to all American newspaper readers. Mr. Bryan is the "homiest" kind of a man. He can not be happy unless his family is with him and it has become proverbial that Mrs. Bryan or some of the children, or all of them, will be with him if he is going on a journey. In his first presidential campaign, Mrs. Bryan went with him every mile of he thousands he traveled in his speech-making tours.

When he went around the world last year he took Mrs. Bryan and the two younger children, and was inconsolable because Mrs. Leavitt's babies were too small to permit her to go also. Anywhere is home for the Bryans if they are together, but no other place is quite so dear as Fairview.

When Fairview was building, Mrs. Bryan made her family comfortable in a small building which afforded but few facilities. It didn't appear to be a bit of trouble for her to do it, and at the same time to continue to entertain the men of national political repute who are constantly visiting them. Fairview stands on a knoll in the midst of the wide, rolling Nebraska prairies, about three miles from Lincoln. It is a white-turreted, wide-porch, handsome house, such as any well-to-do farmer might, and such as many of the farmers of the West do, own. It is roomy and comfortable and its refined, unostentatious furnishings reflect the good taste of its cultured mistress. From any point at the house windows, or on the encircling porches, there is a magnificent view of the limitless Nebraska prairies, at this season of the year covered with an ocean of green, waving, rustling corn which shades into a thousand hues with every passing breeze.

The library at Fairview—it is another index of the household that the library is the living room of the family—is Mr. and Mrs. Bryan's workshop. Its walls are lined with book-cases filled with volumes which would be considered pretty "heavy"

Ruth Bryan Leavitt and her Children

Miss Grace Bryan

Soon after the young people were married, they left Illinois and went to Lincoln, Neb., where they took an unassuming little house in a side street. They were the happiest married folk in all the city, for in the little cottage their three babies were born, and the joys of parenthood made them forget the inconveniences of poverty. Mr. Bryan opened a law office and it was not long until he was actively identified with the Democratic party of the State. In 1890 he was nominated for Congress in a district that was hopelessly Republican—older Democrats refused the nomination. He made the race. Mrs. Bryan stood back of him, encouraging him every foot of the way, and she was not at all surprised when he won.

When they went to Washington, Mrs. Bryan did not attempt to shine as a social light. She never has had much weakness for that kind of shining. She took up the social duties their official position imposed, took them up with grace and tact, but gave no time to pink teas or euchre parties. Instead, she mastered stenography and the typewriter—"to help Will" again. She matriculated in certain literary branches from one of the Washington Universities, and she also managed to study the economic and political problems which Mr. Bryan had begun encountering in Congress, and which he was defending or attacking in his public speeches. Again and again they threshed them out together, until she was almost as conversant with their leading principles as Mr. Bryan himself.

The Call of the Woods

IN THE broad sunlit country this golden season, known as "vacation time" in the city, is one of joyous activity and work. The swish of the scythe, the rattle of the reaper and the harvester, and all the pleasant sounds of country life in summer time fill up the pauses in labor's psalm of contentment and gratitude and life reaches its seasonal meridian at the time when the city is least attractive and least endurable to its dwellers.

The vacation problem, therefore, is at this season of the year chiefly a city problem. And it is a problem for only the favored few who can spend a month or six weeks in the country. As for the wealthy—they can climb the Alps in summer, or fish or sail in the fjords of Norway, and take their own time for returning. For those, therefore, who are blessed with neither poverty nor riches, there is always a special charm to vacation time. To those who have learned to know and love nature the summer days that take them back near to nature's heart in shadowy wood and along cool streams and rivers and make them forget, even for a brief season, the toil and financial fret of the artificial life of cities, are days and nights of unalloyed delight.

Every city dweller, if possible, should enjoy this annual luxury of a brief visit back to nature. It is worth making sacrifices to compass this end. Life will be the saner and sweeter for it and perhaps even the brevity of the glimpse will add to the charm and partly compensate, at least, for lack of longer enjoyment.

Evangelizing the East

IT WOULD be difficult to conceive of a stronger argument in support of the native missionary substitute plan than that advanced in the article from the pen of Bishop Bashford which appears in another part of this issue. We commend it cordially to the attention of all who have become interested in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S work in foreign mission fields.

Bishop Bashford's picture of the native pastor, absorbed in his multifarious duties and possessing advantages for reaching the people which no foreigner could ever hope to command, is not peculiar to China. In a large measure, it applies to India, Siam, Burma, Korea, Japan, the Philippines, Africa, South America and every mission field under the sun. In all of these, native Christian preachers, teachers, evangelists and Bible women, supported by CHRISTIAN HERALD readers, are at work to-day doing effective service in the extension of Christ's kingdom. We would rejoice to see their number multiplied a hundredfold, for, as Bishop Bashford points out, it is only by the use of native-trained preachers that the Western Church can hope to evangelize the East in the not distant future.

On Equal Ground

AN UNGALLANT legislator has recently presented, before the legislative assembly of his State, a bill setting forth the perils to which unsophisticated men are liable through the wiles of designing women. His crusade seems to be directed against those pomps and vanities, frivolities and furbelows which ages ago aroused the wrath of the prophet Isaiah when he formulated his censure of the women of his time. The prophet declaimed against the veils, the wimples and the crimping pins, even as our legislative friend cries out against devices of dress that are patent to everybody, ribbons and bows and ruffles, corsets, rich gowns, artificial teeth and false hair. He goes so far as to recommend the enactment of a statute by which marriage may be annulled in case a man be decoyed and deceived into entering matrimony by any of these time-honored feminine adjuncts. Such a statute, were it passed, would be inoperative, and it appears probable that the man who has introduced it by suggestion must either be a disappointed suitor, or a legislator anxious to vary the monotony of a session by a discussion that may provoke laughter.

The plain truth of the whole matter is that when it comes to courtship men and women stand on equal ground. Women are no more likely to deceive men by a false presentation of themselves than are men to deceive women. Most people are compelled to wait for entire acquaintance with one another until the marriage ceremony has made them one. Yet a good foundation of mutual esteem, fixed principle, and true love will be staunch enough for the building of a home in which the two may live their blended lives. The little surprises incidental to the intimacy of marriage only end by making each dearer to the other.

Our American women are distinguished for their good taste in dress; yet one of the reasons offered by the legislator in question as an apology for his bill, is that he has been a guest at certain popular resorts where he was impressed with the extravagance of feminine dress. Had he no women-kind of his own to tell him that one of the pleasures of going on a visit is, for a woman, the wearing of her best gowns? This is not a vindication either of vanity or extravagance, both of which are to be condemned in men and women. It is really a protest against the folly of accusing Eve's daughters for wiles that are not wilful, but simply womanly.

Prohibition's Progress

IN A QUIET and orderly manner, and without any of the frenzied enthusiasm that marked the great gatherings at Chicago and Denver, the National Convention of the Prohibitionists met in Columbus, O., and nominated its candidates for President and Vice-President. Eugene W. Chafin of Wisconsin, the chosen leader, is well known as an exceptionally able temperance advocate, speaker and organizer, who has been nominated by his party for Congress, for Governor, and for Attorney-General at times when the movement was young, and the task of leadership little more than to keep the fragmentary vote together, in the hope of greater strength at some future day. As his running mate, he has an Ohioan, Aaron S. Watkins of Ada.

It has been the custom among politicians to look upon the Prohibition movement as fanatical and hopeless, and the nomination of Prohibition candidates in a national campaign as being done for principle's sake or for effect alone; but this is a short-sighted view of the case. All the great social and political reforms the world has ever known have begun slowly and gathered volume and momentum only after many years of seemingly futile and unrewarded effort. It has been so with the temperance movement. Step by step it has grown from insignificance to the proportions of a great, overshadowing social question, touching the very life and well-being of the nation. With a more widely-diffused knowledge of the drink question, the American people now begin to understand why that issue should stand out apart from all others, separate and distinctive, and not complicated with local and personal political interests, as was the case in the recent Tennessee election, where prohibition received a temporary set-back because of such complications.

With 36,000,000 people now living in localities where the whole liquor traffic has been placed under legislative restraint, local or State, the Prohibitionists have reason for nothing but encouragement.

Religion in Summer Time

THE extreme heat of summer has a tendency to exhaust the physical energies of men and women, and often to wilt religious sensibilities. In many parts of the secular world, the summer is the time for unusual exertion. The farmer has to stretch every nerve in his labor at that season of the year. The men who lay the brick and hammer the wood and pound the iron, find then the demand for their heaviest work.

There has been a tendency upon the part of ministers and many church members to take a long vacation in the summer time. Though not a saloon or gambling place or evil resort closes a door, many churches are closed. The spiritual fields are emptied of the harvest hands. The devil, however, never takes a vacation.

This temporary abandonment of the field is the worst policy for the cause of righteousness. The members of the various churches, as they go to the mountain or sea-shore or other place of retreat, feel little obligation to attend church, or to prosecute their religious duties with any method or vigor. There are many true men and women who can Christ with them to the country and do not lose a jot of their spiritual zeal; but there are also many who are careless, who spend the Sunday in pleasure, keeping their hearts far away from God.

It is a good sign of the times that the church are arranging excellent supplies during the summer time, either by union services or by services at the individual churches, where those who remain in the cities can be properly fed and where the kingdom of God can be built up, instead of being allowed to go waste. In most of the great cities of the country special evangelical services have been instituted, tents, out-of-door meetings, large halls and other places, where neither money nor talent is spared bringing men to a knowledge of Christ's truth. Those who formerly used to smile cynically at the closed doors and silent pulpits of the cities, now begin to realize how potential these new evangelic methods are in fighting the forces of sin.

It will be well if Christians on their vacation should ask themselves continually: "Can I take my Saviour with me each day and will he approve that which I am about to do?" This will act as a safeguard against many a temptation, and when the season is over they will be able to look back upon it without the sharp thrusts of conscience which are reminder of a time when God was well-nigh forgotten.

This Year's Immigration

IT IS expected by the authorities at Ellis Island New York Harbor, that the number of immigrants to this country will fall short of the great number who sought their fortunes in America last year. The total number of immigrants last year was 1,285,349. This includes the figures from all places of entry, but the great majority came in by way of New York. This number was quite an increase over the year before, the figures for 1904 standing at 1,100,735. Ten years back, in 1898, the figures were but 229,299.

The main reason for the falling off in numbers is the fact that the large industries have been curtailing their output and additional hands have not been required. There has also been quite a return tide, small, to be sure, compared with the stream of humanity bound hither, returning to the Old World. This return tide has been perhaps more noticeable among the Italians, but the latter seem natural travelers and many of those who have gone home may be back again when the demand for laborers is greater.

The decline in this year's immigration is a matter of figures to the casual visitor at Ellis Island, for it seems to him as if the place was crowded on days when the trans-Atlantic liners come in and the inspectors and officials apparently have their hands full. On the cover of this issue is a picture of a party of immigrants waiting for the boat to take them from the Island to the mainland. The officials are exercising more care in the examination of would-be citizens and more undesirables are returned than formerly.

An Apostle to the Filipinos

WHEN the United States Government took possession of the Philippines, the fetters were taken from the Bible and religious liberty was guaranteed. One of the most conspicuous figures in the establishment of Protestant Christianity in the Philippines is Nicholas Zamora. His father was banished to an island in the Mediterranean for being found with a Bible in his possession. Nicholas was educated at the Catholic College in Manila. When his father returned from banishment, the American flag floated over Manila, and one of the first things he did was to teach his son the Bible. At a meeting held by Rev. Arthur W. Proutch, the father was asked to make a speech, but making a rather unsuccessful attempt, he said to his son: "Nicholas, you try." The son sprang quickly to his feet, opened the Bible and read and expounded with enthusiasm a portion of the Scripture. He was ordained deacon in the Methodist Episcopal Church by Bishop Thoburn. The aged father sat in the audience when his son was ordained, and when the service was over, the old man rushed forward, threw his arms around Bishop Thoburn and hugged him and wept on his neck and rembringly quoted in the Spanish language the words of Simeon: "Lord, now let thy servant depart in peace." Under the leadership of young Zamora, the first Protestant church in the Philippines was built, since which time he has been kept busy building churches and gathering in converts. Many of the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD have watched with pleasure and gratitude his wonderful work and have contributed to its success. In a recent letter from Mr. Zamora to Dr. Klopsch, the writer says:

I am sending you a photograph of my church, the Methodist Episcopal of South Pablo Tondo, which was only finished this year, costing $11,500 with the ground. The cost of the land was contributed by the members, but the price of the church is a donation from America, contributed by some 700 persons. This is the third year of my assignment in the circuit of Tondo, and thanks to God and all who have assisted me, I am doing all I can for the Gospel of our one Saviour Jesus. During the year 1907 I have received as members fully 200; members on probation, 121; adult baptism, 131; infant baptism, 100; sermons preached in my circuit and in various other towns, 273; and much more other work. I pray that you will publish my immense gratitude to all my sincere brothers in Christ who have given me their aid. I pray that God will bless them and reward them not only in this life but also in the other.

The taking of the Philippines was an historic event, not contemplated by the American Government. Their sudden acquirement threw a tremendous responsibility upon the United States. There is hope for the country in the riches of its material resources, in the increased education of the people, in the enlarged ideas of liberty that are filling the minds of the natives; but the largest, the richest gift which we can possibly bestow upon them is an open Bible and an earnest evangelism like that of Zamora. Having a knowledge of Christ, a conformity to his character and an obedience to his will, all else of individual and national value will be added to the people of the Philippines.

Seek ye the kingdom of God; and all these things shall be added unto you. (Luke 12: 31.)

A Famous Hymn Writer Gone

Mrs. Joseph F. Knapp, daughter of the late Dr. Walter Palmer and Phebe Palmer of New York, died lately in Poland Springs, Me., where she had gone to spend the summer. She was one of the most widely known and highly esteemed women in the country, was equally eminent as a musician, philanthropist and writer of sacred hymns. Her husband, the late Joseph Fairchild Knapp, was the organizer of the American Lithograph Company and also the founder of the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company. His ample wealth was generously dispensed for the welfare and happiness of his family and his fellow men. Mr. and Mrs. Knapp entertained distinguished guests after a royal manner in their mansion at the corner of Bedford Avenue and Ross Street, Brooklyn. Beside prominent people in New York and Brooklyn, great men in various callings, of Europe and other countries, were the guests enjoying their splendid hospitality, Presidents Grant, Hayes, Garfield, Harrison and most of the Methodist bishops being among the number. After the death of her husband, twenty years ago, she went to the Hotel Savoy to live, fitting up a suite of rooms in a costly manner and installing in them an organ costing $30,000. She was one of the most famous hymn writers in the country, and during her travels in Europe she was invited to Sheffield, the centre of music in England, and was given such a reception as was never before accorded a musician in that city.

Among the most popular of her hymns are: "The Dawn of Hope," "Open the Gates of the Temple," "I Shall Be Satisfied," "O Lamb of God," "Never Further Than Thy Cross," "Everlasting Love," "Cling to the Cross," "Nothing But Love." But the best of all her hymns and the one most widely sung around the globe is, "Blessed Assurance, Jesus is Mine." She and her husband were members for many years of the South Second Street Methodist Church in Williamsburg. Together they were the principal founders of the St. John's Methodist Episcopal Church in Bedford Avenue. They also built the Sunday School and for many years Mr. Knapp was its superintendent. After her husband's death she gave South Second Street Methodist Church a chapel in his memory. As a widow, Mrs. Knapp devoted almost all her time to charitable work and spent very much of the $50,000 of her annual income in works of benevolence and piety. It is so often the case that those who have wealth and culture, meeting the social responsibilities of life, are chilled in their spiritual sensibilities and turned away from the simple duties of the church. Mrs. Knapp, while meeting her social and intellectual obligations, made it the chief work of her life to manifest the spirit of Christ and help to usher in tury ago, a Pennsylvanian was fishing on the banks of the Schuylkill River. He caught a mess of fish and built a fire with which to cook them. He put some black-looking stones by the side of the sticks of wood which made his fire, as a guard. The next morning he found the wood burned to ashes and the dark stones glowing with fire. He took samples of these stones down to Philadelphia, where they were examined scientifically and a company was formed and the first anthracite coal mining of America began. We can rely upon the genius of the Anglo-Saxon to discover some substitute for hard coal, when it shall have been exhausted.

Thou hast walked up and down in the midst of the stones of fire. (Ezek. 28: 14.)

The Late Mrs. Joseph F. Knapp

Fourth of July Slaughter

Despite the warnings of the police and fire departments of the various cities of the country, the fearful slaughter of the Fourth of July was repeated. Children were killed with pistols and cannon crackers and explosives of one kind or another. Boys, girls, men and women were shot to death in their homes and in the streets by stray bullets of careless and drunken persons celebrating, and when the harvest of lockjaw victims shall have been gathered, in the few weeks to come, the slaughter will be up to the average of other years—running into the hundreds of thousands. It is said that within five years, more people have been killed by the reckless celebration of our Fourth of July than fell in the battles of the American Revolution.

This wanton butchery is a scandal and shame and should be stopped. The press must continue to lift its voice and the police authorities of the country must insist upon a rigid enforcement of law, and, if necessary, our laws must be changed so as to give better protection. These days of machinery and swift travel make accidents that are unavoidable, which are numerous enough without adding to the list the large numbers slain by the consummate folly of a heathenish celebration. There is a demand for a more rational and safe celebration of our Fourth day of July, and society must remember that every life that is sacrificed causelessly is nothing short of murder, for which there must be a serious accounting.

Thou shalt not kill. (Exod. 20: 13.)

Worthy Promotion

A leading magazine for July, in an article on the bishops recently elected by the Methodist Episcopal Church, among other things says: "It is interesting as proving that Methodism is true to her tradition in remaining the church of the common people, that not a single one of these eight bishops was the child of wealth or ease. Two were poor immigrant boys; three others were the sons of immigrants. Of the eight, one was the son of a weaver; three others had poor Methodist preachers for fathers; three were the sons of humble farmers, and one was the child of a merchant, and he, while yet a mere lad, was compelled to get out and dig for himself. The homes of these boys, however, were rich in the highest thought, the noblest ambition, and the finest character. These very sons of poverty and toil are now the favorites of wealth and culture as well as the proud possession of the plain people and the poor." Robert McIntyre, when not yet in his majority, laid bricks on walls in the city of Chicago after the fire and, in an incredibly short time, he was pastor of one of its most important pulpits, and as a preacher and lecturer he had a national reputation. Frank Bristol, when a boy, it is said, did work with his hands by the hour for pay in Evans-ton, Ill., to help educate himself, and in a few short years he became pastor of a great church of that city, and preached in the first pulpits of Chicago. These two men were among the eight bishops elected at Baltimore. These men came of good stock, but the necessity for toil and the love of it were very strong factors in their promotion. Hard work measures most of the distances that indicate life's inequalities.

Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might. (Eccles. 9: 10.)

his kingdom. There was the absence of pride and arrogance of wealth, rather the disposition to transmute it into love for the happiness of others and the honor of her Master.

Favor is deceitful, and beauty is vain; but a woman that feareth the Lord, she shall be praised. (Prov. 31: 30.)

Exhaustion of Coal Fields

Edward W. Parker, of the United States Geological Survey, estimates the country's annual production of coal as far forward as the year 2055. By that time, according to records to date, the United States will be using 2,300,000,000 tons a year. The average annual production during the decade from 1916 to 1925 will be about 600,000,000 tons. The total production in 1907 was 480,450,042 tons. The geologist prophesies that future generations "will have so far developed methods of subduing and utilizing other forces of nature that the need of coal for the production of heat, light and power will to a great extent have been eliminated." Until these other natural forces are subdued, however, it appears that there will be enough coal to supply the nation. Mr. Parker doubts "if the production of anthracite will ever greatly exceed the production of 1907, which was about 76,000,000 long tons." "When the period of decline does set in," he says, "the decrease in production will be gradual, and some anthracite will be used well into the next century." The story is told that a little over a cen-

TALKS ON THE COOL VERANDA

Cleanliness and Public Health

THE human race was hardly out of Eden when in the person of the first murderer it challenged the Almighty and cried out, "Am I my rother's keeper?" "Where is thy brother Abel?" alled the voice of Jehovah, and Cain was quick to nswer with his defiant protest. Ever since that ncient day men have gone on in the business of illing their brothers, sometimes by one method, nd sometimes by another, and ever since they have een just as ready to deny their responsibility as as Cain. True, a great many of those at whose oor lies the blame of the untimely death of their ellow beings are sinners through ignorance or eedlessness, and not by intention. All homicide is ot done with the dagger r the club. Suppose, for xample, that there is an pidemic of cholera, yellow ever, diphtheria or typhoid n any locality. Doctors nd nurses rush to the ront, and with the hero-sm peculiar to their pro-ession imperil their lives n the effort to save the ictims of the malady.

Health officials bestir themselves and adopt stringent measures for the public safety. In a large majority of instances, the sources of the disease are traceable primarily to dirt. The infection has occasionally been brought from a distance, oftener it is discovered in neglected cellars, foul back yards and ill-smelling gutters. The water supply has become mpure; milk, the food of babies, of little children and of invalids, has been brought to the city from dairies where cleanliness is unknown, and the city purchasers have helped along the work of destruction by ignoring their own share of responsibility in washing of cans and bottles that are returned to the farm. Unfortunately, in our country, we seldom lock the stable door until the horse has been stolen.

A holocaust of men, women and children must be offered in burnt sacrifice before we see that school-houses, churches and other public buildings are properly protected from the danger of fire. Babies must die in hot weather, and tuberculosis seize upon hard-working women and children before we are in real earnest on the subject of the daily milk supply, and in the matter of cleanliness and fresh air.

Yet we are all bound in one bundle. Children are mysteriously taken ill in homes of luxury and wealth, and their parents bow with broken hearts to the will of God. Our Master said, "It is not the will of your Father in Heaven that one of these little ones should perish," and never was this word of his more profoundly true than when children who ought to live to maturity, are snatched away in infancy. Could the bereaved parents follow the footsteps of the nurse-maid who bathes and dresses their darling they might find that she had been drawn by cords of affection to a home of misery and squalor where she had kindred of her own in dire distress and illness. She fancied that she took precautions or she disdained them in her lack of knowledge. Equally the children of her employer sickened and died.

Not only perfect cleanliness, but the most thorough fumigation and, to some extent, purification by fire, are essential to the public health when contagious diseases are abroad. If your child has scarlet fever, you are not to be aggrieved if the Board of Health compels you to put a conspicuous placard of warning in your window or on your door. You are not to evade in any manner the detention of other children in the house from school, nor are you to break your

A House Boat on a Pennsylvania Canal

ONE of the pleasantest ways of spending a summer is to take one's family and live in a house boat. There are colonies of house boats like the one in the picture, sometimes on canals, sometimes at points on the sea-coast. The furnishings are very simple, the outfit is not costly and the expenses fall within the limits of a moderate income. For another summer the suggestion may be profitable to some of our readers.

rigid quarantine until the physician gives you leave. Civilization enjoins upon us all the duty of looking out for one another, and if we are personally selfish we may indirectly or directly bring wretchedness and anguish to other homes.

The public health in congested parts of large cities is materially improved by clean streets. When the dust rises and we are forced to breathe it, we are at the mercy of germs that are simply floating poisons. The responsibility for clean streets is not entirely to be borne by the individual. Every householder should look after his own garbage pail, but townships and cities should have their own efficient machinery and their capable force of scavengers and street cleaners who will remove debris and do away with encumbering dirt.

Merry Maids and Picture Hats

THE other day an elderly lady was shopping at the notion counter in a great department store in New York. It was rather late in the afternoon and the pretty girl who was selling safety pins and corset laces looked weary, for the day was warm and she had been standing on her feet for hours. The customer felt sorry for her, and was glad that the hour for closing would soon arrive. Presently she saw the girl's wan face brighten, a pink flush rise to her cheeks and a smile hover around the mouth that had been drooping and dejected. What had happened? Presently she saw that a cash-girl coming out of space had suddenly appeared behind the counter, bearing in her hand what was evidently the young saleswoman's new hat. The customer gasped with astonishment. "My dear," she said to the girl, "are you going to wear it?"

"Yes, indeed," was the reply. And the lady paid for her purchases and went thoughtfully on her homeward way. In the slang of the day, that hat was great. In sober reality, it was nearly as large as a sun umbrella, and was so loaded with flowers and so bristled with puffs of ribbon that its wearer would certainly resemble a walking garden when she had it on. As to its cost, at least the wages of a week, if not more, must have gone into the preposterous bit of headgear.

But the girl who proudly carried it home was not a whit more foolish, vain and absurd than are nine-tenths of the lovely girls of 1908 who have adopted the fashion of wearing inconveniently big and astonishingly trimmed hats on the street and in public places. Fortunately, it is not the custom to wear hats indoors. If it were, the young men of the period would leave off calling on the young women, and Strephon would hesitate long before proposing to Phyllis. He could never expect to have money enough to pay her milliner's bill. Seriously, it would seem that maids and matrons alike have lost their heads this summer in the choice of their hats. In places of amusement it has become the rule for women to remove their headgear, but in churches they still reserve the privilege of keeping on their hats, to the great detriment of the devout and the dissipation of a spirit befitting a hallowed spot. No one can bow her head in prayer on the seat in front if she is wearing what is styled a Merry Widow hat. Certainly a half dozen of them must effectually hide the face of the pastor.

We are moved to plead for the return of the sun-bonnet. It is worn this summer by children and by young girls in country places, it is modest, dainty, easily taken off and put on, and, on the whole, is as becoming in its quaint demureness to a face in its early bloom as a hat that resembles a yacht under full sail can possibly be.

"The Battle Is On, God Calleth You"

David

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

A YOUTH not above twenty years of age, of slight but strong form, arrayed in a shepherd's costume, his only weapon a shepherd's sling, and his armament five smooth stones stored away in his shepherd's bag, the "scrip." His stout heart was reinforced by the God of hosts, who had delivered him from the bear and the lion, and would therefore deliver him from "this Philistine."

Young David, coming into the camp of Israel to do an errand for his father, heard the challenge of the giant and accepted it, much to the discomfiture of his three soldier brothers, who looked upon him as only a shepherd boy.

David came out to meet Goliath with the swiftness and lightness of a gazelle. He took one of the small smooth stones from his scrip, placed it in his sling, and threw it. It struck the forehead of Goliath and felled him. David took Goliath's sword and cut off his head.

Goliath

A man of fierce type, one of the Anakim, probably nine feet, eight inches tall, arrayed in an armor of brass, with a coat made of flexible scales of brass, weighing one hundred and forty-seven pounds. His head was protected by a helmet of brass; his legs had on them greaves of brass fastened by leather thongs. Brass here, brass there, brass everywhere. His armament was a spear, "the flame" of which (the blade) weighed about nineteen pounds. And beside this, he had a short javelin to hurl at his foe, and a shield which a man bore ahead of him. He had no reinforcements, but relied wholly on his own great strength. He had been chosen as the champion of the host arrayed against Israel, and for forty days, in thunder tones, had challenged any one in Israel to come out and engage in a duel with him. Goliath spurned David, the stripling, as his assailant, but he was face to face with David, and had to defend himself. Goliath "lost his head" in two ways.

The Flight of the Enemy

David might have worn the king's armor in this encounter. Indeed, the king had insisted that it should be put upon David when he was told that he was going out to fight against Goliath. But David would none of it; the king's armor was no sooner on than it was off, and David was saying: "I can not go with these. I have not proved them."

And after the victory, what? The enemy fled in confusion, the hosts of the tribes of Israel pursued them, and then came back to take possession of their tents and provisions. Young David brought the head of Goliath and his armor and put it in his own tent, as his part of the spoil. And he was called in before the king with the head of Goliath in his hand. The streets of Jerusalem rang with the praises of the youthful David, as the women sang and danced and played upon instruments of music. But David did not in any sense "lose his head." "David behaved himself wisely in all his ways, and the Lord was with him!"

The place where this wonderful duel occurred is fourteen or fifteen miles southwest of Jerusalem, and nine or ten miles from Bethlehem. The modern Wady-es-Sunt is probably the Elah mentioned in this story. But why is this story given in the Bible? Is it profitable for doctrine, for reproof, or for correction? The following incident is one answer: A street preacher had just announced his subject as "David and Goliath," when a prize-fighter came along. He said to himself, "That's something in my line. I guess I'll stop and hear it." He listened attentively to the reading of the Scriptural account, but was rather "disgusted with so much blowing," as he told some one afterwards, but was "glad the little one won." The prize-fighter was so much interested in the sermon which followed that he determined to change the manner of his life and become a preacher himself. And now he is known all over Australia, if not the whole world, as "Bendigo the evangelist." The writer is in the habit of marking with a cross all texts which stones at the Giant Ill-temper," said Annie Kimball, "but the quickest way to get rid of him is just to go and do something kind for somebody; he can not stand such an atmosphere as that. We hear about the air being made pure by a thunder storm. That is God's way of cleaning the air. Loving word and loving deed are just as efficacious in chasing ill-temper out of the heart. Why, the other day I felt a spell of ill-temper coming over me, and I said to myself, 'I will go at once and take a basket of fruit and flowers to poor old Mother Blank, who has been bed-ridden so many years.' I made all possible haste, fearing the Giant Ill-temper would get the better of me. If you could have seen me a little later arranging the flowers by the sick wo-you'll say it was all my own carelessness, I suppose. I was dusting the shelves in the store, and in trying to hurry up matters I sent a lot of fruit jars smashing to the floor. Mr. Barton scolded, and said he would not stand my blundering ways any longer, so packed up and left." His mother looked troubled. "Don't mind, mother, I can get another situation soon, know. But what shall I say if they ask me why I left the last one?" "Tell the truth, James, of course; you would not think of telling anything else?" "No, I only thought I'd keep it to myself if I could. I am afraid it might stand in my way." "It never stands in one's way to do right, James, ever though it may seem to sometimes." He found it harder than he had expected to get a situation. He walked and inquired until he felt almost discouraged, till one day something seemed to be waiting for him. A young looking man in a clean, bright store, newly started, was in want of an assistant. James felt that a boy who had a record for carelessness might not be wanted there, and he felt sorely tempted to conceal the truth. It was a long distance from the place from which he had been dismissed, and the chances were slight of a new employer ever hearing about his discharge. But he thought better of it, and frankly told exactly the circumstances which had led to his seeking the situation. The storekeeper replied: "I have heard that those who know their faults, and are honest enough to own them, are likely to mend them." Just at that moment, James's former employer appeared, and of course James thought it was all up with him. "Oh, ho!" said he, looking at the boy, "Are you hiring this young chap, Fred?" "I haven't yet, sir." "Well, I guess you might try him; if you can only," he added, laughingly, "keep him from spilling all the wet goods and smashing all the dry ones. You will find him reliable in everything else. If you find you don't like him, I'll be willing to give him another trial myself." "If you think so well of him," said the young man, "I think I shall keep him myself." "Oh, mother," said James, "you are right, as you always are. It was telling the truth that got it for me."

The Giant Intemperance is the oldest and strongest of the giants that we have to fight. He was living as far back as the time of Noah, just after the flood. Just now he is being pretty badly wounded, but we can hardly say that any of his wounds are mortal. At least he dies hard. The pledge prayer is the very best weapon to use in fighting him.

A Little Giant

Who has not heard the expression, "A little giant?" And yet giants are never small. A little giant is somebody or something that has great power in comparison with its size. There have lived some men small in stature but great in mind, and they have been called "little giants."

But there is a little thing, only about two inches long, that has a tremendous power for evil; power to ruin the health of young men and boys; power to destroy their minds; power to keep them from getting on in the world. Surely it must be a little giant. It is the cigarette! We are plainly told in the Bible what kind of an equipment we must have to fight giants of evil. We must put on the whole armor of God, including the girdle of truth, the breastplate of righteousness, the shield of faith, the helmet of salvation, and the sword of the Spirit.

Goliath Slain by David are known to have been instrumental in saving a soul. Naturally, the appearance of a cross at the story of David and Goliath would cause surprise and inquiry, and this story is often told to verify it.

Other Giants

Goliath is not the only giant that ever lived in the world. Indeed, he belonged to a race of giants, the Anakim, the sight of whom so frightened the spies who were sent by Moses to view the Promised Land that they brought back an evil report, which caused the Israelites to rebel against going forward. The world seems never to have been without giants.

In 1906 a giant was brought to the United States from Russia for exhibition. His height was nine feet, three inches, about three inches less than Goliath. His weight was said to be four hundred and fifty pounds. Six feet and ten inches is a pretty good height for a man. There was a Congregational minister by the name of Stevens in Minnesota of that height. When he stood in the pulpit his hips were above the pulpit.

But there are other giants which are invisible. These are the deadliest of all foes. They are called: The Giant Ill-temper, the Giant Untruthfulness, the Giant Selfishness, the Giant Intemperance, the Giant Evil-speaking. "There is no use for me to throw man's bedside, and placing the fruit in a tempting pile, and if you could have heard the words of endearment by which I was called, you would have thought me one of the most amiable persons on earth. I am happy to tell you it was not for many days afterward that the Giant Ill-temper dared to make another attack."

An old Greek philosopher has taught us how to fight the Giant Evil-speaking. Some one spoke evil of Plato, and he was asked, "What are you going to do about it?" He replied, "Live in such a way that no one will believe it." This is a wise rule for an outside attack, but what is to be done when it is on the inside, and we ourselves are the guilty ones?

If you are tempted to reveal
A tale some one to you has told
About another, make it pass,
Before you speak, three Gates of Gold.

Three narrow gates—first, "Is it true?"
Then, "Is it needful?" In your mind
Give truthful answer. And the next
Is last and narrowest, "Is it kind?"

And if, to reach your lips at last,
It passes through these gateways three,
Then you may tell the tale, nor fear,
What the result of speech may be.

Here is an account of how a boy bravely fought the Giant Untruthfulness: "Lost your situation? How did it happen, my boy?" "Well, mother,

YOUNG PEOPLE'S SOCIETIES

The Sin of Selfishness*

I MANY respects, Peter was the longest character in the little band of Christ's personal following. But there was a point of weakness in him which Jesus detected and corrected. He was selfish; he had never learned the lesson of living for others. He desired honors for himself alone, and when danger threatened, his own personal safety was his first consideration. The Master showed him the better way. He taught him that love should not be self-centred, but should go out to others; that zeal must be directed toward usefulness and not to building up one's own fortunes; that His true follower must be prepared to make complete sacrifice of all he most cherished, in order that he might reach the highest standard of Christian discipleship.

We can never find true happiness until we begin to eliminate the poison of selfishness from our lives. It is told of a man who had long practised many austerities, without finding any comfort or change of heart, that he was once complaining of his state to a certain bishop. "Alas!" said he, "self-will and self-righteousness follow me everywhere. Only tell me when you think I shall learn to leave self. Will it be by study, or prayer, or good works?" "I think," replied the bishop, "that the place where you will lose self will be that where you will find your Saviour."

A lady was induced to promise that she would read a religious book. Her feelings followed those of the writer generally, until she came to the chapter styled the "self-dedication chapter." She hesitated. Her heart rose in opposition. She could not surrender to God. There was a small portion of her earthly treasures, used as ornaments, which she was unwilling to surrender for that "glittering crown of glory" which Christ promises to all those that love and serve him. She refused to finish the dedication chapter. One day, while complaining to a sister that she could find no peace, her sister replied, "Perhaps there is something you are unwilling to part with—the little thing that you will not give up for the sake of an interest in Christ. Remember, he requires entire consecration—all." She soon left her sister—tired to her closet—resolved to part with all things for an interest in her Redeemer. Peace gradually dawned upon her mind, and her whole life was ennobled and made sweeter by her unselfish devotion.

As a barrier to spiritual growth, selfishness is a fault which mars many a otherwise noble and beautiful nature. It withers loyalty, shrivels friendship and chokes religion; it minimizes every great and worthy enterprise. Selfishness was Christ's method of conquering the world; he gave himself freely for others. Our missionaries, martyrs and reformers, in following his example, have disclosed to us the possibilities of the human heart in spiritual attainment.

Even in our limited sphere, we can strive unselfishly to become a means of blessing to others. "How can you do it?" said a friend to a missionary about to take ship for the mission field in West China. "I couldn't do this for myself, but for Jesus," was the answer. "We, in our homes, in business, and in our social and church relations, may find opportunities to do service, to bear others' burdens, to speak love and encouragement, to judge generously, and to make of ourselves living and shining examples of devotion to Christ and of practical service for the in-bringing of his kingdom.

Our lives, rightly understood, are not our own. We are bought with a price, and as Christ lived and died for us, so we, in our turn, ought to live for others. It is related of Henry Martyn, the famous missionary, that early in his career he began to feel that he must not live to himself. He sacrificed home, friendship, worldly comfort, health, earthly love, and last of all, life itself, that he might tell the heathen of the true God, and of Jesus, who died to save sinners; for, as he said, "he could not endure life if Jesus were not glorified." He literally left all that he might follow Jesus. His spirit was one of the happiest the world has ever known.

The Body as a Temple*

ALL through the Christian religion, like a silver thread, we trace the thought that the body is a temple which it is our duty to keep pure and clean and undefiled, as a fit dwelling for the Holy Spirit. In this view, it becomes a duty to avoid every excess that will defile or weaken the body. Intemperance, gluttony, anger, licentiousness and evil appetite in all its forms, are to be sedulously guarded against. A sound mind in a sound body and a good conscience should be the distinguishing marks of Christ's followers.

In both the Old and New Testaments we find many injunctions laid down for the regulation and preservation of health. From these it is evident that sins against the body are regarded as not merely offenses against the individual but against the general welfare. In normal surroundings, health is a duty we owe to society. In the case of the Christian, it is even more essential that the divinely ordained laws affecting our physical well-being should be faithfully observed. It is indispensable that we be pure in all things if we would have our bodies to become a fit temple for the Holy Ghost. Unclean lives, evil habits, and the indulgence of the sins of the flesh erect a barrier to spiritual progress, which cannot be overcome by any human effort. In order to "glorify God in our body and our spirit, which are God's," our everyday life must be clean, wholesome and regulated in obedience to law.

Samuel Smiles, in his famous book, Self Help, tells how large a part of the success of many very distinguished men was due to their cultivation of good physical habits and observance of the laws of health. By athletic exercise and temperate outdoor living they developed great strength of body and, sympathetically, remarkable activity and energy of brain. Intellectual acquirement, hard to others, was to them pastime. Had they given way to excesses or evil appetite, their careers would have been ingloriously shortened, like thousands of others who have yielded to the lure of indulgence.

Clean, healthy living gave these men the opportunity for the development of the best there was in them, intellectually. So it is an indispensable aid to spiritual development also. "A mower with a good scythe will do more work in one day than he that hath a bad one can do in two," wrote good old Dr. Richard Baxter. "Every workman knoweth the benefit of having his tools in order. They that have tried health and sickness, know what a help it is in every work of God to have a healthy body and cheerful spirits and an alacrity and promptitude to obey the mind."

If we would live so that our earthly careers are to be noble, helpful and useful, an example and inspiration to others, and triumphant at the close, we must live close to God. Modern hygiene tells us that the simplest life is the healthiest. Wealth can not confer health, although its temptations may take it away. Temperate in all things, restraining evil thoughts and desires, loving and considerate toward others, joyous-hearted and confident in God's protecting care, we can go forward, striving day by day with divine help to give ourselves to him as a living sacrifice, "for the temple of God is holy, which temple ye are."

Welcome to Sunbeam Cottage

WELCOME, dear children, welcome! Come and be happy and free,
To the cool and beautiful woodlands, where the children love to be.
Play by the rippling brooks there, gather the flowerets fair,
And listen to the little birds that are singing everywhere.
They are so free and happy, cared for by God on high,
Bright little gems of beauty, that flit across the sky.

Come for a merry frolic over the grassy mound,
Shouting, laughing and running, oh what a joyful sound,
Happy with Mother Nature, whom children all adore,
Breathing the air and sunshine, as never they did before.
Sad little hearts made blithesome, sorrows all chased away,
Bright as the little sunbeams, dancing the live-long day.

Come from the noisy cities, the crowded streets and din,
To the Children's Home so lovely, brightened with love within:
Here you will find surprises, for beauty and pleasures sweet,
Flowers and playthings and music, and loving friends you'll meet.
And, oh, dear children, listen, so happy you all will be,
For Jesus is here and saying, "Let the little ones come to me."

"Happy Jack"

JOHN OLARENSHAW, better known as "Happy Jack," of Cincinnati, is dead. There was hardly a better known character in Cincinnati during the past twenty-five years than Olarens Shaw. He was founder and head of Plum Street Rescue Mission. He was born about seventy-two years ago in England and came to this country in 1856. After a few weeks in Philadelphia he came to Cincinnati. He was converted many years ago at a street meeting, and engaged enthusiastically ever since in the conversion of others by street speaking. He had preached for many years among the prisoners of the workhouse, the county jail, the Newport jail and other penal institutions. He was never known to be downcast, but was bubbling over with optimism. He was the father of ten children, three of whom survive him.

Called Higher

R. P. Sifton, of Giber, Mo., was called to his eternal home on March 25. He was greatly interested in all Christian work, and had been a constant reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD since 1888.

Mrs. J. F. Cantwell entered into rest at Worthington, Ind., at the age of seventy-eight years. She was a Presbyterian by faith and had been a constant reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for the past fifteen years.

Entered into rest Mrs. Hannah Mary Monroe, wife of Dr. Thomas E. Monroe, pastor emeritus of the First Congregational Church of Akron, Ohio. She was of Quaker parentage. She was a worthy co-worker with her husband in his church work.

Mrs. Mary J. Poynter Nichols, of Owen County, Mont., has entered into rest. She was born in Hendricks County, Ind., in 1839. She was the daughter of a Methodist clergyman and through life a faithful Christian. Her husband and six children survive her.

Mrs. Margaret Brachm, wife of the late Samuel W. Brachm, passed to her eternal rest from her home in Concord, N. C., April 11, 1908. She was for sixty years a faithful member of Central M. E. Church, Concord, N. C. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD was a great comfort to her.

Mrs. I. A. Hall of Gilbert, Iowa, was called higher a few weeks ago, in her seventy-first year. At the age of nineteen she gave her heart to Christ. She had been a subscriber and reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for many years, and as she was somewhat of an invalid, it was always gladly welcomed.

The Transformation of Margaret

By MRS. ELEANOR H. PORTER

Author of "Into Still Waters," etc.

A NEW SERIAL WRITTEN FOR "THE CHRISTIAN HERALD"

Synopsis of Preceding Chapters

Little Margaret Kendall, when five years old, was lost in New York and several years elapsed before she was restored to her grief-stricken mother, at Houghtonville. The child had lived among the children of the streets and had acquired their ways. At her mother's home she is surrounded with every luxury, but she wishes that the poor children might share her good fortune. "Bobby" McGinnis, who knew Margaret in New York, now lives near in the same town and becomes a great friend of the little girl. Her widowed mother becomes engaged to Doctor Spencer, who was instrumental in finding Margaret in New York. The little girl is filled with horror, as all the husbands she had heard of beat their wives. She sends to the doctor a contract in which it is stipulated that he will not beat her mother; this the amused doctor signs at once. Margaret insists on a visit from the children of the "Alley," with whom she lived in the slums. At first she wants them to stay always, but consents to have it made a visit. The child, when she sees them, realizes the difference between her old life and the new and is more contented to try and live as her mother wishes. She strives to please, but finds difficulty in curbing her speech and changing her manners. Her mother and herself go back to the city with the Alley children and try to arrange for their welfare. Mrs. Kendall then sends the little girl to a fashionable school in order to give Margaret the companionship of girls of her own age who will make her forget her past experiences, for Margaret was becoming a nervous wreck brooding over the poor people in the "Alley." The doctor and his bride start on their wedding journey; the train is wrecked and both are killed. Several years elapse, Mrs. Merideth and her two brothers, Ned and Frank Spencer, sister and brothers of the doctor who married Mrs. Kendall, are living at their home, Belcourt. Margaret, who has been away at school and traveling, comes to live with them. They find her a beautiful young girl with charming ways. Margaret, riding in an automobile with a Mr. Brandon, sees for the first time the dirty mill village near Belcourt. The mills belong to the Spencers and she learns much of the way in which the firm runs its business. They nearly run over a little girl named Maggie and Miss Kendall's interest is aroused. A young man named McGinnis holds an important position in the mill and is interested in bettering the conditions of the working people.

CHAPTER XX

EARLY in the second week of September the houseful of guests at Belcourt went away, leaving the family once more alone.

"It seems good, doesn't it?—just by ourselves," said Margaret that first morning at breakfast. As she spoke three pair of eyes flashed a message of exultant thankfulness to each other, and three heads nodded an "I told you so!" when Margaret's gaze was turned away. Later Mrs. Merideth put the sentiment into words, as she followed her brothers to the door.

"You see, I was right," she declared. "Margaret only needed living up. She's all right now, and will be contented here with us."

"Sure!" agreed Ned, as he stepped out upon the veranda. Frank paused a moment.

"Has she ever been to you again, Della, with money, or—or anything?" he asked in a low voice.

"No, never," replied Mrs. Merideth. "She asked once if I'd found the child Maggie, to give the money to, and I evaded a direct reply. I told her I had put the money into the hands of the Guild, and that they were in constant touch with all cases of need. I got her interested in talking of something else, and she did not say anything more about it."

"Good! It's the best way. You know her history, and how morbid she got when she was a child. It won't do to run any chances of that happening again; and I fear 'twouldn't take much to bring it back. She was not a little excited when she brought the money in to me that night. We must watch out sharp," he finished as he passed through the door, and hurried down the steps after his brother.

Back in the dining-room Margaret had wandered listlessly to the window. It had been some weeks since she had seen a long day before her with no plans to check off the time into hours and half-hours of expected happenings. She told herself that it was a relief and that she liked it—but her fingers tapped idly upon the window, and her eyes gazed absent-mindedly at a cloud sailing across a deep blue sky.

After a time she turned to the door near by and stepped out upon the veranda. She could hear voices from around the corner, and aimlessly she wandered toward them. But before she had reached the turn the voices had ceased; and a minute later she saw Frank and Ned step into the waiting automobile and whirl rapidly down the driveway.

Mrs. Merideth had disappeared into the house, and Margaret found herself alone. Slowly she walked toward the railing and looked at the town far below. The roofs showed red and brown and gray in the sunlight, and were packed close together save at the outer edges, where they thinned into a straggling fringe of cottages and dilapidated shanties.

Margaret shivered with repulsion. How dreadful it must be to live like that—no air, no sun, no view of the sky and of the cool green valley! And there were so many of them—those poor creatures down there, with their wasted forms and sunken eyes! She shuddered again as she thought of how they had thronged the road on the day of the picnic at Silver Lake—and then she turned and walked with resolute steps to the farther side of the veranda where only the valley and the hills met her eyes.

It had been like this with Margaret every day since that memorable ride home with Mr. Brandon. Always her steps, her eyes, and her thoughts had turned toward the town; and always, with uncompromising determination, they had turned about again by sheer force of will until they looked toward the valley with its impersonal green and silver. Until now there had been gay companions and absorbing pastimes to make this turning easy and effectual; now there was only the long unbroken day of idleness in prospect, and the turning was neither so easy nor so effectual. The huddled roofs and dilapidated shanties of the town looked up at her even from the green of the valley, and the wasted forms and hollow eyes of the mill-workers blurred the sheen of the river.

"I'll go down there," she cried aloud with sudden impulsiveness. "I'll go back through the way we came up; then perhaps I'll be cured." And she hurried away to order the runabout to be brought to the door for her use.

To Margaret it was all very clear. She needed but a sane, daylight ride through those streets down there to drive away forever the morbid fancies that had haunted her so long. She told herself that it was the hour, the atmosphere, the half-light, that had painted the picture of horror for her. Under the clear light of the sun those swarming multitudes would be merely men, women and children, not haunting ghosts of misery. There was the child, Maggie, too. Perhaps she might be found, and it would be delightful, indeed, to see for herself the comforting results of the spending of that roll of money she had put into her guardian's hands some time before.

Of all this Margaret thought, and it was, therefore, with not unpleasant anticipations that she stepped into the runabout a little later, and waved a good-by to Mrs. Merideth, with a cheery "I'm off for a little spin, Aunt Della. I'll be back before luncheon."

Margaret was very sure that she knew the way, and some distance below the house she made the turn that led to what was known as the Town Road. The air was fresh and sweet, and the sun flickered through the trees in dancing little flecks of light that set the girl's pulses to throbbing in sympathy, and caused her to send the car bounding forward as if it, too, had red blood in its veins. Far down the hill the woods thinned rapidly, and a house appeared. Margaret went more slowly. Somewhere was the home of Maggie, and she did not want to go. Trees and more houses appeared, but the trees were left behind. There was only the glaring sunlight streaming up in all their barrenness the little cottages with their doors strewn with tin cans and bits of mud swarming with half-clothed, naked babies. A man somewhere came running a pale, bare-footed urchin, then another, and another, until the road was lined with them. Margaret looked at the bus-wagon with a gasp. "Look at that!" she cried, and then she was taken up and carried across the street with shouts and derisive laughter. Margaret was frightened. She tooted the horn furiously, and tried to force her way through the children, reading aright in her eyes, swarmed about until she was forced to bring the wagon to a stop lest she run over small squirming bodies. With shrieks of delight the children saw their advantage, and lost interest in making the most of it. They leaped on the low step and clung to the sides and front of the car like monkeys. Two larger boys climbed to the back and hung there with swinging feet, their jeering lips close to Miss Kendall's shrinking ears. A third, still more venturesome, had almost reached the vacant seat at Miss Kendall's side, when above the din of hoots and laughter sounded an angry voice and a sharp command.

CHAPTER XXI

It had been young McGinnis' intention to look up the home and the parents of the little mill-girl, Maggie Magoon, at once, and see if anything could not be done to keep her, at least, that frail bit of frailty out of the mills. Some days passed, however, since he had dealt with the child, and not until he had found the time to carry out his plans. He was hurrying with a frown along the lower end of Spect Hill Road when suddenly his ears were assailed by the unmistakable note that somewhere a mob of boys had found an object upon which to vent their wildest mischief. The next moment a turn of the road showed the almost motionless runaway with its living freight of shrieking urchins, and its one white-faced, dead girl.

In a low-breathed "Margaret!" Miss Kendall sprang forward. As all done so quickly that even she herself could not have told what happened. Almost unconsciously she stepped over into the vacant seat and gave her place to the fearless, jawed man who seemingly had snatched her from the ground. An impossible number of long arms reached out to the right and to the left, the squirming urchins dropped to the ground, sprawling on all fours, howling with surprise and chaos. Then came a warning cry and a sharp "honk-honk-honk" from the car. The next moment the car bounded forward on a roadway that opened straight before it. Until he had left the town quite behind him did McGinnis bring the car to a halt in the shade of a great tree by the roadside. Then he turned and his face to the girl at his side. "You're not hurt, I hope, Miss Kendall," he began. "I didn't like to stop to ask. I hope you didn't mind my thrusting so unceremoniously out of my place and run away with," he said, a faint twinkle coming into his eyes. Margaret flushed. Before she spoke at both hands to her head and then she said, "I—I'm not hurt," she said faintly, "but I was frightened. You—you were very good to run away with me," she added, the red deepening in her cheeks. "I'm sure I don't know what I should have done if you hadn't."

The man's face darkened. "The little rascals!" he cried. "They deserve a sound thrashing—every one of them."

"But I'd done nothing—I'd not spoken to them," she protested. "I don't see why they should have molested me."

"Pure mischief, to begin with, probably," returned the man; "then they saw that you were frightened, and that set them wild with delight. All is—I'm glad I was there," he concluded with grim finality.

Margaret turned quickly. "And so am I," she said, "and yet I don't even know whom to thank, though you evidently know me. You seemed to come from the ground, and you handled the car as if it were your own."

With a sudden exclamation the man stepped to the ground; then he turned and faced her, hat in hand.

"And I'm acting now as if it were my own, too," he said almost bitterly. "I beg your pardon, Miss Kendall. I have run it many times for Mr. Spencer; that explains my familiarity with it."

"And you are—" she paused expectantly.

The man hesitated. It was almost on his tongue's end to say, "One of the mill-hands"; then something in the bright face, the pleasant smile, the half-outstretched hand, sent a strange light to his eyes.

"I am—Miss Kendall, I have half a mind to tell who I am."

She threw a quick look into his face and drew back a little; but she said graciously:

"Of course you will tell me who you are."

There was a moment's silence, then slowly he asked:

"Do you remember—Bobby McGinnis?"

"Bobby? Bobby McGinnis?" The blue eyes half closed and seemed to be looking far into the past. Suddenly they opened wide and flashed a glad recognition into his face. "And are you Bobby McGinnis?"

"Yes."

"Why, of course I remember Bobby McGinnis," she cried, with outstretched hand. "It was you that found me when I was a wee bit of a girl in New York, though that I don't remember. But we used to play together there in Houghtonsville, and it was you that got me the contract—" she stopped abruptly and turned her face away. The man saw her lips and chin tremble. "I can't speak of it—even now," she said brokenly, after a moment. Then, gently: "Tell me of yourself. How came you here?"

"I came here at once—from Houghtonsville," McGinnis' voice, too, was not quite steady. She nodded, and he went on without explaining the "at once"—he had thought that she would understand. "I went to work in the mills, and—I have been here ever since. That is all," he said simply.

"But how happened it that you came—here?"

A dull red flushed the man's cheeks. His eyes swerved from her level gaze, then came back suddenly with the old boyish twinkle in their depths.

"I came," he began slowly, "well, to look after your affairs."

"My affairs!"

"Yes. I was fifteen. I deemed somehow that I was the one remaining friend who had your best interests at heart. I couldn't look after you, naturally—in a girl's school—so I did the next best thing. I looked after your inheritance."

NEAREST THE POLE

By Commander Peary—Introduction by Theodore Roosevelt

Copyright Peary Bros.

HERE is the first full account of Commander Peary's famous expedition in 1906 in the S. S. Roosevelt, culminated in planting the American Flag Nearest the Pole; a true story of unrivaled heroism that fascinates and compels breathless interest, and that pictures with vivid and intense realism one of the most daring feats of recent years. Even as this announcement goes to press the author, who again and again has walked fearlessly into the jaws of death for the sake of an unselfish ideal, is speeding on his way to face immeasurable hardships and to grapple with deathless courage the deadly perils of that gaunt, frozen border-land that lies beyond the world of civilized man.

★ ★ ★ ★ ★

Will he realize the dream of centuries? Will he reach the goal and return safely again to "his home-land"? Will the Stars and Stripes in a few months wave triumphantly from the Pole itself and the honor coveted by the Nations belong to this our own dear Country?

★ ★ ★ ★ ★

These are questions that quicken the heartbeats and tingle the patriotic pride in the blood of every true American who reads this wonderful book. Every page counts. Every single incident of this perilous journey, when not even one moment could tell what the next would bring forth, kindles your enthusiasm as you follow the gallant ship fighting her way almost inch by inch, with her engine stubbornly beating "Northward, Northward, Northward," and fires your determination to follow, to the glad or bitter end, her courageous crew and splendid leader, when, putting the last comfort of civilization behind, they start out on foot across the "polar pack."

A FRESH WONDER ON EVERY PAGE

The sublime grandeur in this Land of Ice and Snow—the land of mystic Northern Lights; the land of the Midnight Sun and Long Purple Twilights, foreshadowing the Great Night of the weary winter months—the Great White Disc of the Central Polar Sea, with its mysteries and its terrors, and its still Unconquered Secret—the blood-stirring hunts for wild Musk-oxen or snow-white Reindeer; the glorious brotherhood of these men of different races and climes, who share their all with each other when starvation stares them in the face; the almost human intelligence of the Eskimo dogs—these things hold you under their spell with the strange and awful fascination of it all.

★ ★ ★

Finally, the nameless horror of the "Great Lead" that suddenly opened up before Peary and the few followers who with him had succeeded in planting the Flag Nearest the Pole, and put an inky black river two miles wide between them and all access to food, shelter or home—but no pen on earth could tell these things as they take hold of you in this narrative from the Commander's own hand. The wonder, the superb daring of it all, gets into your own veins and holds you spellbound to the end.

COMMANDER ROBERT E. PEARY

IN COMMANDER PEARY'S OWN WORDS:

"The Roosevelt fought like a gladiator, turning, twisting, straining with all her force, smashing her full weight against the heavy floes whenever we could get room for a rush, and rearing upon them like a steeplechase taking a fence. Ah! the thrill and tension of it, the lust of battle, which crowded days of ordinary life into one!"

★ ★ ★

"... This was the crucial moment. For a minute or two, which seemed an age, the pressure [of the huge berg] was terrific. The Roosevelt's ribs and interior bracing cracked like the discharge of musketry; the deck amidships bulged up several inches, while the main rigging hung slack and the masts shook as in a violent gale. Then with a mighty tremor the ship shook herself free and jumped upward till her propeller showed above water. The big floe snapped against the edge of the 'ice-foot,' leaving the Roosevelt stranded but safe."

in rich sepia, duo-tone ink, 45 of which are Full Pages, add unusual interest and beauty to this magnificent volume, while Frontis in Full Color shows how, in the race for the North Pole, Peary puts the Stars and Stripes in the lead for the first time since Greeley's trip twenty years ago.

2 LARGE MAPS of the Polar Region showing the routes and explorations of Commander Peary, make every incident of the narrative doubly real.

The book is handsomely bound in Green Cloth, stamped with Gold Leaf, and measures when open 15 3/4 x 10 1/2 inches.

431 PAGES; extra quality white rough finish paper; unusually large type

From the Sun of July 8, 1908

President Roosevelt had a chance to see what a real Pole hunter in undress uniform looks like when he boarded Commander Peary's ship, the Roosevelt, this afternoon. When Captain Bartlett, the sailing master, started to apologize, the President cut him short: "I don't give a rap what she looks like. It's what she does that counts." To one stalwart fellow the President made a longer speech, saying: "You've got plenty of pluck, and you have a brave commander. Follow him to the end."

BY SPECIAL ARRANGEMENT WITH THE PUBLISHERS of this magnificent volume, which has never before sold for less than $4.80 we are able to offer readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD this rare work, which weighs 4 Pounds, at the Reduced Price of $2. Questions and Answers

A reader in New Orleans kindly sends the following additional information in regard to the marriage of first cousins:

In your magazine for March 11, 1908, in giving the States where marriages between first cousins is prohibited, you omitted to give this State (Louisiana), which enacted such a law in 1902.

W. N., Belleville, N. Y. 1. What is regarded as the best proof of immortality? 2. What age was Saul when he was made king?

1. The belief in immortality has been characteristic of the race since the beginning. We find it among the ancient Hindus, Jews, Chinese, Egyptians, Persians and other cultivated nations, as well as among the uncivilized peoples. It is an inborn, inherited belief, but until Christ came to bring "life and immortality to light," it was not clearly understood. There have been many writers on the proofs of immortality; one of the ablest being Professor Chase, who dealt with the natural proofs. Butler has also dealt with it in his famous Analogy, and Duncan, in his Evidence of Reason for Immortality. Stanhope, Channing, Chalmers, Newman and other able writers should be consulted. You will find their works in any good theological library or possibly in some of the larger public libraries. 2. It is supposed that Saul was about thirty years old when he began to reign, although there is no positive statement on the matter.

S. J. G., Skowhegan, Me. 1. What was the population of the United States last year? 2. The population of the States of New York and Pennsylvania and the cities of New York and London? 3. How many miles of railroad in the United States?

1. The last census was taken in 1900. The population of the continental United States, including Alaska, was 76,149,386. An estimate has been made that the population of the continental United States may be 95,500,000 this year. 2. New York in 1900 had 7,268,894; Pennsylvania, 6,302,115. New York City had 3,437,202. In 1901, last British census, the population of London was 6,580,616. 3. According to Poor's Manual of Railroads there were in 1907 218,433.46 miles of railroad in the United States, not including second tracks and sidings.

Reader, Warren, Mass. What has been done in regard to the fine of $29,240,000, which was levied on the Standard Oil Company of Indiana by Judge Landis?

The matter was appealed by the attorneys of the oil company and the facts in contention were heard by three judges of the United States Court of Appeals. Judge Grosscup recently delivered the ruling with Judges Baker and Seaman concurring. Under their decision the case must be tried again. The principal finding of the judges was on the score of excessive punishment, also that the real defendant company was not before the court, the stock of the Indiana company being largely owned, it is said, by the Standard Oil Company, of New Jersey. President Roosevelt is reported to be greatly dissatisfied with the reversal of the decision and it is understood that steps will be at once taken for a speedy re-trial.

D. B. S., Waterbury, Conn. Was Captain Dreyfus of the French Army imprisoned on Devil's Island five or ten years? When he was brought back to Paris, was he tried, convicted and pardoned, or acquitted? What are the essential facts?

Captain Dreyfus was sent to Devil's Island in December, 1894. A strong party, convinced of his innocence—the evidence against him was clearly manufactured—worked for a new trial. Zola took up his cause. At last, in September, 1898, the Court of Cassation quashed the sentence and ordered a new trial. Dreyfus was brought back and retried. The "trial was marked by the most contemptible evasions" by those opposing Dreyfus, but nevertheless Dreyfus was sentenced to ten years' imprisonment. He was pardoned in a few days and in 1906 the court annulled the Rennes decision and declared the crime had never existed of which Dreyfus was twice convicted. The persecuted captain was made a major and received other honors.

H. R. C., McGraw, Ky. Do the members of the Red Cross Society wear their badges except on ceremonial occasions?

The recognition button is worn any time desired. Gentlemen often wear it in the lapel of their business suits. We lake front of twenty-four miles and extends from six to eight miles inland, covering an area of one hundred ninety-one square miles.

H. M. R., Nanton, Alberta, Can. When and in what church was the Deaconess work first started? What are their duties?

There were deaconesses in the early church whose business was to visit the sick and minister to the needy. The office was abolished in the Western Church in the fifth century and in the Greek Church about the twelfth century. In 1836 Pastor Fliedner, of the United Evangelical Church at Kaiserswerth, Germany, revived the order. In 1854 a few deaconesses for the Anglican Church were appointed, subject to the parish clergy. The Division Deaconesses' Institution in London was established in 1861. The largest number in this country, for a time at least, was attached to the Episcopal Dio-must evidently have been one of his own kin. Epiphanius says her name was Save; Malalas calls her Azura but these names are simply legendary

C. D. L., Wilkes Barre, Pa. Can you tell us what temperature is found at ten, or twelve, or fifteen miles up into the atmosphere?

It is impossible to tell. Balloonists have reached the height of four miles but could go no farther, as the rarified atmosphere caused the blood to rush from the nose and the cold was intense. Some scientific automatic measuring apparatus might be sent up, but results could be secured in no other way. You may have noticed that all recent experiments with flying machines and balloons, have been made at quite low altitudes and few attempts are now made to reach extreme heights.

Mrs. C. H., Toledo, O. Where in the Bible does it denounce self-murder as a sin?

It is a symptom of some form of insanity, and Paul evidently so regarded it when he rebuked the jailer in Acts 16: 28. See also Job 14: 14, which some commentators have interpreted as referring to the temptation to self-destruction.

New Brunswick Reader. What are the Godwin Sands so often mentioned in sailors' stories?

The Godwin's are long sand-bars east of the coast of Kent, England, where formerly was low coast land belonging to Godwin, Earl of Kent, the father of Harold II. Later the land was given to a monastery at Canterbury, but the Abbot neglected to repair the sea wall and the entire tract was submerged about the year A.D. 1100. The Godwins have proved the graveyard of many ships.

S. M. B., Bath, Pa. What is the distance of the sun from the moon, at the time of the eclipse? also, how far from the earth is the moon at the same time?

At the time of the eclipse, June 28, the moon was 244,300 miles from the earth's surface. It must be remembered that the moon's orbit is elliptical; and at that time she was in the farthest point in her path from us. The distance from the moon to the sun at that time was about 92,757,000 miles. The moon being so far away the focus of her shadow was 8,090 miles from the earth. At that point the eclipse was total.

SAMUEL PHELPS LELAND.

H. W., Montpelier, Ky. 1. What was the name of George Washington's father? 2. How many children did Lady Washington have and who was Nellie Custis? 3. What is the amount of the National debt?

1. Augustine Washington of Bridges Creek, Va. 2. A son and a daughter; the latter was Nellie Custis. 3. On November 1, 1907, the principal of the United States public debt was $2,492,231,518.54.

THE DEVIL'S EXCHANGE

A YOUNG man stood by a gilded sign
That swung o'er a haunt of sin;
And the music bright and the dazzling light
Enticed him to enter in.
He pushed his way to the crowded bar,
And drank with the drinking throng;
He laughed with the rest at the vulgar jest
And joined in the ribald song.

And when he passed through the outer door
With a hot and tainted breath,
He had set his feet in the darksome path
That leads to the shades of death.
He had tasted there in the devil's lair
His first deep, sinful draught;
And a wretched life of pain and strife
Was the price of the cup he quaffed.

So day by day we barter away
Our priceless treasures rare;
And we lightly part in the devil's mart
With gems that a king might wear.

For his worthless dross we place in pawn
The pledge of an honored name,
And we pay the toll of a blood-bought soul
As the price of a deed of shame.

O Lord, we pray for the vision clear
Of a soul that is pure within;
For a heart that clings to the priceless things,
And shrinks from the blight of sin;
For the steady step that seeks the path
That the Saviour hourly trod;
For the purpose true to know and do
The will and the work of God.

And when in the day of days we stand
In the place where the nations meet,
May it be our joy to hear the King
Speak thus from the judgment-seat:
"Thou hast kept unsoiled from the dust of earth
Full many a heavenly gem;
Lo, here they are—each one a star,
To gleam in thy diadem." F. C. WELLMAN.

A reader, Poplar Ridge, N. Y., a member of the Society of Friends, kindly sends the following:

The question was asked in the MAIL-BAG if Quakers ever had any other name. "Friends" is the proper name; "Quaker" was given in derision, and I think it much to be regretted that our members should use it, as some do. It never appears on our church books.

M. M. D., Wauconda, Ill. 1. Who was the first settler of Chicago? 2. Give something of the extent of the city.

1. As far back as 1680 Hennepin mentions the building of a new fort called Checaw-gon, on the River Illinois. In 1779 Baptiste Point de Saible, an educated negro, settled on the north bank of the Chicago River. He sold his cabin to Le Moi, a French trader. In 1803 the United States built Fort Dearborn, and one year later John Kenzie, called the "father of Chicago," came from Niles, Mich., and bought Le Moi's property. 2. Chicago has a

R. T., Rogersville, Mo. How did Cain get his wife?

According to an old Jewish tradition, Adam's family consisted of thirty-three sons and twenty-three daughters. The Scriptural narrative, although it does not enter into details, seems to imply the existence of a considerable population in Cain's time, for he fears lest he should be murdered for the crime he himself committed (See Gen. 4: 14). The family of Adam may have largely increased before the birth of Seth, and the circumstance that none of the other children are noticed by name is explained by some commentators on the ground that their lives furnished nothing worthy of notice. These neighbors must, of course, have been blood relatives of Cain, whose wife

Alaska's Awakening

"IF WE can't get the Alaska-Yukon-Pacific Exposition ready in time by working all day, we'll work all night." So said members of the committee having in charge the preparations for the great "Alaska Fair" to be held in Seattle next year.

"We want this exposition of ours to show the people of the United States the wonderful progress that has been made in Alaska in the last ten years," the committeemen told me, "and we want people to know that Seattle is itself a great city besides being the base for the development of Alaska. The fact that we are to hold an Alaska exposition here in 1909 has stimulated widespread interest in the marvelous development of our vast territory to the north. We can't get tens of thousands of people to go to Alaska to see that remarkable country for themselves; but we think we can induce tens of thousands to come to Seattle and see an exposition that will show the work of the people who have civilized Alaska—the work of the missionary, the miner, the railroad builder and the thousands of pioneers from every State in the Union who have helped to bring Alaska to a point that justifies them in petitioning Congress for better representation at Washington and for at least as much of self-government as is allowed a territory within the United States."

The object of this paper is to give facts relating to the amazing progress made in our Northland within the decade since the discoveries made in that El Dorado called the Klondyke. To-day Alaska has a population of 100,000. Its commerce has grown by leaps and bounds. It increased twenty-four per cent. last year. It is prophesied that before 1925 Alaska will have a population of one million.

The visitor to Alaska to-day confronts no hardships. He finds twelve cities wherein are good hotels and all modern improvements. Those twelve cities, including Juneau, Nome, Fairbanks, Douglas, Chena, Skagway, and Treadwell, have their homes, schools, churches, libraries—the same as any typical Western city within the continental United States. Most of these places are connected by telegraph.

Every one of the cities has its electric lights, its waterworks and telephones, and its up-to-date department stores. In Nome you'll find over five hundred miles of telephones connecting the surrounding mining camps. Nome alone spent last year the sum of $25,000 for the maintenance of public schools.

In Juneau there is a well-conducted hospital for sick and disabled miners. There also are churches of a dozen different denominations. The town supports three newspapers. In its department stores a was a land of perpetual ice and impossible cold. But in the ten years in which Nome alone has produced more than $30,000,000 in gold, people have learned that Alaska is a habitable country in all parts in summer, and in nearly all parts even in winter.

After the missionary, the first pioneer, came the second pioneer, the miner. And close upon the miner's heels came the third pioneer, the railroad builder. To-day there are far more miles of railroad in Alaska than in all our island possessions together. The White Pass and Yukon Road, the most scenic mountain road in the world, has done more in a few years to build up Alaska than was accomplished by dog and reindeer sled transportation in a century.

Various companies are building railroads from the coast to twenty different points in the interior. These new roads reveal to the traveler the most beautiful scenery and a most surprising display of vegetation, including a hundred varieties of flowers. The coming of the railroad has even opened up certain districts to farming, and this is causing the advent of that fourth pioneer, the farmer and ranchman.

A decade ago one lone steamer from Seattle was all Alaska had in the way of sea connection with the United States. To-day four or five steamers a week ply between Seattle and Alaskan ports. They bring up tourists and new settlers by the thousand; they bring up domestic manufactures, machinery and supplies by millions of dollars' worth; they bring down the precious ores from inexhaustible mines to the busy smelters of Puget Sound. Transportation companies declare that for years there has never once been a time, in the carrying season, when they could handle all the freight offered for Alaska.

The future of Alaska lies not only in gold, but also in its fisheries. Even to-day Alaska is the principal source of the salmon supply for the whole world. The annual output of the salmon canneries is valued at more than $10,000,000; and it is predicted that in the next ten years this will grow to $30,000,000. These canneries employ more than 16,000 persons—one-half whites, the remainder natives, Japanese and Chinamen.

One great obstacle to progress in Alaska, a very strange one politically considered, is the form of miner can outfit at a cost only slightly in advance of what he would pay for the same things in Seattle. Juneau's streets, like the streets of all the big towns, are well paved; and there is a regular fire department there.

It was, of course, the discovery of gold that led to the first knowledge of what Alaska really is. Before that the popular impression was that Alaska

The Battle of Life

TEXT—I. Tim. 1:18

"That thou mightest war a good warfare."

IT HAS become a common thing to speak of the battle of life, and this is a tribute to the correctness of that Scripture view of our life which we are now called to consider. It shows that the representation of the text is founded on human experience. Not that "the battle of life" is strictly a Biblical phrase, for Scripture speaks of our life rather as a warfare than as a battle. But the thought is the same—only in the modern phrase the idea is apparently intensified, and the warfare is represented as so continuous and sustained that the whole of our life is spoken of as if it were an unbroken and uninterrupted battle.

The Christian life is not mere romance, but a warfare against all forms of sin. Better the tumult of perpetual conflict than the silent quiescence of universal death. We would rather see a man struggling with the tide of his corruptions than allowing himself quietly to drift down the stream. Any dead fish can swim with the tide. We have more hope of a man who has some difficulty in sinning than for one who sins without any compunction.

The necessity for the struggle lies first of all in the absolutely and immutably holy nature of God—"Be ye holy, for I am holy." Now, this struggle is not equally intense and painful to all. The chief virtue of some persons seems to be in their freedom from vices. To abstain from appears to be their ideal. They are too busy with the avoidance of fault and error to take time to do positive good. No one deserves credit for goodness unless he has strength to be bad. Virtue is an activity, and the person who has no other record than the negative one of avoidance will make a poor showing in the great day of accounts. The vice that is simply omitted, leaving a mere vacancy in the soul's existence, at the best counts only zero. But the virtue that crowds a vice out, and puts itself into the soul as a vital force, counts at least one. There are some whose difficulties seem comparatively light and on whom prosperity waits at every turn, while there are others whose battle is always in defeat and whose emergence from one trial is only the preparation for their gliding into another. What then is the true standard of a man's moral worth? He is to be judged not merely by the evils he refrains from doing, but by the amount of temptation he overcomes. He is not to be judged by his victories alone, but also by his defeats. Many a man passes through life without a spot on his character, who, notwithstanding, never struggled so bravely as he who fell and was disgraced. The latter may have called to his aid more principle, overcome more evil before he yielded, than the former, either from circumstances or his physical constitution, was ever called to do.

Victory is nothing. It depends upon the nature of the conflict and the odds overcome. Greater generalship, cooler bravery and loftier effort may be shown in one defeat than in a hundred victories.

Darkness and Sunshine

Of course, we are all clever at shifting responsibility, and are readily persuaded that we are to be pitied rather than blamed. We are the architects of circumstance, not the victims of it. We may defy it, we may subdue it, we may "breast the blows of circumstance and grapple with our evil star," and yet there is much truth in those well-known lines of Burns:

Who made the heart, 'tis he alone
Decidedly can try us;
He knows each chord, each different tone,
Each spring, each various bias.
And at the balance we are mute,
We never can adjust it;
What's done we partly may compute;
We know not what's resisted.

But life is not all battle with any of us. The darkest life has its moments of sunshine. Were it not so life itself would be an impossibility. No human spirit could stand a steady strain, no human heart could bear a perpetual pressure. There is, after all, much that is happy and joyous in our life, much that furnishes some reward for the past and some incentive for the future, so that while it is perfectly true that the element of warfare runs through every stage of our mortal existence, there are moments of victory, gleams of triumphant enjoyment which keep hope alive in the soul.

Let us look at the manner in which this spiritual warfare is to be carried on. We must put ourselves in alliance with Christ. It is at the Cross that the burden of guilt falls off from the conscience, and we become lightened for the conflict—it is there that we are armed and equipped for the battle—there that we receive the shield of faith, the breastplate of righteousness, the helmet of salvation, the sword of the Spirit and the subtle and omnipotent weapon of prayer.

It must be maintained in a spirit of prayer—for it is this that preserves our reliance on God, and makes us strong in the strength which is in Christ Jesus.

But one can not fight and pray at the same time. No, if by prayer you mean only words of supplication we can not; but if prayer is a mental attitude of devotion with a subconscious reference to God in all things, we can. "They cried unto God in the battle, and he was entreated of them." There was not much time for many words of prayer. But a cry could go up or a thought go up, and as they went up, downward came the strong buckler which God puts between his servants and all evil. That is the sort of prayer that you men in the pressure of business, we students in our studies, you mothers in your homes and you young women in society can send up to heaven, and your souls will be kept in fighting trim and filled with the peace of God.

Our Favorite Sins

We must do it not only prayerfully, but honestly. That is to say, we must direct our attention to the resistance of all evil and to the positive cultivation of all good. There must be no secret and favorite sin. This would be fatal to the whole process. The strength of a fortress is just its strength at its weakest part, and if that be not guarded all other protection will go for nothing. Our danger lies precisely with our favorite sin; that is our most favorable point of attack, and it is there that our forces must be chiefly concentrated. Our bodily constitution may be strong in every respect but one, but if we neglect that one weakness it will kill us in the long run. I once saw a ship swinging with the tide, seeming as if it would follow it, and yet it could not, for far down beneath the water it was anchored. So many a soul sways toward heaven, but can not ascend thither because it is anchored to the world by some secret sin.

In the late Civil War one of the Federal ships had what seemed to be but a small superficial leakage, but it was not thought necessary to countermand the order that she should take part in a coming conflict. At the crisis of the engagement it was found that the sea water had got into the gunpowder magazine and rendered nearly the whole of it useless. On that powder hung victory or defeat. The little leak was neglected and an inferior force won.

Oliver Wendell Holmes, in his wonderful "One-Hoss Shay," sets forth the danger of having anywhere a weak spot:

"Now, in building of chaises, I tell you what,
There is always somewhere a weak spot —
In hub, tire, felloe, in spring or thill,
In panel or cross-bar, or floor or sill,
In screw, bolt, thoroughbrace—lurking still,
Find it somewhere you must and you will.
Above or below, or within or without,
And that's the reason, beyond a doubt,
A chaise breaks down, but doesn't wear out."

And the poet further declares that a chaise will not endure any more in an emergency than its weakest spot is able to stand:

"Fur," said the Deacon, "it's mighty plain That the weakest place must stand the strain."

Find Out Your Weak Spot

And that is as true of a man as it is of a chaise. Would you win life's battle? Find out your weakest point, and always be sure to have that point well defended.

You must renounce all that stands between you and the full reception of truth. It matters not how dear, or old, or profitable this obstruction may be. Here the hottest conflict is often waged; this is often the turning-point of eternity; a victory here is a thorough one; it gives impulse and impetus to one's whole subsequent career; the greatest surrender begins here, others are less difficult.

You must be honest in business. A simple woman went into one of our stores to purchase the familiar legend, "God Bless Our Home," and the her mind, following the thread of the family love shot away over the path whither her husband had gone in the morning to his task down town, and turning to the clerk, she said, "I wonder if you could let me have one with the words, 'God Bless Our Office.'" The young man looked at her for a moment, and, with a ring of sarcasm in his voice said, "Madam, isn't that rather a large order? And that seems to be the thought in the mind of the average man in business. It seems absolutely impossible for him to conceive that anybody should want to put in any office the prayer, 'God Bless Our Office.'"

The guilt of dishonesty or disobedience is no lessened because your name is not on the church book. God expects every man to do his duty. Church membership does not increase your duties, but help you to perform them. When there is a suspense of conscience there ought to be a suspension of action. Give God and conscience the benefit of the doubt.

After a great revival, during which a merchant was converted, a woman in his store asked him: "Is this real English lace?" "It was, madam, previous to the revival, but it isn't now; it is simply imitation." Beethoven, when he had completed one of his grand musical compositions, was accustomed to test it on an old harpsichord, lest a more perfect instrument might flatter it or hide its defects. The old harpsichord on which to test our religious life, our new song, is in our every-day business life. If the righteous shall hold on his way and can stand the test of business his religion is genuine and will make "life, death and the vast forever one grand sweet song."

I remember as a little fellow how I used to laugh at my old grandmother hunting high and low for her spectacles, when she had only shoved them over her forehead. But it is not a thing to be laughed at to see Christians hunting for what they call their opportunities to honor God, while overlooking such opportunities as they carry with them wherever they go—in the marts of commerce, in the sphere of the home, in the social circle and the patriotic discharge of their duty as citizens.

The Stress of the Battle

You must be upright and down square in all the relations of life. You are to color the circumstances of the world, not they you. You must move along the direct, unbending line of duty, through or over, or against all oppositions. Great battles are thus fought in individual persons; great, severe and exhausting conflicts in shops and closets, where the ear of the world hears no din, where the eye of the world sees no smoke, and where the shout of nations celebrates no illustrious victory.

There are heroes of the workshop, of the counter, of the office, on whose courage is put as severe a strain as though they stood upon the battlefield, amid the glitter of cold steel and the rattle of musketry. When a man has to fight with poverty, with losses, with bad debts, with bad habits, with disappointments, with temptations, and still keeps his head to the wind, battles on bravely, refuses to knock under, vows still to trust in God and do the right, though he has no epaulettes on his shoulders, nor medals on his breast, he is as truly a man and a hero as though he had stormed a citadel. Ah, what terrific battles, never dreamed of perhaps by friends and acquaintances, have been fought by men and women in this city, fought in these streets, up those stairs, behind those window blinds. God only knows how stern has been the conflict through which some of you have passed, with weak nerves and aching sides, short breath and broken hearts; but with good courage, plus God, you won!

I may say that those who overcome, who win the battle of life, are not all nominally church members. It is quite possible to be a churchman higher than the highest steeple, and yet not have the affections which cluster around the throne of glory and find their nutriment in the bosom of God. There may be zeal for a sect, there may be none for Christ. It is quite possible to be a bishop and not be a Christian.

The three great enemies with whom the individual Christian has to grapple, are the world, the flesh and the devil; and with each of these foes he has to wage war.

Now what is the difference between sin in a Christian and sin in a worldling? Sin lives in a Christian, the worldling lives in sin. The difference between government. Under the protest of Alaska's thousands of white settlers, the old primitive government provided years ago for the natives is still the only form of government. Congress has given Alaska a delegate, to be sure; but the Alaskans regard the delegate's position as one of ornament rather than usefulness.

That Alaska deserves a better form of government has been admitted by Secretary Taft himself, who said, "They are our kind of people and should have our kind of government." That they are "our kind of people" is shown in the record of one camp alone at Nome, where, out of a total of 500 men, 380 were born in the United States; and eighty of these were college men and forty are members of Greek letter societies. These are typical of those who have thus far been denied proper representation at Washington.

In all the towns are to be found men of the class you find in any Western town—judges, lawyers, merchants, mine owners, mining engineers, fur traders and professional men of all branches of science. These men are just as earnest and as patriotic as citizens found anywhere else. Yet they complain that their rights in respect to self-government are not heeded at Washington.

To President Roosevelt, however, Alaska owes much. For Mr. Roosevelt has always been an active friend of our new Northland, compelling the various departments of the government to work hard to equip Alaska with all government services and to connect it with the great outside world by cables.

All Alaskans take great pride in their public schools, which have been administered with gratifying results, especially in respect to the education of the natives. The Presbyterians, the Catholics, the Moravians, the Methodists, the Baptists, the Episcopalians, the Friends, the Swedish Evangelicals, the Russian Church, and independent missionaries like William Duncan have all conducted schools the good influence of which is very apparent among the natives.

The earning capacity of the Alaska native and his desire to live like the whites are everywhere in evidence. They are quick witted, intelligent, imitative. They are laying aside their savage life, emerging from heathenism and becoming an industrious people, as is shown in the fact that many of them are already in possession of neat little fortunes through ownership of sawmills and lumber plants and fish canneries. These converts, these civilized natives, these property holders, are themselves now asking Congress to decide whether they are to be regarded as citizens or not.

The worst enemy of the native is the whisky peddler. The Alaskans favor a law, therefore, not only for the white man's sake, but also for the good of the native, prohibiting the sale of liquor within a radius of five miles from any railroad or other enterprise employing 100 men or more.

Both the missionaries and the government, in their work of educating the natives in Alaska, are preparing the natives to take up the industries and life of the whites. At all mission stations the native women are taught cooking, housekeeping and dressmaking, while the men are given lessons in carpentering, blacksmithing and shoemaking.

He is a strange mixture of affability and filthiness, this Alaskan native. He will share his last morsel of food with a stranger regardless of color. But unless closely watched, the native convert will leave the mission station only to return to his original condition of life in his filthy hut. One missionary gave a Malumute Indian convert a bath tub and explained its uses. A few days later he asked the convert if he had used the tub. The convert replied "Yes." Yet the missionary noticed that the Indian was no cleaner. Upon further inquiry it was learned that the Indian had taken a bath in the tub, but had failed to take off his waterproof suit.

That was some years ago. To-day many of the converts wear the dress of the whites and everywhere the sure progress of civilization is marked by the sight of the better dwellings occupied by the Esquimaux, the comfortable wooden homes that have supplanted the old huts of skin.

Examples of the amazing progress in Alaska on all the lines cited in this article will be shown next year in Seattle at the Alaska-Yukon-Pacific Exposition.

in in the Christian's heart and sin in the world—sin's heart is just the distinction between poison in the body of a man and poison in the body of a rattlesnake. Poison in a man's body is felt to be an irritating, destructive, disorganizing element, which gives him no rest till he has gotten wholly rid of it; but poison in a rattlesnake is a part of its nature, which helps it to defend itself from its foes and to obtain its prey. So in a worldly man sin is a favorite and a dear lodger; in a Christian man sin is a hated intruder. In the worldly sin overcomes the man, in a Christian the man overcomes the sin, and that through the strength of Jesus Christ, who giveth him the victory.

This conflict will involve your abandoning all companions who have no sympathy with the great and instant things of eternity. We may be mixed up in public, social, municipal, political or domestic circles which we may not and dare not renounce. This lot is given us, not elected by us; so we must make our part and fulfil it. But when we have our choice, be it of companion, of husband or wife, we must make Christian character a vital point, and the absence of it a bar to all nearer and more intimate relationship.

Solemn are the sacrifices required of you, and you must not hesitate to make them. The duty of a soldier is to obey. All the world's pleasures and profits are as dust in the balance when weighed against clear duty. You may have to renounce some profitable trade or traffic which is plainly incompatible with Christian principle. Saul of Tarsus renounced the most brilliant prospects in the world to become Paul the Apostle; the Ephesians burned their books of magic on receiving Christianity. At this turning point there will be a conflict, and in the case of every true Christian, victory.

Is extra time required for some of your avocations, avocations just and useful in themselves? Do not subtract it from the Sabbath or from the hours which belong to your church, and should be devoted to religious duties. When times become hard with you do not begin retrenchment at the Lord's end of your income. Lessen your other expenses, deny your taste its lawful gratifications, not your Christian sympathy the efflux of its tide in expressive philanthropy.

You are called on to enter into conflict with inner selfishness in all its retreats and ramifications. An evil spirit within you will weave a thousand plausible excuses ostensibly in your favor; it will gild the world's doings and pleasures in dazzling splendor—invent new names for old sins. Conflict, resistance, prayer, are the means of expelling this world spirit; an inheritance, incorruptible and undefiled and that fadeth not away, is the reward of victory.

Now, how does the Christian conquer the world? Not by withdrawing from society, as if religion were a harsh and a gloomy thing and shut us out from the ordinary business and enjoyments of life. This is the warfare of superstition and not of Christianity. Christians are soldiers. The chief purpose of the soldier is to hit somebody, not to dress himself in bullet-proof, so that the fire of the enemy will not hurt him. We are to conquer the world, not by a personal and mechanical separation from it, by seeking a footing on a distant shore, or looking for a home in a desert land, but on the contrary, by remaining in the world at the post where God has placed us, and there in God's strength beating back the world, so that the world can not overcome us.

No religion can live that does not insist on doing something. St. Simon could stand on a pillar and look up into the sky for seventeen years, so it is said, but I can not. Neither can any live man. It is useless. If it is necessary for a man to take that position to be saved, what will become of the man who waits on him? St. Simon had to be fed and clothed. Some farmer and weaver must be lost in order that St. Simon might be saved. Somebody must be sinfully secular in order that such silly saints may succeed in holiness. Suppose Simon on his lonesome pillar had heard a child cry? He could not come down nor look down. What kind of a man in a family was he? What good as a citizen in the State? What good anyway? He was not worth saving. The religion that does not insist on action can not live. What becomes of an impulse that is not hitched to something?

Christ did not shut himself up with monks, away from the temptations of the great world. He taught no long-faced, gloomy theology. He taught the gospel of gladness and good cheer. Superstition says: "Put off the evidence that you are Christ's, put down your shield, sheath your sword, run and seek shelter in order that you may not be destroyed by the world." Christianity says: "You are a sentinel; the great Captain of the Faith has placed you there; there you must stand, taking the whole armor of God, and, having done all, stand!" You are to contend with and overcome the smiles of the world, resolved not to be put down by them. You are to be patient in suffering, thankful in prosperity, Christian in all things; so shall your least and loftiest struggles be crowned at last with success.

We should prefer, no doubt, to pass to heaven on flowery beds of ease or in a finely hung chariot; but, blessed be God, he does not allow us to do so. He opens the grassy seat, on which we sit down in indolent repose, to receive the dead dust of the near and dear, or he enters the place which we have called our home and of which we had declared in our folly, "Here we will always be happy," and makes the flowers that are brightest to fade, the sounds that were music to become discord and a voice pierce the inmost depths of our heart, saying to us: "Arise, this is not your rest. There remaineth a rest for the people of God."

We have a battle to fight. To restrain appetites, to purify our affections, to sanctify our natures, to direct the eye of our ambition to a life beyond, to invigorate the intellect, to transform and elevate our hearts, this is the battle. We are here as soldiers; to serve Christ is our mission, to overcome the world is our duty. There may be failures in certain parts of the warfare. It may not be victory at every point and every hour of the battle, but its close will assuredly be so. Rest is certain, but not here; the victory comes only on the sable wings of death; but come it shall, and then, from the scene of all conflict, we shall pass to the realm of the crowned and sceptred warriors of the Lord.

SEASON OF SONG AT OCEAN GROVE

Tali Esen Morgan's Young People's Choir at the Ocean Grove Auditorium

THE history of Ocean Grove is like a beautiful story. It is comparatively but a few years since this "Garden of God" was planted upon the Jersey coast, and it would seem now that, with the development of this summer seaside religious resort, it will soon be the Eden of to-day. One turns from the turmoil and grime of our great cities to find in this peaceful spot a place of rest, recreation, and recuperation, where, in a religious sense, one can sing the long-metre doxology with real enthusiasm and feeling. The religious and clean moral life of Ocean Grove will continue to attract the people. Some one may say, "Oh, it is too crowded; too immense, with its vast congregations, to give the real enjoyment of the seaside." But the distinctive characteristics of Ocean Grove will always find thousands of worshipers. The perception must be hopelessly dull that does not regard with wonder and admiration the marvelous reality and spirituality of Ocean Grove—the freedom, the simplicity, the lack of show and vulgar ostentation.

The founders of Ocean Grove, who have nearly all entered the Eternal City, wrote upon this monument of their Christian work: "Holiness to the Lord." A tender stillness broods over every spot they occupied, and the story of redeeming love floats in the breeze. While some sacred voices are no longer heard, others have taken up the strain, and "Gloria in Excelsis Deo" is ringing in the air. The season opened with a recital on the magnificent new Hope-Jones Unit organ. The formal presentation to the public was made on July 30 by Mark Andrews, one of the foremost organists of this country. The organ was built at Elmira, N. Y., and has already aroused the interest of the entire musical world on account of its immense power and newness of construction. It is totally unlike any other organ ever built, and its beauty of tone must be heard before anyone can form the least conception of its grandeur. It is the largest organ in the world. Mr. Andrews brought out all the characteristics of the organ, and immensely pleased the vast audience that were present. The programme included selections from Bach, Hollis, Massenet, Grieg, St. Saens, and others.

The foundation stop of this grand organ is the disphone, which thus far has been unknown in America. The earliest examples were introduced into the organs of Worcester Cathedral, England, and Edinburgh Town Hall, Scotland, twelve years ago. The organ has four banks of keys. There is great refinement of tone in the hands of a skilful artist, and, while most powerful, the tone can be so modified as to sound like the trill of a bird. The shutters are moved by electric action, and, if desired, the artist can bring the shutters under the control of the fingers, as well as the feet. The action being electro-pneumatic, the temperature of the various divisions of the organ is established by a patented device, so that no change of weather, however sudden and severe, will throw the organ out of tune, and it will sound as well on Christmas day as at midsummer.

Handel's Messiah was ably given July 11. Daily recitals on the great organ are given by different organists. Only July 16, Gottfried H. Federlein, F.A.G.O., played exquisitely the Largo by Handel, "The Holy City," and a Berceuse. The admission fee to these recitals is a nominal one of ten cents. On the evening of July 16, Mme. Ellen Beach Yaw appeared in concert. She is a wonderful soprano, and, it is said, has a higher range of voice than any other vocalist. She charmed everyone by her sweet, simple manner and remarkable range of voice. She is an American and will sing in some of the largest opera houses on the Continent this summer. Signor G. Aldo Randegger, the Italian pianist, astonished everyone by his marvelous execution. Mr. Will C. McFarland, organist of St. Thomas Episcopal Church, New York, is the official organist of the

there were sermons, lectures, concerts, instrumental and vocal. The famous United States Marine Band appeared in the Auditorium by special permission and delighted all with its fine performance. Professor Tali Esen Morgan has made the music of Ocean Grove national.

Rev. Bishop Luther B. Wilson will be in command of this great army of worshipers during August, being chairman of the Educational and Devotional Committee of the Ocean Grove Association. There will be a National Convention of Organists from Monday, August 3, to the 13th. Edwin Lema, the noted English organist, will visit Ocean Grove for the purpose of seeing this great organ, and will give the last organ recital Friday evening, August 14. A Grand Testimonial Concert, given Tali Esen Morgan, will take place on August 15, and will comprise the Temple Choir of Brooklyn, the New York Festival Choir, and the Ocean Grove Festival Choir and Orchestra. That wonderful singer, Mme. Lillian Nordica, and other eminent artists, will sing in the Auditorium on August 18.

Beach meetings will be held at the foot of Ocean Pathway, Sunday evening, in charge of Rev. A. E. Ballard, D.D. The Young People's Meetings have been very well conducted by Rev. D. Mead, of Newark. During July, the attendance being very large. In August, Rev. W. A. Morgan will take charge. Elm Cottage, "The Preachers' Rest," under the care of the Ladies' Aid Society of Ocean Grove, Mrs. Alfred Cookman president, has been refurnished and renovated, through the kindness and generosity of Mrs. A. F. DeHaven of New York. Mrs. Andrew J. Myers is secretary and treasurer, and Mrs. Amelia Rive is matron. The religious atmosphere of the Home is delightful.

Rev. Joseph Smith will hold meetings for holiness ten days before the Camp Meeting, and Miss Lizzie Smith during the meetings. Rev. Dr. A. E. Ballard and Rev. Dr. John Alday are in charge of the holiness meetings in the Tabernacle during the entire season.

One of the most interesting features of the work at Ocean Grove is the Children's Fairy Festival Chorus, under the training of Professor Morgan. It will take place August 25, one thousand children participating.

The Camp Meeting opens August 28, with a Consecration Meeting and Sacrament in the Auditorium August 29, Rev. Mr. Knapp and Rev. Mr. Applegate will preach. Sunday, August 30, Rev. Dr. Goodell, of Calvary Church, New York, preaches at 10:30 o'clock A. M., and at 7:30 o'clock P. M., Commander Maud Ballington Booth will speak in the Auditorium.

Sunday, September 6, will witness the Camp Meeting with a Love Feast at 9 o'clock A. M., in the Auditorium, sermon at 10:30 A. M. by Rev. Bishop Luther B. Wilson. On Monday, September 7, the closing exercises of the Camp Meeting will take place at 10:30 o'clock A. M. in the Auditorium. It being Labor Day, the last concert of the season will be given by the Royal Welsh Ladies' Choir of Cardiff, Wales.

College Day in the Young People's Temple on Saturday, July 18, was a memorable one. It occupied only one service, but in the order it was similar to the Students' Conventions at Northfield and Silver Bay. The Temple was beautifully decorated with banners from all the colleges represented. Rev. Dr. Charles H. Mead presided, and made a few remarks as to the remarkable advance in numbers of Christian students in the colleges made during the last century. He introduced Rev. Dr. Baldwin, missionary to China, who is eighty-eight years of age, and who graduated from Princeton sixty-seven years ago. He, with Dr. Maclay, made a dictionary of the Foo Chow dialects. Dr. Mead then introduced Rev. Dr. I. E. Docking, president of Cookman Institute, Jacksonville, Fla., who told of the wonderful progress the colored students have made in education. Short addresses were given by the graduates of the different colleges.

On July 22 the celebrated contralto, Madame Schumann-Heink, sang in concert, delighting the thousands who attended. In the days that followed,

MIDSUMMER JOYS AT NORTHFIELD

A GENERAL VIEW OF PICTURESQUE NORTHFIELD, FROM THE SEMINARY CAMPUS

NORTHFIELD is a sort of a kaleidoscope in the summer time. The end of June finds East Northfield overrun with college men until there are more delegates at the Student Conference than there are inhabitants of the town. This year saw the biggest crowd since the founding of the Conference by D. L. Moody at Mount Hermon twenty-three years ago. The official registration showed that 983 men attended from 139 institutions, which is probably the largest gathering of college men for religious purposes in the world. When the delegates at the Student Conference have left, the campus of the seminary is covered with girls. Another week sees the place in possession of the Women's Home and Foreign Missionary Societies of America, who share it with the Sunday School workers for their Summer School of Methods. When they, in turn, have departed, the General Conference invites Christian workers of all lands and sects to complete the cosmopolitan Northfield programme in August.

Mr. D. L. Moody was a firm believer in the development of a sound body for an upright soul, and so all the conferences leave the afternoons free for recreation. During the college gathering a baseball series was held, in which twenty-six colleges entered. Harvard won after a very close series by defeating both Yale and Princeton. The tennis tournament was so big that the first rounds were limited to fifteen minutes each. Harris, of Dartmouth, won, with Stevens, of Yale, a runner-up. The celebration of the nation's birthday included the usual track meet, which was held on what was the day before a common field. The hillside nearby was covered with nearly 2,000 spectators, who saw Dartmouth win. In the evening, pandemonium reigned in the Auditorium, which was decorated with flags of every nation and every college, when the different colleges marched in, many with costumes, and gave their songs and cheers. The patriotic address was delivered by Dr. Charles E. Jefferson, of New York.

The young women proved that they were nearly as good athletes as the young men. They had a regular athletic committee, led by Miss Maria Dowd, of Orange, N. J., which planned for some recreation every afternoon. The baseball games between the Twedeldees and the Tweldeldums showed great knowledge of the game and the tennis series gave Northfield as good matches as had been seen in the other tournament. Miss Louise Twitchell, daughter of Dr. Joseph Twitchell, of Hartford, was the winner and she succeeded in giving Mr. Paul D. Moody, themselves to teach other men next year. One evening was given up to a discussion of the Bible study work in the colleges, at which Mr. Clayton S. Cooper, Bible Study Secretary of the Y. M. C. A., stated that last year 50,000 college students studied the Bible in weekly voluntary classes and that he hoped for a fifty per cent. increase next year. He announced that for the first time in the history of the Y. M. C. A. a special Conference was to be held for the consideration of Bible study problems alone. This Conference will be held at Columbus, O., in October and will be attended by delegates from nearly every American college. Specially encouraging reports came from West Point and Annapolis, where the work is just now being started. Robert E. Speer was the speaker that got the strongest hold on both the young men and young women. He spoke at the morning and evening services of the two Sundays during the Conference. Dr. John Douglas Adam, formerly of Brooklyn, now of Orange, N. J., spoke frequently at the Young Women's session and proved so helpful to the delegates that Mr. W. R. Moody asked him to address the August Conference. Dr. John McDowell, of Newark, gave a number of talks and was also interested in the tennis tournament, as he was champion at Princeton and Mount Hermon. The speaker who influenced the young women more than all others was Miss Margaret Slattery, of the Fitchburg Normal School, who conducted a course in Methods of Teaching Sunday Schools and illustrated her suggestions on a class of children whom she taught every other afternoon, for the youngsters at Northfield seem as anxious to go to meetings as the older people. The sunset services on Round Top were devoted to problems of the ministry, mission field, Y. M. C. A. and city missions. The foreign field seemed to call the strongest. Twenty-five men determined to become missionaries during the Conference.

tennis champion of Northfield, a very close match.

But far more important than the sports were the meetings and the Bible classes. A unique feature of the College Conference was the morning Bible classes, when nearly a thousand men would be scattered over the campus in little groups led by upper classmen to study God's Word and prepare

SAUL TRIES TO KILL DAVID

By Mrs. M. BAXTER

IT WAS a bitter thing for King Saul that more honor was paid to David than to him. Nothing makes a man so angry as jealousy. "The saying displeased him" and in his indignation he said, "They have ascribed unto David ten thousands, and to me they have ascribed but thousands; and what can he have more but the kingdom?"

Poor miserable Saul! In God's eyes, the kingdom was already rightly David's, since He had, through Samuel, anointed him king over Israel. Saul, since the Lord was departed from him, had no more the power to see anything in the light of God. He saw things good or bad as they related to him, and not as they related to God. Every self-centred man is open to jealousy, and through jealousy to the keenest form of mental anguish. "Saul eyed David from that day and forward;" not with an eye of love, but with bitter, insatiable hatred. It is not without intent that we find it thus expressed: "And it came to pass on the morrow, that the evil spirit from God came upon Saul, and he prophesied [or raved—R. V.] in the midst of the house." Jealousy, like every other possession of the devil, is a species of insanity. A man possessed with the spirit of jealousy is, so far, a madman, just as the man filled with the spirit of impurity is possessed with an unclean spirit, or one possessed with the spirit of homicide is also a possessed man.

David sought, through music, to appease the enraged king; but Saul had lost his balance: one burning desire possessed him, to put an end to the life of his rival; but God, whom David knew as his Shield, shielded him from the danger of death at this time. Saul might degrade David, as he did, by removing him from his court, and making him a captain over a thousand men; but there was a power in the presence of David, which the people recognized. How often we see this in common life! An ungodly man may speak against one who lives in God's presence; he may try to trip him up, to get him into trouble; but there is, within him, all the time, a secret awe and fear of the one who lives nearer God than he does.

Saul's course from this time forward was one continued contest against God. He lifted his puny hand against God in all his attempts to get rid of David. Like every unconverted man, he had some measure of duplicity in his spirit, and he one day said to David, "Behold my elder daughter Merab; her will I give thee to wife; only be thou valiant for me, and fight the Lord's battles." But in his heart his intent was to compass his murderous designs against David. He did not keep his promise; he gave his daughter to another. But an affection sprang up between his second daughter, Michal, and David; and Saul, who was ready to take any mean advantage, was pleased and said, "I will give him her, that she may be a snare to him, and that the hand of the Philistines may be against him."

But Saul's hopes that David might be slain were grievously disappointed when the victorious captain came and rendered in his account before the king. Saul could not now refuse David, so he gave him Michal his daughter. All this jealous plotting to put David down only ended in his greater exaltation.

At last, the king sought to influence Jonathan against David. He saw that if David came to the throne, Jonathan could not succeed him. But Saul had mistaken his man. Jonathan "delighted much in David," and the two young men were united in the closest bond of fellowship and friendship.

Wealth and Happiness

THE July number of the Century Magazine contains a remarkable article on the life of an eminent philanthropist. Mr. Andrew Carnegie, many times a millionaire and noted for his wise philanthropy, was born in Scotland in 1835. He came of good Scottish stock, the stock that produced Thomas Carlyle, Robert Burns, J. M. Barrie and many another whose work has been a blessing to mankind. When his people came to this country they were very poor, the introduction of machinery having superseded the use of hand-looms. Mr. Carnegie's father had been a prosperous weaver, but when hand-looms went out, he could not support his family in Scotland. The steps by which the boy climbed to fortune were those of industry, application and responsibility. He was a lad to be depended upon. He carried his wages home to his mother. Father and mother together toiled for the good of the family. The testimony of Mr. Carnegie, surely an expert, is worth reading and considering in days when our boys fancy that the attainment of wealth is the one thing needful in American life. At a dinner given in his honor by the surviving members of the United States Military Telegraph Corps of the Civil War, Mr. Carnegie made the following characteristic speech:

"Comrades, I was born in poverty, and would not exchange its sacred memories with the richest millionaire's son who ever breathed. What does he know about mother or father? These are mere names to him. Give me the life of the boy whose mother is nurse, seamstress, washerwoman, cook, teacher, angel, and saint, all in one, and whose father is guide, exemplar, and friend. No servants to come between. These are the boys who are born to the best fortune. Some men think that poverty is a dreadful burden, and that wealth leads to happiness. What do they know about it? They know only one side; they imagine the other. I have lived both, and I know there is very little in wealth that can add to human happiness beyond the small comforts of life. Millionaires who laugh are very rare. My experience is that wealth is apt to take the smiles away."

The Test of Amusements

O. J. T., Hobart, N. Y. I am a young man trying to live a Christian life. All my companions play cards, dance, and go to about all the shows that come to town. I feel I cannot do these things and remain true to the church and my Master; yet in not doing as the others do, I am shut out from about all the social life there is. Shall I then keep out of these worldly things and go alone, or shall I do as the rest are doing, to the detriment of my spiritual life?

OUR young friend who writes the foregoing letter has unwittingly struck upon one of the vital problems which the church has long been vainly endeavoring to solve. Some denominations are needlessly rigid in their attitude towards amusements, while others incline to a tolerance so free that its wisdom may well be doubted. Some churches have gone into the amusement business very largely, as we believe, to their serious spiritual detriment.

With this particular correspondent we can cordially sympathize. He represents many others who, like himself, in a social and religious sense, seem to be in a tight place. He has not yet quite realized that the church can not vie with the world in popular amusements. We would remind him that as long ago as the days of the apostle Paul, other good people found themselves in a similar dilemma. When the irrepressible personal question came up, Paul's advice was that we should so regulate our own conduct that none of us should put a stumbling-block in the way of a brother, which might cause him to fall by following our doubtful example. We must not judge one another rashly as to faults in conduct. If our own hearts condemn any line of conduct, then, says the apostle James, "to him that knoweth to do good and doeth it not, to him it is sin." We are in all things to strive only to do and to follow after that which is acceptable to God and approved of good men.

There are pleasures and recreations that are admittedly harmful, and there are others which are not only unobjectionable but beneficial. It is not necessary that a Christian should become a recluse. One can always choose his pastimes and his company. In the ultimate, the question is largely one for the individual conscience. Concerning dancing and games of chance, there need be no hesitation. Cards are gamblers' tools, and should be avoided if only for the sake of the influence we may have on others who might be led to gambling by our example, though we ourselves might never gamble. Then there is the theatre. Were the stage what it should be, and what it could be—a place of wholesome entertainment, where vice and virtue each received its proper setting, and where great moral lessons could be inculcated, the valid objections which now exist might not apply. But it is undeniable that the modern theatre is in the main a place of vicious allurements. "Problem plays" and vaudeville shows are not meat for a spiritual nature to feed upon with profit. But outside of all these there is a wide range of rational amusements none of which need be placed in the category of forbidden pleasures. Young people naturally require amusement, and to put a ban on all healthful and natural enjoyment indiscriminately, would be the grossest of blunders. If the desire for recreation be not gratified legitimately, it is liable to gratify itself in a manner that may not be quite so commendable.

There is nothing in the Christian philosophy which forbids proper recreation, but he or she "that liveth in pleasure" (is given over to it) "is dead while she lives" (I. Tim. 5:6). The devil likes to keep people busy at his own line of work, and if he can get a good man or woman into his net, he puts them on the treadmill of pleasure and dissipation, and their usefulness in the kingdom of Christ becomes a memory of the past. Let our young friends draw the line conscientiously against those amusements that are evil or have even the appearance of evil and which might do harm. The best test of all, if in doubt regarding any particular amusement, is to ask your own heart whether it is one of which Christ himself would have approved. If the still small voice of conscience condemns it—let it alone.

Our Northern Neighbors

PEOPLE in the United States are taking almost as much interest in Canada's great celebration at Quebec as if the imaginary boundary between the two countries did not exist. This is only natural, as Americans had an active part in many of the stirring events that are being re-enacted in the glittering historical pageants enacted on the Plains of Abraham. Many American officers and men served under Wolfe on the day that gave Canada to the British crown, and the fact is remembered with pride by their descendants. At the present day Americans cross the border by tens of thousands every summer to find health and recreation in Canada's bracing air and picturesque scenery. In fact, no one can boast of being a traveler unless he has made the St. Lawrence trip, seen the beautiful city of Montreal and stood beneath the frowning ramparts of Quebec.

The Canadians have done all possible during the Quebec celebration to show us their cordial good will. The heralds in their proclamations made special reference to the United States, and their future king paid a special visit to our battleship New Hampshire. These courtesies go much farther toward cementing international friendship than we usually realize.

Canada has been making wonderful strides in wealth and power and none have rejoiced more at her prosperity than her southern neighbors. When the Prince of Wales was received at Quebec the greetings of America to the Prince and to Canada were presented by Vice-President Fairbanks. In the course of his speech he said: "The people of the United States rejoice with you in the progress you have made in the manifold ways which make for the strength and honor of a great people. We are not indifferent to your welfare, nor are you indifferent to ours. The blood of a common ancestry is in our veins, we have much in common. . . . We have no rivalries except in the way of peace, we neither covet the other's territory, we covet only each other's neighborly esteem." This represents the feelings of all true Americans and to it they all say heartily, Amen!

Pole-hunting in Peary's Own Word

NOW that we learn from latest dispatches that Peary's gallant ship the Roosevelt is already in Greenland waters speeding on her way beyond the call of civilization, and the interest of the people in Peary and the success of his expedition manifesting itself on every hand, it may not be amiss to speak of the modest bearing of the man himself. In his famous book, Nearest the Pole which may rightly be termed the book of the hour so great is the present demand for it—and which by the way, was fully described and offered to readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD at less than half price in our last issue—the Commander records in a simple, dignified and unassuming style, which we can not but think characteristic of the author, a story of adventure that makes the average "thrilling" novel sound decidedly tame and flat. By the very plainness and direct force of his style, he pictures with graphic reality the immeasurable hardships and unforeseen and deadly perils which he and his little band of explorers had to face month after month in that land that lies between God's country and interstellar space. The sublime courage, the unselfishness and the quiet heroism of these men and the dauntless persistence of their leader who fearlessly risked his life again and again for the sake of his ideal, must command the deep and lasting respect of all who read his great book.

While it is doubtful if the actual finding of the Pole will be of practical benefit to mankind, still, should success attend Peary's ninth expedition, and the honor coveted by nations belong to our own dear country, "there is not an American at home or abroad who would not feel a little better and a little prouder of being an American; and just that added increment of pride and patriotism to millions, would of itself be worth ten times the cost of attaining the Pole." Moreover, the wonderful photographs which the Commander was able to take on his last trip—ninety of which are exquisitely reproduced by halftone engravings in Nearest the Pole—and the new maps of the Polar regions drawn after his observations, are alone of immense value and interest.

Whether the Commander's cherished dream that some day "the Stars and Stripes" will float at both ends of the earth's axis and the whole world turn on them," be realized or not, it is safe to predict that in the not distant future the American flag will proudly wave from a staff planted at one, at least, of the extremities of this whirling globe. "To-night," writes Peary, "the Stars and Stripes stand nearest to the mystery of the North, pointing and beckoning." Yes, there is an unmistakable fascination in this quest of the Roosevelt and her brave crew, and to all of our readers who are interested in the outcome we heartily recommend Nearest the Pole, Peary's own account of his last expedition.

Revolution in Tabriz

MOST of the dispatches we have been receiving lately from Persia seem to be concerning the troubles that are happening now in the city of Tabriz, which are rather an aftermath of what has already happened in Tehran, the capital of Persia. As soon as the parliamentarians of this great western city of the Persian Empire heard of the Shah's sudden and sanguinary coup d'état in Tehran, they foresaw that a similar action would be taken in their own city; so they immediately began to prepare themselves for the contest. The Shah was well aware of the strength of the revolutionists in Tabriz, of which he had been all his life, up to his accession, the Governor-General. So, in order to cope successfully with the armed opposition that he expected there, he put the whole matter in charge of a certain Rahin Khan. This Rahin Khan, now at the head of the imperial soldiery, has been attacking those parts of the city of Tabriz which are principally inhabited by the so-called revolutionists. He was shown no quarter and has received none, and the result is havoc and destruction everywhere, and, above all, loot and rapine with all its Oriental accompaniments of torture and murder. During the late parliamentary movements in Persia, the city of Tabriz has always been one of the principal centres of political activity; in fact, a very hot-bed of revolutionary organizations. The cause for this might be found in two facts. The two principal races which constitute the Persian nation are the original Persians, who occupy mostly the central and eastern portions of the empire, and the Turks (or Torks as they are called in Persia), who occupy the northwestern section of the empire, of which Tabriz is the capital. The Persians are somewhat of a peaceful disposition, while the Turks are more active and violent in character. Now, as the Russian cities of Baku and Tiflis have during the last few years been great centres of revolutionary activity against Russian autocracy, thousands of Turkish Russians, imbued with these new ideas of constitutionalism and socialism, have crossed the River Arax to Tabriz, not only as refugees from Russian persecution, but also for commercial and patriotic purposes. It is through the preaching and teachings of these Russian Turks that the enthusiastic spirit of revolution has been aroused. The Christian element of the city of Tabriz, such as the few foreigners, the Armenians, the Syrians and others, seem so far to have been left unmolested, as far as loot and rapine are concerned, thanks to the intervention and protection of the American and other consuls.

The latest dispatches from Persia indicate that the imperial forces were badly defeated in a battle in the streets of Tabriz and compelled to withdraw to the suburbs for reinforcement, and that the revolutionists have put to the sword large numbers of the royalists in the city, in the same violent manner in which the imperial soldiers murdered the revolutionists as they entered the same.

In the effort of absolute despotism to yield by compulsion larger liberties to the people and of enthusiastic subjects in the first use of their freedom, such conflicts as those in Persia may be looked for. Persia, a nation so old that it possesses prehistoric cities like Koh-I-Kouadja, just discovered, finds itself grappling with the live political issues of the present day. A good providence will lead the nation, after its contests, out into larger freedom and greater happiness.

They smote the city with the edge of the sword. (Judges 1 : 25.)

Bible in the Public Schools

Of all the important things done at the National Educational Convention held in Cleveland, the action upon the use of the Bible in the public schools was the most significant. The use of the Bible in the public schools was earnestly and unhesitatingly commended. This was a wise action. There seems little or no reason for the opposition to the Scriptures in the public schools, and yet the propriety of that use is discussed in many States and cities. The tremendous pressure upon the Board of Education in New York City, to cut out of the programmes and exercises and even singing books all reference to Christ, was as surprising as it was ill-timed and wrong. There seems to be nothing more proper than the use of the Bible in the common schools, as it is the foundation of the best literature, law, government, morals and religion that the world can know.

So they read in the book in the law of God distinctly, and gave the sense, and caused them to understand the reading. (Neh. 8 : 8.)

A Cup of Coffee Brings $3,000

Mrs. B. Lilley, a wealthy woman of New York, was taken suddenly ill at the station of the Old

The City of Tabriz, Persia, Scene of the Present Revolutionary Troubles

Colony Railroad in Boston several years ago. Mrs. Bartlett of Plymouth, Mass., noticing her condition, slipped into a restaurant nearby and purchased a cup of coffee and brought it to the sick woman. The coffee revived her and she was able to continue her journey. She did not forget the woman who had done her the favor, but having secured her name, the following Christmas sent her a box of gifts. The climax in her gratitude was reached the other day when she sent Mrs. Bartlett $3,000 in good paying stocks in a large manufactory and gave her the option of disposing of the shares at their cash value or keeping them for the eight per cent. dividends they will pay. The benefactor had no idea that her benevolence would be rewarded. It grew out of the impulse of an unselfish heart, and yet, if we search we will find underneath all benevolences the great fact that what we give out to others comes back to us in some form or another, usually with compound interest.

Give, and it shall be given unto you; good measure, pressed down, and shaken together, and running over, shall men give into your bosom. (Luke 6 : 38.)

Cleveland's Simple Tomb

Grover Cleveland, in his will bequeathing a large estate to his wife and children, provided that a simple and inexpensive monument should mark his resting-place. The provision was a wise one. It is a rebuke to the silly extravagance which often wastes on costly tombs the money the survivors need for a support. Mr. Cleveland's action is a protest against the vulgar display and earthly vanity that often creep into the city of the dead. There is no proper place among the living for much of the empty vanity and ambitious display to be seen, but amongst the dead they are the sublimest mockeries.

Death is the great leveler of all. The stubble is of the same height after the reaper has passed over the field. The graves in the cemetery are not far from the same size. The pulses are still, the fires of passion are out. There is no place there for pride, envy, ambition, jealousy or malice; these belong to the living. Beautiful cemeteries with tombs and monuments of reasonable value are called for by the best sentiment and civilization, but the gaudy display of extravagance by the "get-rich-quick" class, and the heated competitions of the shallow-hearted in constructing the highest monuments in the cities of the dead, are to be condemned. The coffin and the form it contains at the bottom of the shaft are only dust, and the marble that marks them will in time also turn to dust.

For dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return. (Gen. 3 : 19.)

Shower of White Moths

The white moths that descended upon New York City suddenly, some time ago, looked like the flakes of snow in a storm. They are the elm-span or measure-worm moth. Each of the millions of little white-winged, butterfly creatures represents the chrysalis of a caterpillar. Each female moth will in due time hatch groups of from 150 to 250 eggs, each of which will represent a caterpillar. These caterpillars will have an existence of from five to six weeks and during that time will eat daily ten times their own weight. The caterpillars which the moths will produce will turn again into moths in their cycle of life. It is not likely that the moths will return again for a period of twenty years, but next year the caterpillars will appear in myriad numbers to produce widespread devastation amongst the trees and plants, unless there shall be found some method for their extermination. The first and only other time New York has suffered from this plague of the measure-worm moth was in 1862. The English sparrow was then imported to destroy them and the caterpillars, but the sparrows themselves became such a pest in their war upon song birds and other devastations, that society looked very coldly upon them and has by law, in many places, encouraged their destruction. It is for the sparrow, however, to redeem himself and kill the caterpillars that shall appear next year. They did splendid service in devouring as many of the moths as they could, the other day. A storage warehouse that had recently been painted red and had attracted the moths by its glowing color, was covered with these white creatures and the sparrows stayed around all day picking off the moths and devouring them. In 1862 the damage by the moths was so great that citizens banded themselves together to devise some efficient method of putting an end to the cause. After forty-six years of disappointment, it is to be hoped that the sparrows will give a good account of themselves next year and save our beautiful trees and plants from injury.

He gave also their increase unto the caterpillar. (Ps. 78 : 46.)

A DISTINGUISHED BISHOP DEAD

AFTER an illness extending over many weeks the Right Rev. Henry Codman Potter, D.D., Bishop of the Episcopal Diocese of New York, passed away on July 21, at his summer home Fernleigh, Cooperstown, N. Y. By his death the Protestant Episcopal Church loses one who has had great influence in directing its affairs, an influence extending far beyond the territorial limits of his own diocese. He was a broad churchman with much toleration for the religious and social views of other clergymen, both in and out of his denomination. A brief record of his life shows the many activities in which he had active interest. He was almost as well known abroad as in America.

Bishop Potter was born in the old town of Schenectady, N. Y., on May 25, 1834. His father, Rev. Alonzo Potter, was then serving as vice-president of Union College. His grandfather on his mother's side was President Eliphalet Nott, president of Union College. The family had long been prominent in the Protestant Episcopal Church and the Rev. Alonzo Potter became bishop of Pennsylvania in 1845 and his brother, Rev. Horatio Potter, became bishop of New York in 1861, an office to which the subject of this sketch was to succeed.

Bishop Potter spent his early boyhood in Schenectady, which was a far different place from the busy manufacturing centre it has become in the present day. It was then a sleepy little town with many reminders of its earlier Dutch days, and with the old wooden bridge across the Mohawk making the most striking feature of the landscape. Young Potter went early to the Episcopal Academy in Philadelphia. As a boy he had the idea that he might become a clergyman and he used to hold services back of his father's home to an audience composed of one hired man. Nevertheless he omitted no details of a well-ordered service. He prepared regularly written sermons and sang the hymns himself. For a while, however, the idea of a ministerial career seems to have been put to one side, for he entered a mercantile house and served some time as a clerk.

His health was not good and interfered with his course of study, when he determined to abandon commercial pursuits and study theology. He studied under his father and also Professor Hare, D.D. He made rapid progress, far more than the bishop, his father, realized. When the son stated he would like to go to some theological seminary, the father refused, saying he was not prepared to enter. Thereupon the son asked his father to put him through a rigid examination. The incredulous bishop did so and was greatly surprised at the result. He at once withdrew all objections and the future bishop of New York matriculated at the Theological Seminary of Virginia, graduating in 1857. His father ordained him as deacon in St. Luke's Church in Philadelphia, and he was assigned as curate to the Episcopal Church at Greensboro, in Pennsylvania. While there he married his first wife, Miss Eliza B. Jacob.

St. John's Church in Troy, N. Y., was the first of which he had complete charge as rector. He remained there seven years and is still remembered with kindly feelings by some of the older parishioners. While here a call came to him to accept the presidency of Kenyon College in Ohio, but he felt that his true vocation was the ministry and declined to accept.

The Late Bishop Potter

In 1866 Mr. Potter went to Boston to take up the duties of assistant rector of Trinity Church, the largest, most wealthy, and most influential Episcopal Church in that city. Shortly after he was elected secretary of the House of Bishops. The honor was entirely unsought and came at the suggestion of Bishop John Williams of the diocese of Connecticut. After two years of most active work in the Boston parish he came to New York City as rector of Grace Church on Broadway. Here he made an earnest effort to broaden the work of the church and have it reach the great mass of the unchurched whose shadows seldom fell across the thresholds of any house of worship. If the people would not come to the church he would take the church to the people. He established home mission societies and chapels were started here and then in the crowded districts of the city. Fresh-air funds were created and children and invalids were given outings in the country. These outings were still kept up and have been minutely copied not only in other Episcopal churches, but among other denominations as well. He believed strongly in looking out for the physical as well as spiritual welfare of the poor, and believed that if proper places of meeting and amusement were provided it would abandon those of questionable influence and be led to better ways of living. The church house was the centre of this philanthropic activity and clubs for the men and classes for women were started. A large number of helpers took care of children in day nurseries and visited the sick and needy. The men and women of wealth and culture in his church became active unpaid helpers.

In 1887 Dr. Potter became Bishop of New York, having already served as coadjutor to his uncle in that office. Under Bishop Potter the diocese gained greatly in resources and influence. Probably his most enduring monument will be the Cathedral of St. John the Divine now building in upper New York, which will probably take fifty years to complete. In it are chapels where the natives of several foreign countries may hold services in their own tongue. It was the Bishop's desire that everything in the Cathedral should be free, no rented pews and a continual passing the plate, so, as the Cathedral has been built, the endowment has grown with it to carry out the founder's ideal. Bishop Potter was succeeded in office by Coadjutor Bishop Greer, who had assisted him for several years in the more active duties of the episcopal office.

AMONG THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S SOCIETIES

Lessons From the Sea*

IN A RECENT magazine article, the writer tells with realistic power the tragic story of those victims of the sea—the ships that never come back.

The celebrated poet Tasso and his friend Manso, with Manso's brother-in-law, were one day in a summer-house which commanded a full prospect of the sea, agitated at the time by a furious storm. Manso said he was astonished at the rashness and folly of men who would expose themselves to the rage of so merciless an element, where such numbers had suffered shipwreck. "Yet," said Tasso, "we every night go without fear to bed, where so many die every hour. Death will find us in all parts."

In describing the providences of God, the Psalmist has shown us how they reach out and bless all who trust in him, by land or sea. The mariner on the stormy deep is as surely under divine protection as the people on land, and his cry for help does not pass unheeded. If there is anything calculated to strike terror to the godless and to drive them to pray for mercy, it is a storm at sea.

It is related that when the steamship London was foundering in the Atlantic in 1866, Captain Martin, seeing all means used to keep her afloat proving unavailable, said to his passengers and crew: "Boys, you may say your prayers!" Many brought their Bibles and read them eagerly. Others knelt in fervent supplication. Rev. Mr. Draper, a minister who was among the passengers, prayed with them and for them incessantly, that they might be converted even in the face of what seemed certain death. It was a solemn moment when Captain Martin, in broken tones, announced that the vessel was doomed—there was no hope. Minister Draper, as if suddenly inspired, stood up in the sorrowing circle and cried aloud: "The captain of this ship says there's no hope. But the Captain of our salvation says there is hope for all that will flee to him."

There is now a well-established Christian work among sailors in many ports throughout the globe. The influence of such a work is far-reaching. A dissolute mate got a tract from his captain, who had received two of them in church. The mate's tract was entitled, "Whither Bound?" He read it and the question reached his heart. He solemnly promised the Lord that, if he could be restored to his family, he would steer a different course. Still the question rang in his ears, day and night. He began to read his Bible and to pray; after a time he found the blessing of inward peace and was restored to his family.

Rev. John Favel, a pious English preacher, and a few associates were pioneer workers among seamen over 200 years ago and founded the first Bible Society for their benefit. Long after Flavel's time, in 1814, Zebulon Rogers, a Methodist shoemaker, held prayer-meetings for sailors in London and gospel meetings on a brig in the harbor. The first floating Bethel, the Zephyr, was in use on the Thames in 1818. In the United States the first seamen's mission was founded in Boston in 1812. The Marine Bible Society of New York was organized in 1817, the New York Port Society in 1818 (which built the first mariners' church in America). The American Seamen's Friend Society was organized in 1828. There are now over 70 Bethels, nearly 40 Marine Bible Societies and many floating churches and chapels for seamen, besides a number of denominational and independent organizations working among the same class on missionary lines.

Religion as a Foundation*

WHEN Nehemiah, imbued with the spirit of the reformer, began his work in Jerusalem, he had a twofold purpose in view. Not only must the walls of the ancient capital be rebuilt, but the whole nation must be strengthened, purified and regenerated by the laying of new moral foundations, through the study of God's Word. A great religious revival was needed. Moral rehabilitation was of more importance even than the restoration of the walls. Unless the people had the love of God in their hearts and were obedient to his laws, there could be no real national progress.

Another illustration of a great national revival is that recorded in II. Chronicles 17: 7-9, where we see the spectacle of the whole population of Judah being taught the Word by a corps of Levites, specially trained for the purpose. These spiritual leaders of that early day were probably the first who ever conducted a Bible Study movement on a considerable scale. We are told, in the same chapter, that their labors produced wonderful results and won the respect of surrounding nations.

In the far-reaching work of social redemption, each of us can find some opportunity for service. It may be that we live in a neighborhood where bad influences have been at work, which a few earnest Christian men or women may be instrumental in completely changing. Some years ago, a certain neighborhood was notorious for its lawlessness and the general low grade of its morals, but gradually there came a change in the community and it grew better. It finally became as noted for its high moral tone as it had formerly been notorious for the contrary. There was an investigation, and it was found that a minister, physician, and school teacher had begun to work about the same time. All three were devoted Christians, and gradually with God's blessing, by positive work and influence, the town was redeemed.

In all efforts at social regeneration the most potential weapon is the Gospel. "There is yet another sword to be delivered to me," said a pious English king at his coronation, "the sacred Bible, the sword of the Spirit, without which we are nothing and can do nothing." And throughout his reign his special care was to spread the Bible among his people.

Nine years ago a concerted effort was made by the leading forces of infidelity to discredit the Gospel of Jesus Christ throughout this land. Agnostics, freethinkers, atheists, sceptics and infidels joined common cause against the Bible. For the purpose of setting this remarkable charge at rest THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, in the name of Christian America, sent a uniform letter to the President, cabinet, supreme court, both houses of Congress, naval and army commanders, governors of all the States and leading thinkers, authors, and professional men throughout the nation. That letter put to each the great heart-searching question: "What think ye of Christ?" It also asked how they valued Christianity as an influence in national and world-wide civilization. The response was immediate and overwhelming! From President McKinley down to the last of the long list of distinguished Americans, the answer came clearly and unequivocally, which completely refuted the infidel slander, and forever settled the controversy, showing ours to be a Christian nation.

Let us see to it that we do our part, each of us individually, to make it a Christian nation in the truest sense of the word, by our influence and example, and by the spiritual and social regenerative work we may be able to do.

NATIONAL PROHIBITION CANDIDATES

THIRD of the great political parties, the Prohibitionists, at their National Convention held in Columbus, O., July 15-16, have placed in the field as their candidates for President and Vice-President, Eugene Wilder Chafin of Illinois and Aaron Sherman Watkins of Ohio. As our readers have an interest in these candidates, we give a brief biographical sketch of each below, the facts being taken from a more extended article in the Ohio State Journal:

Hon. Eugene Wilder Chafin

Mr. Chafin comes from the farm, and is a lawyer with a record of success behind him. For seven years he has been a resident of Chicago and was the candidate of his party for governor of Illinois. Before going to Chicago, he lived at Waukesha, Wis., and he was no less popular in his party in that State, for there he also was honored with the gubernatorial nomination. That he met defeat did not discourage him a whit in his belief in the final triumph of the Prohibitionists. He was born on a farm near East Troy, Wis., November 1, 1852, grew to young manhood there and, by money he earned and saved through work on a neighbor's farm, paid his way through the University of Wisconsin. Then he went to Waukesha, where he practised twenty-five years and rose to prominence in his profession. He has been quite active as a lawyer in Chicago also. Last winter, when the United Societies of Chicago, comprising the saloonkeepers and liquor interests, got up petitions signed by 175,000 people, urging the election commissioners to submit to a vote the question whether the State law on Sunday closing should be repealed, which question in reality was whether it should be enforced, the Prohibition party immediately attacked the proposal, saying that the enforcement of a law was not a question to be submitted to vote. It won its contention, with Mr. Chafin as its leading attorney.

Mr. Chafin was nominated for attorney-general and Congress both in Wisconsin and Illinois. In both States he was active in the temperance movement. Although a Prohibitionist only since 1881, when he left the Republican party, he always has been a total abstainer. For years he has been a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

Mr. Chafin is a writer quite well known. He is considered an authority on Lincoln. Twelve years ago he published a book entitled Lives of the Presidents. He is married and has a daughter fifteen years of age. The family lives at 326 Eastwood Avenue, Chicago.

Aaron Sherman Watkins, the vice-presidential candidate, is of Quaker ancestry and, like his running mate, is a product of the farm. He was born in Logan County, Ohio, November 29, 1863. He was educated in the common schools and at the Ohio Northern University at Ada, and Taylor University, Upland, Ind. He is now vice-president of the Ohio Northern University and professor of literature and philosophy, which positions he has held for three years. Prior to going to Ohio Northern University, he was pastor of Methodist Churches for twelve years. He studied law with his brother, Judge Watkins, at Huntington, Ind., and passed the bar examination in that State. Four years ago he was a candidate for Congress in the Ninth Ohio District and polled 1,100 votes, the largest ever counted for a Prohibition candidate in that district. In 1905 he was the Prohibition party's candidate for governor, against Herrick, the Republican candidate, and Pattison, the Democratic nominee. He again was nominated for that office at the State convention of the Prohibition party in Columbus recently.

They stand upon a platform which demands the "submission by Congress to the several States of an amendment to the federal constitution, prohibiting the manufacture, sale, importation, exportation or transportation of alcoholic liquors for beverage purposes, and the immediate prohibition of the liquor traffic for beverage purposes in the District of Columbia, in the territories and all places over which the national government has jurisdiction, the repeal of the internal revenue tax on alcoholic liquors and the prohibition of the interstate traffic therein."

A FOREIGN MISSION WORK AT HOME

A MARKED change of attitude on the part of the Italian communities has characterized the opening of the Gospel tents by the Evangelistic Committee of New York City in certain sections this season.

Of the three centres of Italian work, doubtless the most antagonistic has been in Harlem's "Little Italy." Here, at One Hundred and Sixth Street near First Avenue, right in the heart of the priest-ridden community, a tent has been erected for the past three or four summers.

Repeated disturbances of more or less violent nature attended the opening of the tent in previous years. Buckets of water, volleys of stones and brick-bats, vehement curses and whispered warnings, formerly greeted the workers. Even the Black Hand has threatened. This year, however, no such demonstrations have been made. Last year, when several companies of boys and girls were sent into the country through the kind offices of the Committee, co-operating with the local missions, the favor was regarded with suspicion by the parents. This year, the mothers are eagerly asking that their children should go. The spirit of distrust heretofore generally manifested seems to have given way to confidence and respect.

Three times the previous number of children gather in the tent nightly for religious instruction. Good behavior and earnest attention distinguish the meetings. On several occasions when the stereopticon has been used, adults and children have crowded into the tent together. The experiment of combining the audiences has been successfully tried by explaining the pictures, first in Italian to the adults, and then in English to the children.

The Italians are peculiarly susceptible to personal sympathy and attention. Even the roughest element is amenable to gentle persuasion. On a recent occasion, Mrs. John H. Evans, a prominent church woman of Pittsburg, Pa., returning by way of New York City from the biennial Convention of Women's Clubs in Boston, became interested in the work of the Evangelistic Committee, especially among the Italians. After one or two visits to the tent, she sent three huge baskets of flowers for distribution among the boys and girls. Great was the excitement! Some of the leaders of "the gang" were requested to keep order and assist in giving out the flowers; they rose to the responsibility quietly but effectively.

This policy is generally followed with satisfactory results, the older boys and girls being invited to co-operate in caring for the younger children.

AMONG THE WORKERS

—OBERLIN COLLEGE has just celebrated its seventy-fifth anniversary, and has just dedicated a handsome new chapel to the memory of Charles G. Finney, who was once Oberlin's president.

—REPORTS on the past season's work, received from the twenty-five branches of the Y. M. C. A. on the Pennsylvania Railroad, show a paid membership of something over 10,000, the largest branch being at Philadelphia, with 1,926 members. The total attendance for the season was 682,723. The attendance at all educational meetings was 15,543; the total attendance for the religious meetings held at the Pennsylvania Railroad branches was 72,238.

—EVANGELIST W. R. NEWALL, who during the past two years has been the means of bringing many to Christ, is conducting meetings in East St. Louis, Ill. No revival work has ever before been attempted there. The tent has a seating capacity of over 5,000. All the meetings are largely attended. One hundred preparatory cottage prayer-meetings were held before the evangelist arrived. All the churches are co-operating and the work is being richly blessed.

—THE REV. STEPHEN MERRITT, the veteran preacher, whose long career of soul-winning and benevolence is known to many readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and throughout the country generally, has been appointed chaplain of our Children's Home at Mont-Lawn. He conducted his first official service on Sunday, July 19, and was accorded a hearty welcome by the children and a good-sized audience of adults in the beautiful Children's Temple, which was crowded to the doors.

—REV. HIRAM BINGHAM, for over thirty years a missionary to the Gilbert Islands, in the South Pacific, has returned to this country. He was the first man to reduce the language of these islands to writing, and he translated the New Testament and many hymns into the language. He is seventy-seven years old and in poor health.

ENVY IN THE HEART OF A KING

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

THE man with the javelin was King Saul. The man with the harp was young David. The man with the javelin was disappointed and revengeful because he had been rejected of the Lord as king. The man with the harp was filled with hope because he had been anointed to be king. The man with the javelin had bitterness in his soul, which at times eclipsed his reason. The man with the harp had the peace of God in his heart, which caused him to sing, "The Lord is my shepherd, I shall not want." The man with the javelin had an angry and wicked look. The man with the harp had the beauty of godliness upon his face. The man with the javelin needed solace. The man with the harp had tenderness and loving sympathy to express. Of the man with the javelin, Browning says:

He stood as erect as that tent prop, both arms stretched out wide
On the great cross-support in the centre, that goes to each side;
He relaxed not a muscle, but hung there as, caught in his pangs
And waiting his change, the king serpent all heavily hangs,
Far away from his kind, in the pine till deliverance come
With the spring-time—so agonized Saul, drear and stark, blind and dumb.

Then the man with the harp says:

See the king—I would help him, but cannot; the wishes fall through,
Could I wrestle to raise him from sorrow, grow poor to enrich,
To fill up his life, starve my own out, I would—knowing which,
I know that my service is perfect. Oh, speak through me now!
Would I suffer for him that I love? So wouldst thou—so wilt thou!
So shall crown thee the topmost, ineffablest, uttermost crown—
And thy love fill infinitude wholly, nor leave up nor down
One spot for the creature to stand in! It is by no breath, Turn of eye, wave of hand, that salvation joins issue with death.

Of the man with the javelin, the women sang praises: "Saul hath slain his thousands." Of the man with the sword and the harp, the women sang, "David hath slain his ten thousands." The women played upon instruments as they sang in antiphony, back and forth, and danced in the streets. Women had so danced and sung before when the Israelites had crossed the Red Sea through the dry path and the host of Egypt had been drowned in its depths. Moses had then led the Israelites in a song of praise, and Miriam led the women forth in dance and song. When Jephthah returned from slaying the enemies of Israel, his daughter came out to meet him with timbrels and with dances, but, sad to relate, she was sacrificed by her father, to fulfil a vow that he had made unto the Lord that, if he would deliver the Ammonites into his hands, whatsoever should come forth out of the doors of his house to meet him when he should return in peace, he would offer it up for a burnt offering (Judges 11:30-40). In some parts of the world women today go out to meet returning victorious warriors, playing upon instruments and dancing.

Comparisons have ever been odious. It was thus that Saul's soul was set on fire with the spirit of envy. He could not bear to have it said that David was greater in war than himself. "An evil spirit from God came upon him." God permitted the evil spirit to visit Saul, but did not send him. Saul opened his heart to the evil spirit, instead of saying to Satan, "Depart from me," as Christ afterwards did.

David Attacked by Saul

The man with the harp was summoned to the palace of the king that he might heal malady with melody. The man with the javelin, the king, was not soothed but irritated. A murderous impulse seized him. Once and again he threw his javelin at David, muttering, "I will smite David even to the wall with it." But David eluded the stroke. The Lord proved to him "a sun and shield," and he came out unharmed. Hear his words in a quotation from Browning's Saul:

I know not too well how I found my way home in the night.
There were witnesses, cohorts about me, to left and to right, Angels, powers, the unuttered, unseen, the alive, the aware!
I repressed, I got through them as hardly, as struggling there.
As a runner beset by the populace famished for news—
Life or death. The whole earth was awakened, hell loosed with her crews;
And the stars of night beat with emotion, and tingled and shot
Out in fire the strong pain of pent knowledge, but I fainted not.
For the Hand still impelled me at once and supported, suppressed
All the tumult, and quenched it with quiet, and holy behest.
Till the rapture was shut in itself, and the earth sank to rest.

But the man with the harp never again played before the man with the javelin. He was promoted with military duty in the hope that he might meet death.

Twin Truths to Learn from This Lesson

(1) The danger of harboring envy in our own hearts, and (2) how to the march patiently, was accosted by one of the soldiers, saying, "It is all very well for you to talk of patience—you who are mounted on a fine horse; but for us poor wretches it is a different matter." The general dismounted, and said to the muttering soldier: "Here, take my place awhile." Hardly had the latter mounted, when a shot struck him, and he fell badly wounded. When the wounded man was being carried off, the general said to the bearers: "You see, my men, that the most elevated place is not the least dangerous." If David had slain his ten thousands, while Saul had slain his thousands, David had been in the most dangerous place, and it was a good reason why Saul had no right to be jealous of him. If instead of envying him Saul had acknowledged and rejoiced in David's greater successes, he would have been held in everlasting honor by all Bible students.

Envy is to be asphyxiated in an atmosphere of prayer. Envy can not thrive in the heart of one who is willing to acknowledge good in others. Rejoice in the successes of those with whom you are associated. Earnestly desire the good opinion of others. Become interested in helping on the envy? How can we extricate ourselves from the toils of such a monstrous feeling?

General Gordon, one of the noblest men that ever lived, told how to keep out of such a condition. He said: "You want to be loved, trusted and respected? Then ignore the likes and dislikes of men in regard to your actions, leave their love for God's, taking him only. You will find that as you do so, men will like you. But try please men, and ignore God, and you will fail utterly." Shakespeare has said, "Be thou as chaste as ice, as pure as snow, thou shalt not escape calumny." Mutius, a citizen of Rome, was so envious that when Publius saw him looking very sad he said, "Either some great evil has happened to Mutius or some great good to another. It was for the benefit of such people that Paul, in his sublime picture of triumphant charity, noted as one of her virtues, 'Charity rejoiceth not in iniquity, but rejoiceth in the truth.' Dionysius, Plutarch tells us, was so envious that he punished Philoxenus because he was a better singer, an Plato because he was a wiser philosopher. Of the same stripe was the Athenian who voted to banish Aristides, because he was 'tired of hearing him called 'the Just.' Cambyse killed his brother because he could bend a stronger bow for battle.

Other Cases of Envy

But modern cases of envy are quite as mean. There are people to-day who allow themselves first to envy and then to hate others because they can sing better, or dress better, or make more money, or win more approbation or higher office, or run a bigger automobile. Even children let envy get into their hearts because classmates have finer clothes, or take higher honors, or win greater feats or greater popularity.

As on a railway the backing of a train on the next track makes our own train seem to go forward, so some seem to think they are advancing themselves by lowering the reputation of rivals. These envious people are not even standing still but are pushing themselves back while attempting to push others backward. Let us rather let in the love for all mankind that drives out envy as light drives out darkness.

When David was forced by the incident of the javelin to acknowledge to himself that Saul had a deep-seated envy against him, he did not try to break it down by being as mean as Saul himself; but he just went on doing his duty faithfully and did it so well that all Israel and Judah loved him. Of course it is harder to be good and do right when under suspicion, but a brave soul can do it, and be all the stronger for the adverse circumstances.

Answered Prayers

Mrs. C. L. S., Chicago. "I wish to say that God does hear and answer prayer. He has answered mine. Trust and believe!"

S. M. S., New York. "I want to publicly thank God for restoration to health in answer to prayer."

Mrs. H. W., Pennsylvania. "I wish to publicly acknowledge that God answered a special prayer when we were in trouble."

J. T., California. "I wish to add my testimony for answered prayers. God has granted my requests many times."

E. D., Pennsylvania. "I promised the Lord that if my prayers were answered I would acknowledge it to the world."

M. A., Tennessee. "God has answered many prayers of mine, and I feel I can go to him with all my trouble, as a child to a father."

Reader, Illinois. "God has answered my prayers many times. Recently I underwent a serious operation with but little suffering, for he heard me and was with me."

C. B. S., Indiana. "I write from a promise I made to the dear Lord. I promised him if he would heal me of a long standing affliction, that I would tell it to the world through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD."

Reader, Ohio. "I wish to acknowledge gratefully an answer to prayer, recently, in the restoration of my sister's health, who has been ill for nearly one year. I have always been deeply interested in the 'Answered Prayer' column, and have had prayers answered without number."

King Saul Threw His Javelin at David

carry ourselves when we find we are the objects of envy and jealousy. Envy is almost as old as the human race. Cain, the first born of Adam, was jealous of his brother. It has been said: "The whole world, though otherwise empty of men, could not contain two brothers when one was envied." And so it was that Cain killed his brother. And ever since then envy has been rife even among brothers. Saul was not the only envious king. Caligula, the Roman emperor, killed his brother because he was more beautiful, and was so envious of the most distinguished of his subjects that he deprived them of their badges of honor.

Saul was not the first, nor the last, military man to be infected with the microbe of envy. It is related that a French officer, General Cherin, when urging his men to bear the fatigue of altruistic and humanitarian work being done in the world—anything to keep self under.

An aged minister, whose popularity was declining, was walking to church one Sabbath morning in company with a young and popular minister. "Brother, you will have a crowded church today," said the elder minister. The younger replied, "They are greatly to blame who leave you and come to me." "Not so, dear brother; for a minister can receive no such honor and success in his ministry except it be given him from heaven. I rejoice that Christ is preached, and that his kingdom and interests are gaining ground, though my estimation in people's hearts should decrease; for I am content to be anything so that Christ may be all in all."

But what course shall one pursue when he finds himself the object of

A COURSE IN ESPERANTO

LESSON No. 16—By Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

La Dek-naŭa Psalmo

A ĉieloj anoncas la gloron de Dio; Kaj la ĉielendaĵo lian manfaritaĵon.

Tago al tago ekparolas parolon,
Kaj nokto al nokto elmontras sciadon.
Nek trovas sin parolo, nek lingvo;
Ilia voĉo ne estas aŭskultebla.

Ilia linio estas elirinta tra la tuta tero,
Kaj iliaj vortoj al la limo de la mondo.
En ili li metis tendon por la suno,

Kiu estas ĝuste kiel novedzo elvenanta
el la ĉambro,

Kaj ĝojas ĝuste kiel forta viro kiu estas kuronta sian kuron.

Lia eliro estas de la limo de la ĉieloj,
Kaj lia rondo al la limoj de la sama:
Kaj nenio estas kuŝata de la varmego de li.

La leĝo de la Sinjoro estas perfekta, resaniganta la animon:

La atesto de la Sinjoro estas certa, sagiganta la nesagulon.

La regularo de la Sinjoro estas prava, ĝojiganta la koron:

La ordono de la Sinjoro estas purega, vidiganta la okulojn.

La timo de la Sinjoro estas pura, restadante por ĉiam.

La juĝoj de la Sinjoro estas veraj, kaj tute justaj.

Pli multe ili devus esti dezirataj ol oro,
jes, ol multe da pura oro:

Ankaŭ pli malacidaĵ ol mielo kaj la elgutaĵo de la mieltavolo.

Plie per ili via servisto estas avertata:
Per la tenado de ili estas granda rekompenco.

Kiu povas elscii siajn erarojn?
Purigu min de kuŝataj kulpoj.

Detenu vian servanton el tromemfidaj
pekoj;

Ne permesu ke tiaj regu min;

Tiam mi estos honesta,

Kaj mi estos pura rilate al granda transpaŝo.

La paroloj de mia buŝo, kaj la medito
de mia koro,

Estu akcepteblaj antaŭ vi,

Ho Sinjoro, mia ŝtonego, kaj mia Elacētinto.

A FIRE TEST AT OUR CHILDREN'S HOME

"ES—we did have a big fire up on the hill at Mont-Lawn. It certainly was what the widow Bedott would call a 'conflagration.'"
"How did it happen? Well, it did not happen all."

"What! You don't mean it was set afire at the children's Home—of incendiary origin? Who could be so heartless?" "Some one asks excitedly.
Now, my dear friend, do not jump so at conclusions. The fire surely was set—deliberately inde; but this was done in order to demonstrate that a protection against fire was to be found in the Ajax fire engine."

When it was noised abroad that there was to be a demonstration of how a fire could be kindled and then quickly put out, if only the materials could be furnished and a match applied, there were busy times among the boys at Mont-Lawn.
In a shorter time than it takes to tell it, a big stage was erected on the hillside, well back of the buildings. From every direction came boys laden with old boxes, barrels, dead branches and sticks, which were added to the bonfire pile. When matches were applied, the boys and girls danced with excitement and joy.

"My! what a fire that was! We all stood around watching the man with the engine, wondering

Suggestions for study.—Go through the Psalm, pronouncing each word very distinctly, before trying to translate it. Read over the vocabulary to get the meaning of the words. Translate as much of the Psalm as possible without referring to the Bible. Write out the translation and then compare it with the Bible. Study the language by naming the part of speech of each word, whether it is noun, pronoun, verb, etc. In a circle, the leader should request each member to read a line in turn, telling the meaning. As a memory exercise, it would be well to write out a list of words—as long as possible—that can be recalled.

A New Esperanto Magazine

Simultaneously with the Esperanto Convention at Chautauqua appears the first number of The Esperanto Student, a monthly magazine devoted to the interests of Esperanto, and especially to those of students of the language. On the first page is a communication from Dr.
Zamenhof, the founder and father of Esperanto, in which he wishes the best success to the new magazine in its efforts to popularize the new language in this country. Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts, who is conducting THE CHRISTIAN HERALD course in Esperanto, contributes an article on "How to Teach Esperanto." Another article is a translation from Dumas, the celebrated French writer, done by Andrew Kangas, president of the New York Esperanto Society. There are several other articles, all in Esperanto. Judging by its initial number, The Esperanto Student gives promise of great usefulness to students of the new language, which has already made such progress in Europe that it is being taught in the schools of several European countries. The subscription price of the magazine is fifty cents a year. John H. Brown, 22 Meadow Road, Rutherford, N. J., publisher.

Physicians, surgeons and trained nurses realize the value of Ivory Soap in the sick room.

It is pure and it induces purity. For cleansing articles in the sick room or for bathing the person it has no equal. It is white, pleasing and odorless; a perfect germi-cide and a powerful disinfectant; infinitely better than nine-tenths of the drugs, the very odor of which suggest ill health and not, as they should, the clean pure air of the outdoor world.

For Jellies and Preserves

On the proper sealing of your jellies and preserves depends their "keeping." Metal and glass caps too often leak; tying with paper is next to useless; old lids are often insecure.

Simply pour Pure Refined Paraffine over the tops of your jellies, or dip the closed end of the jar (after cooling) in melted

PURE REFINED PARAFFINE

and you will have sealed them perfectly. It's impervious to acids, water, mold and moisture. Has no taste or odor and is perfectly harmless.

Pure Refined Paraffine is used for washing, starch-ing and ironing and numerous other household purposes. Comes in single cakes with full directions inside. Sold everywhere.

CALLER HIGHER

The Songs We Love the Most

Written for The Christian Herald

I KNOW that there are poets who have won a nation's fame,
And the centuries of readers hang upon a certain name;
There are grim old rhyming legends, handed down from long ago,
And the epic of a battle that the deepest thinkers know;
But, for all their magic power, in my simple way I do
On the Old Home sort of rhyming that our Hoosier poet wrote.

Suns of glory on a Milton or a Shakespeare they may shine,
Yet they lack the whole-souled beauty of "An Old Sweet-heart of Mine,"
And I turn the well-worn scrap book just to have another view
Of the heart-aches and the sweetness of his "When My Dreams Come True,"
I'm reminded of the pastures and God's purest, dearest note,
In the pathos and the music of the things that Riley wrote.

The book-shelves hold a legion of the tomes poetic turned,
And their authors win the laurels of an aptitude well earned;
But I guess I'm just old-fashioned when I take my point of view,
And I can't expect to force my field and flower love on you.
It's the homely, sunny logic, keyed to sound a tender note,
That brings back the trust in Jesus, in the rhymes that Riley wrote.

—W. LIVINGSTON LARNED.

A poor lamp with a good chimney will give more satisfaction than a good lamp with a poor chimney. A chimney that doesn't fit, causes smoke, smell, and cuts down the light.

I make a chimney to fit each different style and size of burner ever made. MACBETH chimneys never break from heat, and my name is on every one.

My Lamp-Chimney Book insures getting the right chimney for any burner, and gives suggestions about lamps, chimneys, wicks, oils, and tells how to keep lamps in order. I gladly mail it, free, to any one who writes for it.

The Transformation of Margaret

By MRS. ELEANOR H. PORTER

Author of "Into Still Waters," etc.

A NEW SERIAL WRITTEN FOR "THE CHRISTIAN HERALD"

Synopsis of Preceding Chapters

Little Margaret Kendall, when five years old, was lost in New York and several years elapsed before she was restored to her grief-stricken mother at Houghtonsville. The child had lived among the children of the streets and had acquired their ways. At her mother's home she is surrounded with every luxury, but she wishes that the poor children might share her good fortune. "Bobby" McGinnis, who knew Margaret in New York, now lives near in the same town and becomes a great friend of the little girl. Her widowed mother becomes engaged to Doctor Spencer, who was instrumental in finding Margaret in New York. The little girl is filled with horror, as all the husbands she had heard of beat their wives. She sends to the doctor a contract in which it is stipulated that he will not beat her mother; this the amused doctor signs at once. Margaret insists on a visit from the children of the "Alley," with whom she lived in the slums. At first she wants them to stay always, but consents to have it made a visit. The child, when she sees them, realizes the difference between her old life and the new and is more contented to try and live as her mother wishes. She strives to please, but finds difficulty in curbing her speech and changing her manners. Her mother and herself go back to the city with the Alley children and try to arrange for their welfare. Mrs. Kendall then sends the little girl to a fashionable school in order to give Margaret the companionship of girls of her own age who will make her forget her past experiences, for Margaret was becoming a nervous wreck brooding over the poor people in the "Alley." The doctor and his bride start on their wedding journey; the train is wrecked and both are killed. Several years elapse. Mrs. Merideth and her two brothers, Ned and Frank Spencer, sister and brothers of the doctor who married Mrs. Kendall, are living at their home, Belcourt. Margaret, who has been away at school and traveling, comes to live with them. They find her a beautiful young girl with charming ways. Margaret, riding in an automobile with a Mr. Brandon, sees for the first time the dirty mill village near Belcourt. The mills belong to the Spencers and she learns much of the way in which the firm runs its business. They nearly run over a little girl named Maggie and Miss Kendall's interest is aroused. A young man named McGinnis holds an important position in the mill and is interested in bettering the conditions of the working people. Margaret meets him by chance and finds he is the one she used to know, and that as a boy he "had come to look after her property."

"DEAR old Bobby!" murmured Margaret. And McGinnis knew, in spite of a conscious throb of joy, that it was the fifteen-year-old lad that Margaret Kendall saw before her, not the man grown standing at her side.

"I suppose I thought," he resumed after a moment, "that if I were not here some one might pick up the mills and run off with them."

"And now?" asked Margaret. She was back in the present, and her eyes were merry.

"And now? Well, I come nearer realizing my limitations," said McGinnis laughing. "At any rate, I learned long ago that your interests were in excellent hands, and that my presence could do very little good, even if they had not been in such fine shape. But I am keeping you," he broke off suddenly, backing away from the car.

"Are you—can you—you do not need me any longer to run the machine? You'll not go back through the town, of course."

"No, I shall not go back through the town," shuddered the girl. "And I can drive very well by myself now, I am sure," she declared. And he did not know that for a moment she had been tempted to give quite the opposite answer. "I shall go on to the next turn, and then around home by the other way. But I shall see you soon again—you will come to see me," she finished, as she held out her hand.

McGinnis shook his head. "Miss Kendall, in the kindness of her heart, forgets," he reminded her quickly. "Bobby McGinnis is not on Belcourt's calling list."

"But Bobby McGinnis is my friend," retorted Miss Kendall with a bright smile, "and Belcourt always welcomes my friends."

Still standing under the shadow of the great tree, McGinnis watched the runaway until a turn of the road hid it from sight.

"I thought 'twould be easier after I'd met her once face to face, and spoken to her," he was murmuring softly, "but it's going to be harder, I'm afraid—harder than when I just caught a glimpse of her once in a while, and knew that she was here."

CHAPTER XXII

MARGARET'S morning drive through the town did not have quite the effect she had hoped it would. By daylight the place looked even worse than by the softening twilight. But she was haunted now, not so much by the wan faces of the workers as by the jeering countenances of a mob of mischievous boys. To be sure, the unexpected meeting with Bobby McGinnis had in a measure blurred the vision, but it was still there, and at night she awoke sometimes with those horrid shouts in her ears. Of one thing it had cured her, however; she no longer wished to see for herself the shabby cottages and the people in them. She gave money, promptly and liberally—so liberally, in fact, that Mrs. Merideth quite caught her breath at the size of the bills that the young woman stuffed into her hands.

"But, my dear, so much!" she remonstrated.

"No, no—take it, do!" Margaret had pleaded. "Give it to that society to do as they like with it. And when it's gone there'll be more."

Mrs. Merideth had taken the money then without more ado. The one thing she wished particularly to avoid in the matter was controversy—for controversy meant interest.

There had been one other result of that morning drive—a result which to Frank was perhaps quite as startling as had been the roll of bills to his sister.

"I met your Mr. Robert McGinnis when I was out this morning," Margaret had said that night at dinner. "What sort of man is he?"

Before Frank could reply, Ned had answered for him.

"He's a little tin idol on wheels, Margaret, that can do no wrong. That's what he is."

"Ned!" remonstrated Mrs. Merideth in a horror that was not all playful. Then to Margaret: "He is a very faithful fellow and an efficient workman, my dear, who is a great help to Frank. But how and where did you see him?"

Margaret laughed. "I'll tell you," she promised in response to Mrs. Merideth's question; "but I haven't heard yet from the head of the house."

"I can add little to what has been said," declared Frank with a smile. "He is the king-pin, the keystone—anything you please. But why?"

"Nothing, only I know him. He is an old friend."

"You know him!—a friend!" The three voices were one in shocked amazement.

"Yes, long ago in Houghtonsville," smiled Margaret. "He knew me still longer ago than that; but that part I remember only as it has been told to me. He was the little boy who found me crying in the streets of New York, and took me home to his mother."

There was a stunned silence around the table. It was the first time the Spencers had ever heard Margaret speak voluntarily of her childhood, and it frightened them. It seemed to bring into the perfumed air of the diningroom the visible presence of poverty and misery. They feared, too, for Margaret; this was the one thing that must be guarded against—the possible return to the morbid fancies of her youth. And this man—

"Why, how strange!" murmured Mrs. Merideth, breaking the pause. "But then, after all, he'll not annoy you, I fancy."

WONDERED WHY

Found the Answer Was "Coffee."

Many pale, sickly persons wonder for years why they have to suffer so, and eventually discover that the drug—caffeine—in coffee is the main cause of the trouble.

"I was always very fond of coffee and drank it every day. I never had much sleep and often wondered why I was always pale, thin and weak."

"About five years ago my health completely broke down and I was confined to my bed. My stomach was in such condition that I could hardly take sufficient nourishment to sustain life."

"During this time I was drinking coffee and didn't think I could do without it."

"After awhile I came to the conclusion that coffee was hurting me, and decided to give it up and try Postum. I didn't like the taste of it at first, but when it was made right—boiled until dark and rich—I soon became very fond of it."

"In one week I began to feel better. I could eat more and sleep better. My headaches were less frequent, and within months I looked and felt like a new being. Headache spells entirely gone."

"My health continued to improve. To-day I am well and strong, weigh 148 lbs. I attribute my present health to the life-giving qualities of Postum."

"There's a Reason." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Read "The Road to Wellville," p. 18.

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.
